The concert could have ended with the Beethoven. We were given, as a closing number, three dances by de Falla, for good measure. Even after the Beethoven they were refreshing to a degree, both in material and interpretation. Skillfully made, these dances have a sensuous charm that is at once delightful and stimulating.

Lowrie's Sinfonia Dialectica opened the program. Fortunately the first few measures of the Mozart concerto completely eradicated the doleful and boring impressions made by Mr. Lowrie's composition.

Next week's program includes Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Ravel's Scheherazade for voice and orchestra, and excerpts from his Daphnis and Chloe Ballet. Madame Olga Averino will be the soloist.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

Beethoven's Third Symphony to Be Presented in Providence Theatre.

Next Tuesday evening at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will then conduct Beethoven's epic Third Symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary Napoleon. When Napoleon had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven, feeling that he had betrayed the cause of freedom, destroyed the dedication. But this monument to the great hero of the composer's imagination remains for the world to admire.

A score which Dr. Koussevitzky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program: Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissments on a Pastoral Theme." This piece which is in reality an entertaining set of variations has been played in New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz, a blues, introduced by a saxophone solo; and a gigue.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" will also be played. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. The remaining number, concluding the first part of the program, will be Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The "Eroica" symphony was last given in Providence by this orchestra in the spring of 1930.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

DEC 3 - 1933

Tribute Paid Boston Critic, Retiring at 79

Philip Hale Praised for His Lucid, Honest Writings on Music.

By James Davies.

I HAVE frequently referred in this column to Philip Hale, oldest and most scholarly of American critics, who for a great many years has contributed to the progress of music in this country, and has illuminated many a dark hour for those who like to dip into the mysteries of musical knowledge. He has done this through his contributions to the Boston Herald and especially through the splendid program he has written for the Boston symphony orchestra concerts.

Why he should retire at the early age of 79 is his own particular business. It cannot be that he was tired, as one of his commentators has suggested, for his public documents read as fresh and youthful as they have ever done. But he has decided to retire and let somebody else bear whatever burdens there may be for critics.

I never knew Mr. Hale personally, but he was a doughty fighter in the world of music during the years I spent in college in Boston, one who at that time was regarded with not a little awe, tinged with an equal amount of fear, for on occasion he could and did write with severity, but let it be said in his honor always with the utmost honesty.

I have said Mr. Hale was scholarly and I repeat the statement with emphasis. He was not satisfied with the hair brush kind of commentary in his sympathy notes that are sometimes met with. He was in reality a musical scholar who followed the ways of scholarship in the preparation of his valuable notes.

LET me cite a single instance that came under my notice. A certain acquaintance who was preparing a learned disquisition on the music to Goethe's "Faust" did not find the assembling of his material particularly easy; but he finally, after exhausting all available sources, finish his article, which was published in a nationally known journal. It was good, he thought, and it read delightfully, but Mr. Hale had garnered as much and as important material for the Boston symphony in preparing a discussion on the Liszt Faust symphony.

It was not in the least necessary for him to carry his investigations so far, but this seems to have been the spirit of the true scholar, who, once he has started in pursuit of an objective never ceases until it is attained. Indeed those who have preserved Boston symphony notes, and have taken the trouble to study them, will find plenty of rich and varied intellectual food.

There have been and are stylists among American music critics who deserve to take rank with writers in any particular field, but there has been none who matched this man in the singular felicity of expression in which he couched his writings on any subject. He has only one rival in this particular moment, and in my opinion not even he can lay claim to Mr. Hale's enormous fund of musical knowledge.

He was a graduate of Yale university and was later admitted to the bar. He became an editorial writer and enjoyed considerable experience in the many activities a newspaper office affords. A lover of music from his youth up, he studied in America, also in Germany and in France, in which countries he acquired German thoroughness and not a little of the lucidity of expression characteristic of French writers. With these additions to an alert intellectual native equipment, combined with a saving sense of humor he became an honor to the writing profession of this country.

THE critical profession is proud of Philip Hale, proud of his accomplishments and of his qualities as an independent thinker. But don't let us misunderstand that statement. He was no dry as dust explorer into intellectual regions, not he, rather he possessed a certain blithesomeness that was re-echoed in his writings, learned as they indubitably were. Knowledge to him did not mean obscurity of thought, but rather thought clear and logical, expressed clearly and logically, that anyone might read and understand.

His convictions were positive and while it is true that posterity will not always accord him approval any more than some of his own generation have done, none will dare gainsay his integrity. All who take delight in a stubborn fight will appreciate his loyalty to the above convictions that lead him into many a gay little battle.

Even now we have a feeling that his antagonism to so-called German heaviness and sentimentality of style was somewhat out of place and suggests that his German reading was rather limited in spite of his German studies. There is in reality less sentimentality in German writing than may be found in our own, while the so-called "German ponderosity" is a term used by writers who know nothing at all about the matter and who quote, parrot-like, what somebody else has said.

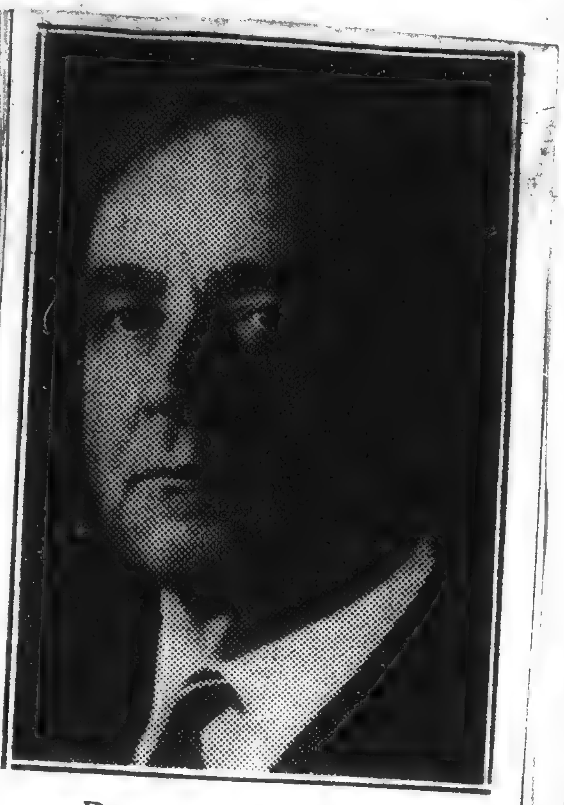
We may, however, honor this octogenarian's enthusiasm for anything and everything he deemed right. His insistence on the value of works by some composers as yet unknown to the world, his constant fight to give them a place in the musical world: Tschaikowsky, Franck, not a few of the French, Russian and American composers, who came into the limelight during his activities, have a great deal to thank him for.

It is significant that Hale was perhaps the only American critic whose influence extended beyond our own borders, unless we except Huneker, and to a lesser degree, Henderson and Krehbiel. There is not a great deal of inclination among our European brethren to yield very much to American writers on musical subjects, but Hale was accepted at his true value and that, measured in any scale, was exceedingly high.

From the northwest we wish Mr. Hale well and we trust he will enjoy many more years of valuable service to the cause of music. Musical criticism in the hands of such men has become an art employing the best in knowledge and ability to express that knowledge happily and lucidly.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Noted conductor will lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first Providence concert this season Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre.

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

NEXT Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in the Metropolitan Theatre in a program of incomparable attractiveness—Beethoven for intrinsic greatness of symphonic magnitude, Pierne for pleasure of a great artistry, Moussorgsky for present day idioms of a worthy operatic orchestral progress, and Strauss for the pinnacle of orchestration and performance of a neat and engrossing legend.

To many the "Eroica" is the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, to some of us it is the greatest of all symphonies. Considerations such as these are perhaps a matter of personal opinion, which is what the public wants, but are based upon analytical comparisons, which are exactly what musicians want. There is however no divergence in the opinion of musicologists that its workmanship, spontaniety of thematic material and genius of original thought is hardly surpassed. There are many portions of the symphony upon which one may hang a hat, genuine melodies or tunes, orchestral figures of surpassing beauty which if they might exist by themselves would endure.

There is enough thematic material in this work for a half dozen symphonies. If one should remove them from the rest of the composition there would be a veritable gallery of melodic gems. They are united into a composite whole by musical development which no other composer has ever been able to equal or even imitate. The personal interest of the composer and his reputed dedication to Napoleon may add a programmatic interest, but the music is absolute and is dependent upon no personal consideration or allusion of anecdote. The beginning, with the common chord and its application by extended anacrusis immediately insures the interest and establishes the solidity of this brilliant and ever-changing movement. Brahms uses exactly the same figure in several works, and it has become a classic explanation of the substantial methods of tonal revelation. Masterly working out, digression into nearby paths and the invocation of answering episodes, only enhance the interest in one of the greatest simplicities of musical composition. Even the most devoted modernists resort to this chord when they fear they have wearied by their aimless meanderings and cacophonic absurdities.

Beethoven's Greatness

Here Beethoven shows his greatness, here he leaves a pattern to which posterity has abundantly helped itself. Here he shows how much may be made out of little, and the present-day popularity of this symphony proves his prophetic vision. The most astute master of music may find profit in studying the "Eroica" if he keep this in mind, nor will he be disappointed at the new interests his study reveals. It will help him in his appreciation of the Brahms, it will cause him to return to the Mozart and Haydn of his youth and it will offer interesting comparisons with the voluminous and novel music of the present time. He will wonder at the possibilities of woodwind and strings, he will rejoice in the momentary flash of the flute and he will feel the tremendous thrill of the soaring orchestra in many throated exultation.

No epic poem can equal the beauties of this symphony, no elegiac pronouncement can surpass the solemnity of the "funeral march" nor can any writer design a more dignified and elegant fugue on the material medium of five lines and four spaces. It is a work such as this, the Fifth Symphony, the "Emperor Concerto" and the string quartet opus 59, that give Beethoven his high place in music.

The heroic proportions of this symphony and the obvious nobility of its music guarantees the title. Until one learns that it was the custom of the Greeks, whose tragedies Beethoven admired greatly, to turn to athletic sports after emotional stress as a mental change and uplift, the presence of a "funeral march" in this symphony seems incongruous. Its place in music as an interpretation of grief is incomparable. It may be that those who feel that the "Funeral March from Siegfried" is a more appealing revelation are influenced by the libretto and stage settings and miss these adjuncts in their contemplation of this mood of Beethoven. Or it may be that to others the more obvious [illegible] of Beethoven appeal to a nature which is affected by greater simplicity in structure as well as in by the closer association of melodic purpose.

"Funeral Marches" in music are not numerous. Besides that of Wagner, Chopin's from the sonata opus 35 in B-flat minor, the "Dead March in Saul" and Guilmant's for organ, there are not many. Its place in this symphony between two movements of the greatest elan and brio, like jet black between vivid yellow and purple, the effect is one of as great contrast as may be found in all music.

From this atmosphere of immeasurably deep grief, one is suddenly transported into an atmosphere of light and life. Were the opening passages of the "scherzo" less softly announced, were there any thought of the brusque or grotesque, the devotional character of the preceding movement would be destroyed. Nor should one attempt to invest this gaiety with too fanciful a meaning, for Beethoven has told us distinctly that music has its own allusions and interpretations and should, for the most part, be apparent without a libretto or program.

The onrushing and tumultuous "allegro" of the Finale may well be thought of as the apotheosis of the Hero. Here Beethoven would have us recall his fondness for "variations" founded on but two notes of the major triad in masterly musical imagination. Again the limpid charm of the flute compels admiration and glorifies a simple tune and boasts a florid cadenza, one of the few in musical literature until our own time. In this symphony Beethoven, without scenery, voices or program, has established an example of the ability of music to portray, in itself, nobility of character and intrinsic worth. Not before his time or since has there been such a work nor shall we look for another.

Strauss's "Till"

Richard Strauss's serio comic illustrates a highly modernistic phase of musical development. Its definiteness of purpose is indicated by the libretto or story with which it is identified and whose lines it follows closely. It will repay a study in which the hearer seeks to learn how music may be blended to represent a word thought and the means by which they may be brought about. With the screaming high-pitched clarinet we say "the precious rascal," muted horns in chromatic thirds sighs "poor Till" in musical commiseration; a merry hymn [illegible] and a massive and solid minor chord [illegible] repeated, shows the hopelessness of his reform. One hears no impact of steel upon the whirling arms of the windmill; there are [illegible] buzzing bees, but more subtle and suggestive ideas and suggestions.

In this stupendous work, which only orchestras of the highest technical attainments may essay, Strauss employs onrushing mass of strings, high pitched clarinets, muted horns and at times the most powerful volumes of enlarged brass choir. The orchestration is at times plaintive and delicate but for the most part sounding sonorities prevail. Sly merriment vies with pathos and Strauss is most skilful in his orchestral depiction of moods of pleasure and pain. He has succeeded in musical realism far beyond his fellows and in this more than any other of his works he has achieved the almost miraculous and opened a new chapter in the ever-progressing art of orchestration.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Boston to Hear New Whithorne Premiere

Emerson Whithorne's latest composition will have its world premiere this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

"Moon Trail" is a suite for symphonic orchestra in four movements— one, "Death Valley," with its tragedy and peace; two, "The Devil's Kitchen," which is a picture of Coso springs in the Owens valley; three, "Palos Verdes," a contrast from the angry picture of "The Devil's Kitchen" in beautiful hills, and ships moving on placid waters; four, "Surf at Malibu."

Eugene Goossens, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will give the world premiere of Whithorne's "First Symphony" January 12 in Cincinnati.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

DEC 3 - 1933

Noted S. F. Pianist Chosen as Critic

George S. MacManus, pianist, formerly of San Francisco, has been chosen to succeed Philip Hale as music critic of the Boston Herald. Hale, nearly 80 years old, has retired. He is one of the most scholarly of American writers on music. His distinguished work as program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be taken up by John N. Burke. MacManus formerly was a member of the faculty of the University of California.

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 3 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will play Mahler's Ninth symphony, Ravel's "Scheherazade," three poems for voice and orchestra with Olga Averino as soloist and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë" ballet music (excerpts from the second suite) next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Boston.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

DEC 3 - 1933

Tribute Paid Boston Critic, Retiring at 79

Philip Hale Praised for His Lucid, Honest Writings on Music.

By James Davies.

I HAVE frequently referred in this column to Philip Hale, oldest and most scholarly of American critics, who for a great many years has contributed to the progress of music in this country, and has illuminated many a dark hour for those who like to dip into the mysteries of musical knowledge. He has done this through his contributions to the Boston Herald and especially through the splendid program he has written for the Boston symphony orchestra concerts.

Why he should retire at the early age of 79 is his own particular business. It cannot be that he was tired, as one of his commentators has suggested, for his public documents read as fresh and youthful as they have ever done. But he has decided to retire and let somebody else bear whatever burdens there may be for critics.

I never knew Mr. Hale personally, but he was a doughty fighter in the world of music during the years I spent in college in Boston, one who at that time was regarded with not a little awe, tinged with an equal amount of fear, for on occasion he could and did write with severity, but let it be said in his honor always with the utmost honesty.

I have said Mr. Hale was scholarly and I repeat the statement with emphasis. He was not satisfied with the hair brush kind of commentary in his sympathy notes that are sometimes met with. He was in reality a musical scholar who followed the ways of scholarship in the preparation of his valuable notes.

LET me cite a single instance that came under my notice. A certain acquaintance who was preparing a learned disquisition on the music to Goethe's "Faust" did not find the assembling of his material particularly easy; but he finally, after exhausting all available sources, finish his article, which was published in a nationally known journal. It was good, he thought, and it read delightfully, but Mr. Hale had garnered as much and as important material for the Boston symphony in preparing a discussion on the Liszt Faust symphony.

It was not in the least necessary for him to carry his investigations so far, but this seems to have been the spirit of the true scholar, who, once he has started in pursuit of an objective never ceases until it is attained. Indeed those who have preserved Boston symphony notes, and have taken the trouble to study them, will find plenty of rich and varied intellectual food.

There have been and are stylists among American music critics who deserve to take rank with writers in any particular field, but there has been none who matched this man in the singular felicity of expression in which he couched his writings on any subject. He has only one rival in this particular moment, and in my opinion not even he can lay claim to Mr. Hale's enormous fund of musical knowledge.

He was a graduate of Yale university and was later admitted to the bar. He became an editorial writer and enjoyed considerable experience in the many activities a newspaper office affords. A lover of music from his youth up, he studied in America, also in Germany and in France, in which countries he acquired German thoroughness and not a little of the lucidity of expression characteristic of French writers. With these additions to an alert intellectual native equipment, combined with a saving sense of humor he became an honor to the writing profession of this country.

THE critical profession is proud of Philip Hale, proud of his accomplishments and of his qualities as an independent thinker. But don't let us misunderstand that statement. He was no dry as dust explorer into intellectual regions, not he, rather he possessed a certain blithesomeness that was re-echoed in his writings, learned as they indubitably were. Knowledge to him did not mean obscurity of thought, but rather thought clear and logical, expressed clearly and logically, that anyone might read and understand.

His convictions were positive and while it is true that posterity will not always accord him approval any more than some of his own generation have done, none will dare gainsay his integrity. All who take delight in a stubborn fight will appreciate his loyalty to the above convictions that lead him into many a gay little battle.

Even now we have a feeling that his antagonism to so-called German heaviness and sentimentality of style was somewhat out of place and suggests that his German reading was rather limited in spite of his German studies. There is in reality less sentimentality in German writing than may be found in our own, while the so-called "German ponderosity" is a term used by writers who know nothing at all about the matter and who quote, parrot-like, what somebody else has said.

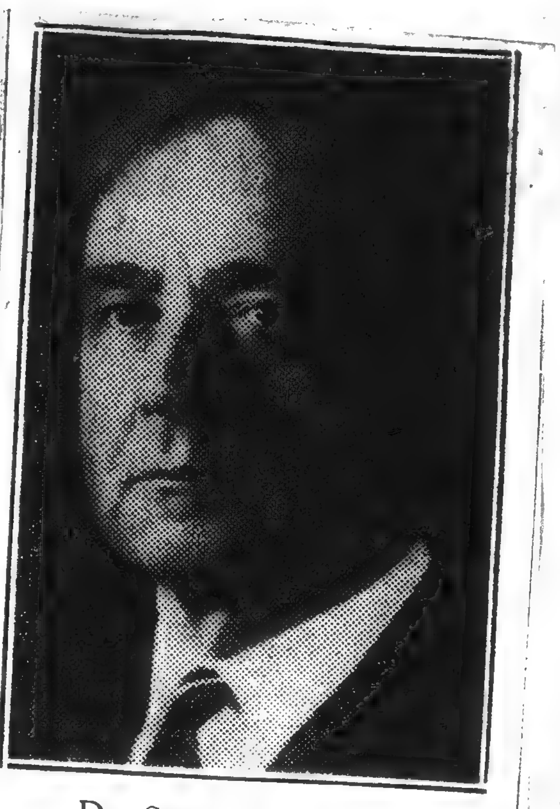
We may, however, honor this octogenarian's enthusiasm for anything and everything he deemed right. His insistence on the value of works by some composers as yet unknown to the world, his constant fight to give them a place in the musical world: Tschaikowsky, Franck, not a few of the French, Russian and American composers, who came into the limelight during his activities, have a great deal to thank him for.

It is significant that Hale was perhaps the only American critic whose influence extended beyond our own borders, unless we except Huneker, and to a lesser degree, Henderson and Krehbiel. There is not a great deal of inclination among our European brethren to yield very much to American writers on musical subjects, but Hale was accepted at his true value and that, measured in any scale, was exceedingly high.

From the northwest we wish Mr. Hale well and we trust he will enjoy many more years of valuable service to the cause of music. Musical criticism in the hands of such men has become an art employing the best in knowledge and ability to express that knowledge happily and lucidly.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Noted conductor will lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first Providence concert this season Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre.

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

NEXT Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in the Metropolitan Theatre in a program of incomparable attractiveness—Beethoven for intrinsic greatness of symphonic magnitude, Pierne for pleasure of a great artistry, Moussorgsky for present day idioms of a worthy operatic orchestral progress, and Strauss for the pinnacle of orchestration and performance of a neat and engrossing legend.

To many the "Eroica" is the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, to some of us it is the greatest of all symphonies. Considerations such as these are perhaps a matter of personal opinion, which is what the public wants, but are based upon analytical comparisons, which are exactly what musicians want. There is however no divergence in the opinion of musicologists that its workmanship, spontaniety of thematic material and genius of original thought is hardly surpassed. There are many portions of the symphony upon which one may hang a hat, genuine melodies or tunes, orchestral figures of surpassing beauty which if they might exist by themselves would endure.

There is enough thematic material in this work for a half dozen symphonies. If one should remove them from the rest of the composition there would be a veritable gallery of melodic gems. They are united into a composite whole by musical development which no other composer has ever been able to equal or even imitate. The personal interest of the composer and his reputed dedication to Napoleon may add a programmatic interest, but the music is absolute and is dependent upon no personal consideration or allusion of anecdote. The beginning, with the common chord and its application by extended anacrusis immediately insures the interest and establishes the solidity of this brilliant and ever-changing movement. Brahms uses exactly the same figure in several works, and it has become a classic explanation of the substantial methods of tonal revelation. Masterly working out, digression into nearby paths and the invocation of answering episodes, only enhance the interest in one of the greatest simplicities of musical composition. Even the most devoted modernists resort to this chord when they fear they have wearied by their aimless meanderings and cacophonic absurdities.

Beethoven's Greatness

Here Beethoven shows his greatness, here he leaves a pattern to which posterity has abundantly helped itself. Here he shows how much may be made out of little, and the present-day popularity of this symphony proves his prophetic vision. The most astute master of music may find profit in studying the "Eroica" if he keep this in mind, nor will he be disappointed at the new interests his study reveals. It will help him in his appreciation of the Brahms, it will cause him to return to the Mozart and Haydn of his youth and it will offer interesting comparisons with the voluminous and novel music of the present time. He will wonder at the possibilities of woodwind and strings, he will rejoice in the momentary flash of the flute and he will feel the tremendous thrill of the soaring orchestra in many throated exultation.

No epic poem can equal the beauties of this symphony, no elegiac pronouncement can surpass the solemnity of the "funeral march" nor can any writer design a more dignified and elegant fugue on the material medium of five lines and four spaces. It is a work such as this, the Fifth Symphony, the "Emperor Concerto", and the string quartet opus 59, that give Beethoven his high place in music.

The heroic proportions of this symphony and the obvious nobility of its music guarantees the title. Until one learns that it was the custom of the Greeks, whose tragedies Beethoven admired greatly, to turn to athletic sports after emotional stress as a mental change and uplift, the presence of a "funeral march" in this symphony seems incongruous. Its place in music as an interpretation of grief is incomparable. It may be that those who feel that the "Funeral March from Siegfried" is a more appealing revelation are influenced by the libretto and stage settings and miss these adjuncts in their contemplation of this mood of Beethoven. Or it may be that to others the more obvious intents of Beethoven appeal to a nature which is affected by greater simplicity in structure as well as in by the closer association of melodic purpose.

"Funeral Marches" in music are not numerous. Besides that of Wagner, Chopin's from the sonata opus 35 in B-flat minor, the "Dead March in Saul" and Guilmant's for organ, there are not many. Its place in this symphony, between two movements of the greatest elan and brio, like jet black between vivid yellow and purple, the effect is one of as great contrast as may be found in all music.

From this atmosphere of immeasurably deep grief, one is suddenly transported into an atmosphere of light and life. Were the opening passages of the "scherzo" less softly announced, were there any thought of the brusque or grotesque, the devotional character of the preceding movement would be destroyed. Nor should one attempt to invest this gaiety with too fanciful a meaning, for Beethoven has told us distinctly that music has its own allusions and interpretations and should, for the most part, be apparent without a libretto or program.

The onrushing and tumultuous "allegro" of the Finale may well be thought of as the apotheosis of the Hero. Here Beethoven would have us recall his fondness for "variations" founded on but two notes of the major triad in masterly musical imagination. Again the limpid charm of the flute compels admiration and glorifies a simple tune and boasts a florid cadenza, one of the few in musical literature until our own time. In this symphony Beethoven, without scenery, voices or program, has established an example of the ability of music to portray, in itself, nobility of character and intrinsic worth. Not before his time or since has there been such a work nor shall we look for another.

Strauss's "Till"

Richard Strauss's serio comic illustrates a highly modernistic phase of musical development. Its definiteness of purpose is indicated by the libretto or story with which it is identified and whose lines it follows closely. It will repay a study in which the hearer seeks to learn how music may be blended to represent a word thought and the means by which they may be brought about. With the screaming high-pitched clarinet we say "the precious rascal," muted horns in chromatic thirds sighs "poor Till" in musical commiseration; a merry hymn [illegible] and a massive and solid minor chord [illegible] repeated, shows the hopelessness of his reform. One hears no impact of steel upon the whirling arms of the windmill, there are no buzzing bees, but more subtle and suggestive ideas and suggestions.

In this stupendous work, which only orchestras of the highest technical attainments may essay, Strauss employs onrushing mass of strings, high pitched clarinets, muted horns and at times the most powerful volumes of enlarged brass choir. The orchestration is at times plaintive and delicate but for the most part sounding sonorities prevail. Sly merriment vies with pathos and Strauss is most skilful in his orchestral depiction of moods of pleasure and pain. He has succeeded in musical realism far beyond his fellows and in this more than any other of his works he has achieved the almost miraculous and opened a new chapter in the ever-progressing art of orchestration.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Boston to Hear New Whithorne Premiere

Emerson Whithorne's latest composition will have its world premiere this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

"Moon Trail" is a suite for symphonic orchestra in four movements— one, "Death Valley," with its tragedy and peace; two, "The Devil's Kitchen," which is a picture of Coso springs in the Owens valley; three, "Palos Verdes," a contrast from the angry picture of "The Devil's Kitchen" in beautiful hills, and ships moving on placid waters; four, "Surf at Malibu."

Eugene Goossens, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will give the world premiere of Whithorne's "First Symphony" January 12 in Cincinnati.

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 3 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will play Mahler's Ninth symphony, Ravel's "Scheherazade," three poems for voice and orchestra with Olga Averino as soloist and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë" ballet music (excerpts from the second suite) next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Boston.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

DEC 3 - 1933

Noted S. F. Pianist Chosen as Critic

George S. MacManus, pianist, formerly of San Francisco, has been chosen to succeed Philip Hale as music critic of the Boston Herald. Hale, nearly 80 years old, has retired. He is one of the most scholarly of American writers on music. His distinguished work as program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be taken up by John N. Burke. MacManus formerly was a member of the faculty of the University of California.

8✓

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Series Tuesday Night

Beethoven's Third, the "Eroica," is on First Half of Program.—Marie Sundelius and Verdandi Male Chorus to Give Concert This Afternoon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the stand, opens its Providence series of four concerts Tuesday night in [illegible]ropolitan Theatre at 8:15 o'clo[illegible] [illegible]mphony will be Beethoven's Third, the "Eroica," which will occupy the first [illegible] the program. The second half [illegible] consist of Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," a series of variations including a Viennese waltz, "blues" and a "gigue;" the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina," and Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give a lecture on the items and composers of the program this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library. It is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and is free to the public. In connection with the Boston Symphony series it is announced that Sir Henry Wood, the renowned Englishman, will be guest conductor at one of the concerts, possibly in January, if the custom of recent seasons is continued.

This afternoon at 3 o'clock in Infantry Hall a concert will be given under the auspices [illegible] Scandinavian Old People's Home. [illegible]sts are Marie Sundelius, sopra[illegible] Edith Gyllenberg-Waxberg at the [illegible], and the Verdandi Male Chorus, [illegible]ar Ekeberg, director. Announcements for the week follow:

TODAY

Concert, auspices [illegible]inavian Old People's Home; Ma[illegible] [illegible], soprano; Edith Gyllenberg-Waxberg, accompanist; Verdandi Male Chorus, Oscar Ekeberg, director; Infantry Hall, 3 p. m.

"Israel's Herde" "Shepherd of Israel") .... [illegible]niansky
"Tindrande Fagra Stjarna" ([illegible]) .... Widen
"Vandringssang" ("Hiking Song") .... Korling
Chorus
"Sondag" ("Su[illegible]) .... [illegible]rnefeldt
"Sno" ("Snow") .... Torsleff
"Karin Mansdotters [illegible]gvisa" ("[illegible]dle Song") .... Boivie
"Land Du Valsignade" ("Thou B[illegible] Land") .... Althen
M[illegible] [illegible]delius
"On the Sea" .... Dudley Buck
"The Silent Waterlily" .... Abt
"Dear Land of Home" .... Sibelius
Chorus
"Som Stjarnan."
"Tanker Du" .... Swedish folksongs
"Mustalainen" (Finnish folksong) .. Melarlin
"Zuni Indians Wooing," traditional, arr. by Troyer
"Chillden of the Moon" .... Warren
Mme. Sundelius
"Norrland" .... Stenhammar
"Stjarnsang" ("Song of the Stars") .... [illegible] Berg
Chorus

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus. 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio [illegible]
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; [illegible]
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
"Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," opus 49 .... Pierne
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" .... Moussorgsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, opus 28 .... Strauss

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 4 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Here Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan theatre tomorrow evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's epic Third symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary, Napoleon. When Napoleon had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven, feeling that he had betrayed the cause of freedom, destroyed the dedication. But this monument to the great hero of the composer's imagination remains for the world to admire.

A score which Dr. Koussevitzky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program. Gabriel Pierne's divertisements on a pastoral theme. This piece, which is in reality an entertaining set of variations, has been played n New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz; a blues, introduced by a saxophone solo; and a gigue.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" also will be played. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red square in Moscow. The remaining number, concluding the first part of the program, will be Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Library Collection Has Symphony Scores

The Providence Public Library's music collection includes most of the music which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday, the exception being Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme." The latter has been ordered and will be available as soon as received.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is one of the few available having all the orchestral parts. In addition there is a conductor's score and a miniature score, the latter being especially valuable to the studious listener. For the piano student there is a copy in the Analytic Symphony Series, edited by Goetschius, wherein the important themes are shown and the music itself is not too difficult for the average performer. There are some editions which do not indicate the themes, also arrangements for four-hand and for eight-hand playing, useful in class work.

For the prelude to "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, there is a pianoforte version edited by Rimsky-Korsakov containing descriptive notes in English and in French. There is a version of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" for pianoforte solo by Otto Singer, also a miniature orchestral score.

In "Beethoven the Creator," by Rolland, will be found an outline of the "Eroica," illustrated by facsimiles of the title page and the opening bars of the "Funeral March." Theodore Thomas, in his "Talks About Beethoven's Symphonies," suggests the meaning of "Eroica," explaining it in terms of Greek tragedy of which Beethoven was known to be an admirer. A good summing up of the various interpretations is given in Uptons "Standard Symphonies."

Among other accounts may be mentioned "Stories of Symphonic Music," by Gilman; "Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp; "Symphonic Broadcasts," by Downes; "The Concert-Goer's Library," by Newmarch, and biographies by Bekker, Rolland, Scheuffler and Thayer.

"Moussorgsky," by Montagu-Nathan, considers the historical events underlying the dramatic material of "Khovangtchina" and describes the opening scene of the opera. Another volume of interest is Calvocoressi's biography of Moussorgsky, having for its sub-title, "The Russian Musical Nationalist." Rosenfeld in his "Musical Portraits" devotes a chapter to Moussorgsky and to Richard Strauss as well.

"Modern Composers," by Pannain, is the latest word on Strauss. "Richard Strauss," by Finck, is a much more sympathetic account, intended for the "general reader."

With Wagner for The Pension Fund

Trans Dec 4

Although the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was smaller than that which usually assembles for a Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it established a new high mark in the generosity of its applause. The two balconies and a fair portion of the main floor were filled; some of the higher-priced seats, however, were vacant. Yet those who came gave unstinted approval of the bounteous "all-Wagner" feast which was set before them.

"The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Overture to Tannhäuser" were the particular favorites of the afternoon. The obvious comment would be that the audience was merely running true to form by clapping the loudest for the music which produced the largest volume of sound. At the same time, these items were the most deserving of applause because they were brilliantly played, representing, as they did, conductor and musicians in their most eloquent manner. The turbulent Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which began the program, was an exception to the case. It is not in the active repertory of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, understandably enough, has not found it responsive to the intimate and revealing attention which has made his interpretation of certain other Wagnerian excerpts so inspiring.

Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" frequently has been memorable. The accuracy and refinement of the Boston Symphony strings makes possible a peculiarly exalted mood—a reverent, spiritual atmosphere seldom approached by other orchestras. Dr. Koussevitzky also plays this music more slowly than most conductors, and yesterday he retarded his beat even beyond what is customary for him in the compositions of Wagner. It was as though the music were evoking an almost static spirituality which would become a permanent part of consciousness.

A similar concentration and restraint were observable in "A Siegfried Idyl," though here tempi and rhythm were more varied. "A Siegfried Idyl" is another of the Wagnerian scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky's performance rises to the higher level of interpretation and revelation. The program also contained portions of the music-drama, "The Twilight of the Gods," which were combined under the title, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey." The performance was notable for the tonal beauty of the strings and the purity of the woodwind voices. There were portions, however, which fell short of the usual Boston Symphony Orchestra standard. It was, in general, an afternoon to glorify the richness of tone and suavity of manner of which the Boston musicians are capable. Although in at least two instances ("The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser") it provided the noble utterance which is frequently characteristio of the music of Wagner, it avoided confident and full-throated eloquence in favor of fine shading and painstaking care in phrasing.

N. M. J.

Trans

DECEMBER 4, 1933

ns --- Films

Week-End Record Of Concert-Halls

An Oncoming Flood of Carols, The Dialogued Symphony, Fiedler's Discovery

The musical managements, like the stores, have discovered that Christmas—sometimes known as the Feast of the Nativity—may be turned to pleasure and profit. Hence, as the day draws near, concerts of carols and other Christmas pieces; this December in Boston above the usual. To Jordan Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 22, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 23, come The English Singers who excel in such concerts; draw from a wide repertory; are now the better for new women's voices. In the past in Boston they have ventured one or two such concerts and found an audience.

Over the way at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 21, the Handel and Haydn Society, persuaded once more by Mr. Stone to break from routine, will venture a similar concert with a diversified program and at prices no higher than a dollar. And all this in the face of the time-honored belief that so late in December, Christmas shopping is the only possible entertainment.

To some, however, no singing of Christmas carols and Christmas hymns so truly expresses the time as the "services" at Harvard, what with the reading of St. Luke's narrative of the Holy Night and the united singing of "Adeste, Fideles." (If only the University authorities might add the driving, swelling trumpets.) This December there will be three in the Memorial Church at 8.15 on Monday, Dec. 18, at 4.30 and 8.15 on Tuesday, Dec. 19. This year, in the absence of Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth will assemble the carols and conduct.

Lourié's Experiment

Heard for the first time in Boston at the Symphony Concert of Friday, repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, Monsieur Lourié's "Sinfonia Dialectica" proved more engaging music than his "Liturgical Sonata" of 1931. Furthermore, both audiences received it more warmly than is their habit with experimental music via Paris, from either Russian or French hands. Possibly the rhythmical exhilaration that the "Sinfonia Dialectica" readily generates, kindled this unexpected response. For Monsieur Lourié has followed the earlier, or the middle, Stravinsky in incessant changes of meter; while Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra are practised hands with the play of such changes upon the nerves of an audience. On the other hand, for some hearers, there was reason to doubt whether the performance, in spite of this rhythmical ardor, was as revealing as might be of the form and substance of Monsieur Lourié's piece.

After a first and a second performance of a novel number, such questioning is admittedly speculative—the more when the questioner knows the score only by report of the departmental analyst. None the less, Monsieur Lourié's title clearly indicated a certain form and a certain substance. "Most of the themes," said the Transcript's annotator—old and expert eye at score-reading—"have actual dialogue-form—a motiv or phrase in one instrument or group at once answered by another motiv or phrase in another group or color." It is interesting, he went on, "to trace the logical and organic growth of the music."

Now it may be that Monsieur Lourié, long addicted to cerebral and intricate composition, has written a "Sinfonia" that is more easily understood in print than in sound. Strauss himself has not escaped such error; while many a modernist is easy prey to it. Certainly to one hearer, listening with close attention, came little of the dialogued form or the dialogued substance. Perhaps his ear and mind twice went dull; perhaps the quick traffic of the concert-hall betrayed him. As it was, he could agree only that Monsieur Lourié had made an interesting and at moments impressive experiment in symphonic composition—an experiment that altogether justified performance; while about the nature and outcome of that experiment he was by no means clear.

At every turn, besides, the performance suggested a music too vitalized to exist merely on score-paper. True, Monsieur Lourié is by no means averse to propounding a theory and then writing a music to fit and exemplify it; but more than once the "Sinfonia Dialectica" seems born of imaginative as well as intellectual prompting. On the other hand the composer's citing of a paragraph from Pascal as the subject of his "spiritual meditation" while he was at work on the "Sinfonia" was hardly illuminating. For most of us, if we have any sensibility, the "spiritual" quality of a given music exhales from it and guide-posts are superfluous. Surely the interest and the impression of this experimental "Sinfonia" were from mind to mind and not from spirit to spirit. When an idea for composition was floating through Verdi's head, he liked to say that he would make some music about it. Monsieur Lourié might profitably "meditate" on this saying as well as Pascal's, and leave "spirituality" to care for itself.

82

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Series Tuesday Night

Beethoven's Third, the "Eroica," is on First Half of Program.—Marie Sundelius and Verdandi Male Chorus to Give Concert This Afternoon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the stand, opens its Providence series of four concerts Tuesday night in [illegible]ropolitan Theatre at 8:15 o'clo[illegible] [illegible]mphony will be Beethoven's Third, the "Eroica," which will occupy the first [illegible] the program. The second half [illegible] consist of Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," a series [illegible] variations including a Viennese waltz, "[illegible]" and a "gigue;" the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina," and Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give a lecture on the items and composers of the program this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library. It is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and is free to the public. In connection with the Boston Symphony series it is announced that Sir Henry Wood, the renowned Englishman, will be guest conductor at one of the concerts, possibly in January, if the custom of recent seasons is continued.

This afternoon at 3 o'clock in Infantry Hall a concert will be given under the auspices of the [illegible]candinavian Old People's Home. [illegible]sts are Marie Sundelius, soprano; [illegible] Edith Gyllenberg-Waxberg at the [illegible], and the Verdandi Male Chorus, Oscar Ekeberg, director. Announcements for the week follow:

TODAY

Concert, auspices [illegible]dinavian Old People's Home: Ma[illegible] [illegible] soprano; Edith Gyllenberg-Waxberg, accompanist; Verdandi Male Chorus, Oscar Ekeberg, director; Infantry Hall, 3 p. m.

"Israel's Herde" ("Shepherd of Israel") ..... [illegible]rtniansky
"Tindrande Fagra Stjarna" ([illegible]) ..... Widen
"Vandringssang" ("Hiking Song") ..... Korling

Chorus

"Sondag" ("Sunday") ..... Jarnefeldt
"Sno" ("Snow") ..... Torsleff
"Karin Mansdotters [illegible]gvisa" ("[illegible]dle Song") ..... Boivie
"Land Du Valsignade" ("Thou B[illegible] Land") ..... Althen

Mme. Sundelius

"On the Sea" ..... Dudley Buck
"The Silent Waterlily" ..... Abt
"Dear Land of Home" ..... Sibelius

Chorus

"Som Stjarnan."
"Tanker Du" ..... Swedish folksongs
"Mustalainen" (Finnish folksong) .. Melartin
"Zuni Indians Wooing," traditional, arr. by Troyer
"Childen of the Moon" ..... Warren

Mme. Sundelius

"Norrland" ..... Stenhammar
"Stjarnsang" ("Song of the Stars") ..... [illegible] Berg

Chorus

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio [illegible].
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; [illegible].
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
"Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," opus 49 ..... Pierne
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" ..... Moussorgsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, opus 28 ..... Strauss

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1933

Library Collection Has Symphony Scores

The Providence Public Library's music collection includes most of the music which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday the exception being Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme." The latter has been ordered and will be available as soon as received.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is one of the few available having all the orchestral parts. In addition there is a conductor's score and a miniature score, the latter being especially valuable to the studious listener. For the piano student there is a copy in the Analytic Symphony Series, edited by Goetschius, wherein the important themes are shown and the music itself is not too difficult for the average performer. There are some editions which do not indicate the themes, also arrangements for four-hand and for eight-hand playing, useful in class work.

For the prelude to "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, there is a pianoforte version edited by Rimsky-Korsakov containing descriptive notes in English and in French. There is a version of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" for pianoforte solo by Otto Singer, also a miniature orchestral score.

In "Beethoven the Creator," by Rolland, will be found an outline of the "Eroica," illustrated by facsimiles of the title page and the opening bars of the "Funeral March." Theodore Thomas, in his "Talks About Beethoven's Symphonies," suggests the meaning of "Eroica," explaining it in terms of Greek tragedy of which Beethoven was known to be an admirer. A good summing up of the various interpretations is given in Uptons "Standard Symphonies."

Among other accounts may be mentioned "Stories of Symphonic Music," by Gilman; "Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp; "Symphonic Broadcasts," by Downes; "The Concert-Goer's Library," by Newmarch, and biographies by Bekker, Rolland, Scheuffler and Thayer.

"Moussorgsky," by Montagu-Nathan, considers the historical events underlying the dramatic material of "Khovangtchina" and describes the opening scene of the opera. Another volume of interest is Calvocoressi's biography of Moussorgsky, having for its sub-title, "The Russian Musical Nationalist." Rosenfeld in his "Musical Portraits" devotes a chapter to Moussorgsky and to Richard Strauss as well.

"Modern Composers," by Pannain, is the latest word on Strauss. "Richard Strauss," by Finck, is a much more sympathetic account, intended for the "general reader."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 4 - 193[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Here Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan theatre tomorrow evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's epic Third symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary, Napoleon. When Napoleon had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven, feeling that he had betrayed the cause of freedom, destroyed the dedication. But this monument to the great hero of the composer's imagination remains for the world to admire.

A score which Dr. Koussevitzky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program. Gabriel Pierne's divertisements on a pastoral theme. This piece, which is in reality an entertaining set of variations, has been played n New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz; a blues, introduced by a saxophone solo; and a gigue.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" also will be played. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red square in Moscow. The remaining number, concluding the first part of the program, will be Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

With Wagner for The Pension Fund

Trans Dec 4

ALTHOUGH the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was smaller than that which usually assembles for a Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it established a new high mark in the generosity of its applause. The two balconies and a fair portion of the main floor were filled; some of the higher-priced seats, however, were vacant. Yet those who came gave unstinted approval of the bounteous "all-Wagner" feast which was set before them.

"The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Overture to Tannhäuser" were the particular favorites of the afternoon. The obvious comment would be that the audience was merely running true to form by clapping the loudest for the music which produced the largest volume of sound. At the same time, these items were the most deserving of applause because they were brilliantly played, representing, as they did, conductor and musicians in their most eloquent manner. The turbulent Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which began the program, was an exception to the case. It is not in the active repertory of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, understandably enough, has not found it responsive to the intimate and revealing attention which has made his interpretation of certain ot[illegible] Wagnerian excer[illegible]s so inspiring.

Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" frequently has been memorable. The accuracy and refinement of the Boston Symphony strings makes possible a peculiarly exalted mood—a reverent, spiritual atmosphere seldom approached by other orchestras. Dr. Koussevitzky also plays this music more slowly than most conductors, and yesterday he retarded his beat even beyond what is customary for him in the compositions of Wagner. It was as though the music were evoking an almost static spirituality which would become a permanent part of consciousness.

A similar concentration and restraint were observable in "A Siegfried Idyl," though here tempi and rhythm were more varied. "A Siegfried Idyl" is another of the Wagnerian scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky's performance rises to the higher level of interpretation and revelation. The program also contained portions of the music-drama, "The Twilight of the Gods," which were combined under the title, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey." The performance was notable for the tonal beauty of the strings and the purity of the woodwind voices. There were portions, however, which fell short of the usual Boston Symphony Orchestra standard. It was, in general, an afternoon to glorify the richness of tone and [illegible] suavity of manner of which the Boston musicians are capable. Although in at least two instances ("The Ride of the Valkyries" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser") it provided the noble utterance which is frequently characteristio of the music of Wagner, it avoided confident and full-throated eloquence in favor of fine shading and painstaking care in phrasing.

N. M. J.

Trans

DECEMBER 4, 1933

ns --- Films

Week-End Record Of Concert-Halls

An Oncoming Flood of Carols, The Dialogued Symphony, Fiedler's Discovery

THE musical managements, like the stores, have discovered that Christmas—sometimes known as the Feast of the Nativity—may be turned to pleasure and profit. Hence, as the day draws near, concerts of carols and other Christmas pieces; this December in Boston above the usual. To Jordan Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 22, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 23, come The English Singers who excel in such concerts; draw from a wide repertory; are now the better for new women's voices. In the past in Boston they have ventured one or two such concerts and found an audience.

Over the way at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 21, the Handel and Haydn Society, persuaded once more by Mr. Stone to break from routine, will venture a similar concert with a diversified program and at prices no higher than a dollar. And all this in the face of the time-honored belief that so late in December, Christmas shopping is the only possible entertainment.

To some, however, no singing of Christmas carols and Christmas hymns so truly expresses the time as the "services" at Harvard, what with the reading of St. Luke's narrative of the Holy Night and the united singing of "Adeste, Fideles." (If only the University authorities might add the driving, swelling trumpets.) This December there will be three in the Memorial Church at 8.15 on Monday, Dec. 18, at 4.30 and 8.15 on Tuesday, Dec. 19. This year, in the absence of Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth will assemble the carols and conduct.

Lourié's Experiment

Heard for the first time in Boston at the Symphony Concert of Friday, repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, Monsieur Lourié's "Sinfonia Dialectica" proved more engaging music than his "Liturgical Sonata" of 1931. Furthermore, both audiences received it more warmly than is their habit with experimental music via Paris, from either Russian or French hands. Possibly the rhythmical exhilaration that the "Sinfonia Dialectica" readily generates, kindled this unexpected response. For Monsieur Lourié has followed the earlier, or the middle, Stravinsky in incessant changes of meter; while Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra are practised hands with the play of such changes upon the nerves of an audience. On the other hand, for some hearers, there was reason to doubt whether the performance, in spite of this rhythmical ardor, was as revealing as might be of the form and substance of Monsieur Lourié's piece.

After a first and a second performance of a novel number, such questioning is admittedly speculative—the more when the questioner knows the score only by report of the departmental analyst. None the less, Monsieur Lourié's title clearly indicated a certain form and a certain substance. "Most of the themes," said the Transcript's annotator—old and expert eye at score-reading—"have actual dialogue-form—a motiv or phrase in one instrument or group at once answered by another motiv or phrase in another group or color." It is interesting, he went on, "to trace the logical and organic growth of the music."

Now it may be that Monsieur Lourié, long addicted to cerebral and intricate composition, has written a "Sinfonia" that is more easily understood in print than in sound. Strauss himself has not escaped such error; while many a modernist is easy prey to it. Certainly to one hearer, listening with close attention, came little of the dialogued form or the dialogued substance. Perhaps his ear and mind twice went dull; perhaps the quick traffic of the concert-hall betrayed him. As it was, he could agree only that Monsieur Lourié had made an interesting and at moments impressive experiment in symphonic composition—an experiment that altogether justified performance; while about the nature and outcome of that experiment he was by no means clear.

At every turn, besides, the performance suggested a music too vitalized to exist merely on score-paper. True, Monsieur Lourié is by no means averse to propounding a theory and then writing a music to fit and exemplify it; but more than once the "Sinfonia Dialectica" seems born of imaginative as well as intellectual prompting. On the other hand the composer's citing of a paragraph from Pascal as the subject of his "spiritual meditation" while he was at work on the "Sinfonia" was hardly illuminating. For most of us, if we have any sensibility, the "spiritual" quality of a given music exhales from it and guide-posts are superfluous. Surely the interest and the impression of this experimental "Sinfonia" were from mind to mind and not from spirit to spirit. When an idea for composition was floating through Verdi's head, he liked to say that he would make some music about it. Monsieur Lourié might profitably "meditate" on this saying as well as Pascal's, and leave "spirituality" to care for itself.

Post

DAY, DECEMBER 4,

SYMPHONY IN PENSION CONCERT

All Wagner List for First of Affairs for Fund

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Offering a programme drawn wholly from the music of Wagner, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra gave, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, the first of the season's concerts in aid of the orchestra's Pension Fund, and, mirabile dictu, played to several rows of empty seats.

ENTHUSIASM IN AUDIENCE

The reason for this rare and unwelcome phenomenon was clear enough. The concert had been announced, then cancelled, and a bare week ago announced today. But for this circumstance, hard times or no hard times, the hall undoubtedly would have been filled. But the audience of yesterday, which for many concerts would be accounted a large one, developed a high degree of enthusiasm at the end of the first number on the programme, the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and maintained that enthusiasm until the end, with the result that, at the conclusion of every piece, Dr. Koussevitzky was obliged to have his players rise and bow in acknowledgement of the applause.

Not much given to experimenting in the matter of Wagnerian programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky offered yesterday a list of stock excerpts from the operas and music-dramas, plus the "Siegfried Idyl."

Connects Excerpts

For the first time here, if memory serves, he conducted yesterday the triple fragment that includes Siegfried's ascent and gaining of Brunnhilde's rock in "Siegfried," passes to the music that paints the coming of dawn in the first act of "Gotterdammerung," includes a few pages of the subsequent duet between Siegfried and Brunnhilde, and ends with the musical description of Siegfried's journey down the Rhine. Oddly enough, the programme yesterday specified only the Rhine-Journey, and the uninitiated listener must have felt the first part of the music singularly undescriptive of such adventure. For the rest, there were the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," as above mentioned, and to "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The "Idyl" Notable

The most notable performance of the afternoon was that of the "Siegfried Idyl." The rare eloquence which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men consistently achieved here was often present in the playing of the other numbers; in particular, Dr. Koussevitzky proved himself sympathetic to the joint excerpt from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," although it was to be wished that the trombones had had a rounder, more organ-like tone when they made their celebrated entrance in the Rhine-Journey. The Wagnerian purist might also have objected that brass and percussion were over-strenuous in the two overtures, that the "Ride of the Valkyries" was hurried, and the "Lohengrin" Prelude dragged.

Yet, in each case, Dr. Koussevitzky's departure from tradition gained an undeniable effect, and an effect which his audience of yesterday plainly relished.

LT'S YULE TREE

---

ounted to $375.

Globe MUSIC Dec 4

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music by Richard Wagner filled the program of the special concert which Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund. This fund is used to care for retired members of the orchestra. The audience was very large and demonstrative of its pleasure.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was followed by the prelude to "Lohengrin," four excerpts from "The Ring of the Nibelungen," "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyries," "Siegfried's Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried," and the orchestral portions of "The Dusk of the Gods" called "Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey." There were also "A Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Richard Wagner was a favored son of the gods, one of a few musical colossi, the greatest composer of music dramas whom the world has known. All this has been said before. It will be said again, for in this careless, hurried day, when the general sense of esthetic values is sadly out of balance, it is well to reconsider the worth of great men of the past. Apart from the vast number of innovations which Wagner introduced into the technique of writing for orchestra, an achievement which still inspires wonder, he had an incredibly fertile gift for inventing musical themes.

Consider the eight fragments heard yesterday, only a very small part of Wagner's greatest music. Here are to be found melody after melody, harmonic sequences in profusion, differing in character and substance, yet all bearing the imprint of Wagner's inimitable style. All these express a wide variety of emotions and ideas, from the most subtle to the most elemental; nearly all bear that indefinable validity, the sense of a distinctive and completed utterance that proclaims them creations of genius. Wagner srowed the breadth of his imagination when he penned "The Flying Dutchman," whose best parts are in essence as truly Wagnerian as anything he wrote later.

In the years that followed he developed these powers as an athlete develops already sound muscles. "Tristan" and all that followed reveal Wagner's creative powers at their full, working through a unified and refined style. The progress of this growth is shown plainly in the music that Dr Koussevitzky read so marvelously yesterday.

It is beyond understanding how any, who really comprehend the immensity of Wagner's genius, can speak of him patronizingly, as do certain of the musical intelligentsia today. Surely their enthusiasm for all that is up-to-the-minute has distorted their perspective of the past.

Only an everemphasis of the brass instruments marred Dr Koussevitzky's interpretations. Otherwise the performances were of the splendor that can come but from one of the finest orchestras in the world. C. W. D.

Experience Indicated

"My dad must have got into all sorts of mischief when he was a boy."

"What makes you think so?"

"He knows exactly what questions to ask me when he wants to find out what I've been doing."—Border Cities Star.

Herald Dec 4

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Wagner Program: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "The Dusk of the Gods," The Ride of the Valkyries, A Siegfried Idyll, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Yesterday's concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, brought a large audience to Symphony hall, though not large enough for such a cause. There were many new, but too few familiar faces to be seen. Perhaps the regular subscribers generously bought tickets and sent friends who usually find it impossible to attend. We would not misjudge them.

At all events, there was no lack of enthusiasm during the concert, and, particularly, after The Ride of the Valkyries, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhaueser," the end of which has been described by one of the most ardent Wagner enthusiasts, as "successful bad music." Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled many times and never failed to share the warm applause with his orchestra.

There were great moments in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which was given a highly dramatic interpretation, and there were moments of exceptional beauty in the Siegfried Idyll. It would, however, be obviously unfair to all concerned, to say that yesterday's concert came up to the magnificent achievements we expect from the Boston Symphony orchestra. Weather conditions were not auspicious for orchestral instruments, but there were too many lapses from our orchestra's impeccable intonation and too many evidences that the concert had been inadequately rehearsed. The "Lohengrin" prelude was ragged and taken at a pace that in no way increased its effectiveness. There was arid, as well as beautiful, playing, in Siegfried's Rhine Journey and, in other numbers, passages where an unusual lack of balance between the choirs was only too evident, the strings being more than once completely overpowered by the brasses.

When shall the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its crowded schedule, find time to rehearse extra concerts? That we do not know. We do know that our appreciation of this great orchestra and its great leader would be worthless if we should fail to mention yesterday's shortcomings.

al big screen production.

Hold Benefit Concert Today at Symphony ---Music Notes

Post Dec 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"Off again, on again" is the history of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert, originally announced for this afternoon, then postponed and finally restored to the original date. As previously reported, the programme, made wholly from the music of Wagner, includes the Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the three-part excerpt that begins with Siegfried's ascent of Brunnhilde's rock in "Siegfried," touches upon the scene between Siegfried and Brunnhilde in "The Dusk of the Gods" and ends with Siegfried's passage down the Rhine from that music-drama.

* * * *

It is good to hear that Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat, at the Symphony concerts of this week, Mahler's Ninth Symphony, a tremendously impressive work by a still over-neglected and underestimated composer, to which he had the distinction of giving the American premiere two seasons ago. We also owe to Dr. Koussevitzky the first Bostonian hearings of Mahler's beautiful "Song of the Earth," and he has promised us at some unspecified date the American premiere of the Sixth, so-called "Tragic" Symphony. There still remain unplayed in this city the Third, Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies, while the Second and Fifth have not been heard here in years.

* * * *

Though not from Symphony Hall, the report comes that another world premiere, to take place at the Symphony Concerts during the present season, will be that of the American composer, Emerson Whithorne's Suite, "Moon Trail," the four divisions of which are, respectively, entitled "Death Valley," "The Devil's Kitchen," "Palos Verdes" and "Surf at Malibu." Promising subject matter, at least.

Dec 5

the morning after

Boston Symphony

Tonight at eight-fifteen the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct Beethoven's epic Third symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary, Napoleon.

A score which Dr. Koussevitsky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program: Gabriel Pierne's Divertisments on a Pastoral Theme. This piece, which is in reality an entertaining set of variations has been played in New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz, a "blues" which is introduced by a saxophone solo with a symphony orchestra.

The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina", will also be heard. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. Concluding the first part of the program will be Richard Strauss' mumerous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".

Tickets for the concert at the usual student rate were placed on sale yesterday afternoon in room 3, at "36 Prospect". The few remaining tickets may be obtained there or by consulting Professor Coolidge. We have every reason to believe that the concert will be a pleasing one, considering the great variety of musical types offered in the program.

Post

DAY, DECEMBER 4,

SYMPHONY IN PENSION CONCERT

All Wagner List for First of Affairs for Fund

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Offering a programme drawn wholly from the music of Wagner, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra gave, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, the first of the season's concerts in aid of the orchestra's Pension Fund, and, mirabile dictu, played to several rows of empty seats.

ENTHUSIASM IN AUDIENCE

The reason for this rare and unwelcome phenomenon was clear enough. The concert had been announced, then cancelled, and a bare week ago announced today. But for this circumstance, hard times or no hard times, the hall undoubtedly would have been filled. But the audience of yesterday, which for many concerts would be accounted a large one, developed a high degree of enthusiasm at the end of the first number on the programme, the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and maintained that enthusiasm until the end, with the result that, at the conclusion of every piece, Dr. Koussevitzky was obliged to have his players rise and bow in acknowledgement of the applause.

Not much given to experimenting in the matter of Wagnerian programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky offered yesterday a list of stock excerpts from the operas and music-dramas, plus the "Siegfried Idyl."

Connects Excerpts

For the first time here, if memory serves, he conducted yesterday the triple fragment that includes Siegfried's ascent and gaining of Brunnhilde's rock in "Siegfried," passes to the music that paints the coming of dawn in the first act of "Gotterdammerung," includes a few pages of the subsequent duet between Siegfried and Brunnhilde, and ends with the musical description of Siegfried's journey down the Rhine. Oddly enough, the programme yesterday specified only the Rhine-Journey, and the uninitiated listener must have felt the first part of the music singularly undescriptive of such adventure. For the rest, there were the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," as above mentioned, and to "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The "Idyl" Notable

The most notable performance of the afternoon was that of the "Siegfried Idyl." The rare eloquence which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men consistently achieved here was often present in the playing of the other numbers; in particular, Dr. Koussevitzky proved himself sympathetic to the joint excerpt from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," although it was to be wished that the trombones had had a rounder, more organ-like tone when they made their celebrated entrance in the Rhine-Journey. The Wagnerian purist might also have objected that brass and percussion were over-strenuous in the two overtures, that the "Ride of the Valkyries" was hurried, and the "Lohengrin" Prelude dragged.

Yet, in each case, Dr. Koussevitzky's departure from tradition gained an undeniable effect, and an effect which his audience of yesterday plainly relished.

LT'S YULE TREE

---

to $375.

Globe MUSIC Dec 4

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music by Richard Wagner filled the program of the special concert which Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund. This fund is used to care for retired members of the orchestra. The audience was very large and demonstrative of its pleasure.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was followed by the prelude to "Lohengrin," four excerpts from "The Ring of the Nibelungen," "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyries," "Siegfried's Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried," and the orchestral portions of "The Dusk of the Gods" called "Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey." There were also "A Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Richard Wagner was a favored son of the gods, one of a few musical colossi, the greatest composer of music dramas whom the world has known. All this has been said before. It will be said again, for in this careless, hurried day, when the general sense of esthetic values is sadly out of balance, it is well to reconsider the worth of great men of the past. Apart from the vast number of innovations which Wagner introduced into the technique of writing for orchestra, an achievement which still inspires wonder, he had an incredibly fertile gift for inventing musical themes.

Consider the eight fragments heard yesterday, only a very small part of Wagner's greatest music. Here are to be found melody after melody, harmonic sequences in profusion, differing in character and substance, yet all bearing the imprint of Wagner's inimitable style. All these express a wide variety of emotions and ideas, from the most subtle to the most elemental; nearly all bear that indefinable validity, the sense of a distinctive and completed utterance that proclaims them creations of genius. Wagner srowed the breadth of his imagination when he penned "The Flying Dutchman," whose best parts are in essence as truly Wagnerian as anything he wrote later.

In the years that followed he developed these powers as an athlete develops already sound muscles. "Tristan" and all that followed reveal Wagner's creative powers at their full, working through a unified and refined style. The progress of this growth is shown plainly in the music that Dr Koussevitzky read so marvelously yesterday.

It is beyond understanding how any, who really comprehend the immensity of Wagner's genius, can speak of him patronizingly, as do certain of the musical intelligentsia today. Surely their enthusiasm for all that is up-to-the-minute has distorted their perspective of the past.

Only an overemphasis of the brass instruments marred Dr Koussevitzky's interpretations. Otherwise the performances were of the splendor that can come but from one of the finest orchestras in the world.

C. W. D.

Experience Indicated

"My dad must have got into all sorts of mischief when he was a boy."

"What makes you think so?"

"He knows exactly what questions to ask me when he wants to find out what I've been doing."—Border Cities Star.

Herald Dec 4

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Wagner Program: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "The Dusk of the Gods," The Ride of the Valkyries, A Siegfried Idyll, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Yesterday's concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, brought a large audience to Symphony hall, though not large enough for such a cause. There were many new, but too few familiar faces to be seen. Perhaps the regular subscribers generously bought tickets and sent friends who usually find it impossible to attend. We would not misjudge them.

At all events, there was no lack of enthusiasm during the concert, and, particularly, after The Ride of the Valkyries, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser," the end of which has been described by one of the most ardent Wagner enthusiasts, as "successful bad music." Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled many times and never failed to share the warm applause with his orchestra.

There were great moments in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which was given a highly dramatic interpretation, and there were moments of exceptional beauty in the Siegfried Idyll. It would, however, be obviously unfair to all concerned, to say that yesterday's concert came up to the magnificent achievements we expect from the Boston Symphony orchestra. Weather conditions were not auspicious for orchestral instruments, but there were too many lapses from our orchestra's impeccable intonation and too many evidences that the concert had been inadequately rehearsed. The "Lohengrin" prelude was ragged and taken at a pace that in no way increased its effectiveness. There was arid, as well as beautiful, playing, in Siegfried's Rhine Journey and, in other numbers, passages where an unusual lack of balance between the choirs was only too evident, the strings being more than once completely overpowered by the brasses.

When shall the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its crowded schedule, find time to rehearse extra concerts? That we do not know. We do know that our appreciation of this great orchestra and its great leader would be worthless if we should fail to mention yesterday's shortcomings.

---

al big screen production.

Hold Benefit Concert Today at Symphony ---Music Notes

Post. — Dec. 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"Off again, on again" is the history of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert, originally announced for this afternoon, then postponed and finally restored to the original date. As previously reported, the programme, made wholly from the music of Wagner, includes the Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the three-part excerpt that begins with Siegfried's ascent of Brunnhilde's rock in "Siegfried," touches upon the scene between Siegfried and Brunnhilde in "The Dusk of the Gods" and ends with Siegfried's passage down the Rhine from that music-drama.

* * * *

It is good to hear that Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat, at the Symphony concerts of this week, Mahler's Ninth Symphony, a tremendously impressive work by a still over-neglected and underestimated composer, to which he had the distinction of giving the American premiere two seasons ago. We also owe to Dr. Koussevitzky the first Bostonian hearings of Mahler's beautiful "Song of the Earth," and he has promised us at some unspecified date the American premiere of the Sixth, so-called "Tragic" Symphony. There still remain unplayed in this city the Third, Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies, while the Second and Fifth have not been heard here in years.

* * * *

Though not from Symphony Hall, the report comes that another world premiere, to take place at the Symphony Concerts during the present season, will be that of the American composer, Emerson Whithorne's Suite, "Moon Trail," the four divisions of which are, respectively, entitled "Death Valley," "The Devil's Kitchen," "Palos Verdes" and "Surf at Malibu." Promising subject matter, at least.

Dec 5

the morning after

Boston Symphony

Tonight at eight-fifteen the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct Beethoven's epic Third symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary, Napoleon.

A score which Dr. Koussevitsky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program: Gabriel Pierne's Divertisments on a Pastoral Theme. This piece, which is in reality an entertaining set of variations has been played in New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz, a "blues" which is introduced by a saxophone solo with a symphony orchestra.

The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina", will also be heard. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. Concluding the first part of the program will be Richard Strauss' mumerous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".

Tickets for the concert at the usual student rate were placed on sale yesterday afternoon in room 3, at "36 Prospect". The few remaining tickets may be obtained there or by consulting Professor Coolidge. We have every reason to believe that the concert will be a pleasing one, considering the great variety of musical types offered in the program.

ILY HERALD, WEDNESDAY, DECE

Dec 6

the morning after

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the current Providence season last night at the Metropolitan Theatre, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting. We may best characterize this program as intensely interesting and pleasing from every angle. The numbers presented were of a wide variety, even more diverse than is usually the case. Most of the types of orchestral music were played, ranging from a Beethoven symphony through the modern French work of Piere to the highly descriptive music of Moussorgsky and Strauss. The program in general and each of the numbers in particular were pleasing and resulted in a very finished concert.

The symphony of the evening was the Third of Beethoven, in E-flat major, commonly called the "Eroica". Every student of the music appreciation courses has studied this work, so it is not necessary to give in detail the description of the various movements Indeed, it would be scarcely possible to give a story for the work that would suit every one, for there are as many ideas as to the structure as there are interpreters. In general, however, the story is that of the Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte, the idol of Beethoven as well as several other composers. The symphony is distinguished for its second movement, a funeral march. In addition there is a most pleasing third movement which calls into play some lighter effects, and which was played exceptionally well last evening.

The second part of the program, opening with Pierne's "Divertisement on a Pastoral Theme", was composed of works in a more modern style. Indeed, the piece just mentioned was composed in 1931 and is so modern as to include a saxophone solo. In this number the Orchestra approached as close to modern jazz as it is possible for a symphony orchestra to get. That statement may seem over-drawn, but those of us who heard the concert must admit that there were sections of this number that sounded strangely like the modern orchestrations for such groups as Whiteman's and Westfall's. But don't get the idea that I mean to imply that Dr. Koussevitsky is making a dance band of his orchestra. Far from it. He simply presented a modern piece.

The prelude to the opera "Khovonstchina" by Moussorgsky was as finely drawn a number as one could wish to hear. Descriptive of the sunrise over the Red Square in Moscow, this number leaves us with a glow, and a sense of peace. It is the sort of number of which one would buy a victrola record to be able to enjoy it again and again.

In the last piece, Dr. Koussevitsky showed a neat sense of humor by balancing the first work, the symphony based on Napoleon, with a light airy thing based on a practical joker. Richard Strauss himself did not think it wise to name all the "jokes" perpetrated by the hero of the piece, but he left to our own imaginations the enjoyable task of deciding just what the merry fellow was doing at any given moment. The story finally ends with the hanging of the poor chap, a deed completed only after several attempts. Anyhow, the name of the piece is "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner—in rondo form".

Brown Symphony

Just a word as a reminder that our own Orchestra will present a concert in Faunce House tomorrow evening. Tickets are reasonably priced, and there is no reason why a good proportion of the audience should not be Brown men.

J. E. F., Jr.

PLAN FOR

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

DEC 5 - 1933

For the Attention Of Music Lovers

All music lovers who are interested in furthering their acquaintance with the works of an indisputably great—but seldom heard—composer, please note this opportunity.

Petitions to Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, requesting him to present more of the major works of Jean Sibelius on his remaining visits here this season may be conveniently signed by anyone interested at the following places: The bulletin board just inside the Fine Arts and Music Room, second floor, the Enoch Pratt Library, Cathedral St., and at the desk of the Peabody Institute Library, Mt. Vernon Place.

To anyone who might neglect to sign because they supposed such a petition will have no effect upon Dr. Koussevitzky, let me say that his manager told me that Dr. Koussevitzky played Sibelius' Second Symphony at his last concert because he had received a number of individual requests for a Sibelius composition.

P. S. HENSEL JR.
2922 Presstman St.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 6 - 1933

Emerson Whithorne

LOOKS like a great season ahead for the local composer, Emerson Whithorne. One of his compositions will have a world premiere by the Cincinnati orchestra, another by the Boston Symphony orchestra and now comes word that his "Saturday's Child," for soprano, tenor and a chamber orchestra will be performed Dec. 15 at Budapest, under the direction of Lajos Shuk. This was heard once in Paris under Walter Strarum.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1933

CHILDREN TO ATTEND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two children in the Saturday and Sunday night classes at the Recreation Center, sponsored by the Council of Jewish Women, will be guests of the council at a Civic Music association concert Monday at which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play. The children will be chosen for their ability and interest in music.

The center's largest attendance for the year was 240, which number attended a boy and girl social Saturday. Eighty children already have made use of the branch library which has been at the center for two weeks through a loan of books by the Public library.

Minnie Shapiro is chairman of the Sunday night class council. Other officers are: Secretary, Ruth Sobel; treasurer, Lillian Graffin; members-at-large, Sonia Mowshovitz, Sylvia Boorky, Evedyn Freedman, Betty Colbert, Shirley Grace and Blanche Ostrow.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
DEC 6 - 1933

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra had further proof last night of the welcome which Providence always has for them. As soon as the brilliant maestro advanced from the wings toward the podium, he was greeted with applause which lasted for some minutes, and to which he was graciously responsive.

The concert was the first he has given in the Metropolitan Theatre, which is capable of holding a far larger audience than either of the two houses used for these concerts previously. To that fact, or perhaps to the prohibition celebrations, was due the number of empty seats—a phenomenon never before witnessed by this writer. But even if there were some empty seats, the number actually occupied was probably greater than the seating capacity of the other auditoria alluded to.

* * *

The program was varied, but notable in these days for the absence of any truly modern music, since Richard Strauss and his "Till Eulenspiegel" are now established as classicist by the younger generations. There were, however, two compositions which were new to Providence, these being "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," by Pierne, a work of great ingenuity and much charm, and the "Prelude to Khovanstchina" by Moussorgsky, whom most able critics today rate as the most gifted of all the Russian composers. He ended a life sadly marred by bad habits without having accomplished anything like all he might have done according to so great an authority as Rimsky Korsakov. But he accomplished a great deal nevertheless, and the opera of which we heard the prelude last night is not the least worthy of praise.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky opened with the famous "Eroica" symphony, that work which Beethoven himself preferred among all the immortal nine. It is, as all music lovers are expected to know, a work inspired by Beethoven's conception of Napoleon, the life-story of a hero. At least, so it is generally interpreted. But like the equally famous Fifth Symphony, it is susceptible of many another interpretation, and for ourselves we prefer to regard it as absolute music into the enjoyment of which we may enter without trying to translate its content into any terminology of realistic experience. Nevertheless it is true that when we recall really great performances of it, notably two by Toscanini, we find ourselves rising to the heroic mood. That was not the mood of Dr. Koussevitzky's performance last night; there was neither the customary color nor sense of adventure in the opening movement, and the funeral march, though lovely and impressive for its purely classic reading, was lacking in majesty. And majesty was the heart of Beethoven's genius. The last two movements were far more spirited, solely, we think, because the conductor and his men had become warmed up to their own best work. Which makes us wonder why it was chosen to occupy first place on the program. We must hear Dr. Koussevitzky play it again.

* * *

Of the two compositions which we heard for the first time in Providence, that of Moussorgsky made the more indelible impression. It was most subtly and beautifully timed, with all that virtuosity of which Dr. Koussevitzky is so brilliant an exemplar, especially when playing Slavic music. There was here a matchless tone and a fascinating phrasing that enthralled us. Behind it all was the deep tragic sense which seems to inhere in the finest Slavic genius. It came after the Pierne pastoral like a dramatic lyric by Browning after a poem by Sir John Suckling. Indeed there was in the pastoral not a little which reminded us of those accomplishments of the poets of the restoration who were equally at home with Chloe in a glade and Bess in a scullery. It was altogether delightful.

* * *

As for "Till," Dr. Koussevitzky gave that interpretation which has become so familiar to us, a subtle and insinuating one which, as has been said here before, is more akin to the humor of Anatole France than to the robust, rollicking and boisterous Teutonic story of Till's merry pranks. Through the whole concert, the various choirs of instruments were superbly satisfactory.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 6 1933

Boston Symphony Concerts Opened

First Offering of Season in Providence Applauded by Large Audience.

A program of which the principal number was the great Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," opened the Boston Symphony orchestra series for the season last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. In new surroundings, with a list of selections worthy of the orchestra's highest traditions, this initial offering of a season by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has many aspects of extraordinary interest, and it is gratifying to note that the audience of fine proportions registered not merely approval but unrestrained enthusiasm throughout the evening.

Rhode Island music lovers have heard this great band of players year after year in old Infantry Hall, in the Albee Theatre, and now at the Metropolitan. The verdict necessarily is that no matter where it plays it remains as great as ever. Its illustrious conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the most famous of its long line of eminent conductors, is always the consummate artist, and the individual artists, all musicians of fine abilities, are unaffected by the circumstances of time or place. It was the great ensemble to which its hearers have become accustomed, an aggregation of players of which Boston and the whole nation have a full right to be proud.

The symphony, of course, was interpreted with the skill and intelligence to be expected of Dr. Koussevitzky, and played with sympathy and surpassing beauty by the orchestra. The towering genius of Beethoven is evident through it all, and it remains, as it has been since it was produced by the master, one of the great musical compositions of all time.

The other numbers on a finely arranged program were Pierne's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme," the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Strauss.

The orchestra and its director were given a splendid ovation before the opening number and Dr. Koussevitzky was unable to begin the concert for some moments, until the enthusiastic applause had ended.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 6 1933

Paul Althouse and Elsa Alsen are to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra later in the season in Wagner excerpts. Elsa Alsen has been heard in our local Community Concert course and Mr. Althouse is engaged for the final concert in this season's series.

ILY HERALD, WEDNESDAY, DECEM

Dec 6

the morning after

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the current Providence season last night at the Metropolitan Theatre, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting. We may best characterize this program as intensely interesting and pleasing from every angle. The numbers presented were of a wide variety, even more diverse than is usually the case. Most of the types of orchestral music were played, ranging from a Beethoven symphony through the modern French work of Piere to the highly descriptive music of Moussorgsky and Strauss. The program in general and each of the numbers in particular were pleasing and resulted in a very finished concert.

The symphony of the evening was the Third of Beethoven, in E-flat major, commonly called the "Eroica". Every student of the music appreciation courses has studied this work, so it is not necessary to give in detail the description of the various movements Indeed, it would be scarcely possible to give a story for the work that would suit every one, for there are as many ideas as to the structure as there are interpreters. In general, however, the story is that of the Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte, the idol of Beethoven as well as several other composers. The symphony is distinguished for its second movement, a funeral march. In addition there is a most pleasing third movement which calls into play some lighter effects, and which was played exceptionally well last evening.

The second part of the program, opening with Pierne's "Divertisement on a Pastoral Theme", was composed of works in a more modern style. Indeed, the piece just mentioned was composed in 1931 and is so modern as to include a saxophone solo. In this number the Orchestra approached as close to modern jazz as it is possible for a symphony orchestra to get. That statement may seem over-drawn, but those of us who heard the concert must admit that there were sections of this number that sounded strangely like the modern orchestrations for such groups as Whiteman's and Westfall's. But don't get the idea that I mean to imply that Dr. Koussevitsky is making a dance band of his orchestra. Far from it. He simply presented a modern piece.

The prelude to the opera "Khovonstchina" by Moussorgsky was as finely drawn a number as one could wish to hear. Descriptive of the sunrise over the Red Square in Moscow, this number leaves us with a glow, and a sense of peace. It is the sort of number of which one would buy a victrola record to be able to enjoy it again and again.

In the last piece, Dr. Koussevitsky showed a neat sense of humor by balancing the first work, the symphony based on Napoleon, with a light airy thing based on a practical joker. Richard Strauss himself did not think it wise to name all the "jokes" perpetrated by the hero of the piece, but he left to our own imaginations the enjoyable task of deciding just what the merry fellow was doing at any given moment. The story finally ends with the hanging of the poor chap, a deed completed only after several attempts. Anyhow, the name of the piece is "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner—in rondo form".

Brown Symphony

Just a word as a reminder that our own Orchestra will present a concert in Faunce House tomorrow evening. Tickets are reasonably priced, and there is no reason why a good proportion of the audience should not be Brown men.

J. E. F., Jr.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

DEC 5 - 1933

For the Attention Of Music Lovers

All music lovers who are interested in furthering their acquaintance with the works of an indisputably great—but seldom heard—composer, please note this opportunity.

Petitions to Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, requesting him to present more of the major works of Jean Sibelius on his remaining visits here this season may be conveniently signed by anyone interested at the following places: The bulletin board just inside the Fine Arts and Music Room, second floor, the Enoch Pratt Library, Cathedral St., and at the desk of the Peabody Institute Library, Mt. Vernon Place.

To anyone who might neglect to sign because they supposed such a petition will have no effect upon Dr. Koussevitzky, let me say that his manager told me that Dr. Koussevitzky played Sibelius' Second Symphony at his last concert because he had received a number of individual requests for a Sibelius composition.

P. S. HENSEL JR.
2922 Presstman St.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC

Emerson Whithorne

LOOKS like a great season ahead for the local composer, Emerson Whithorne. One of his compositions will have a world premiere by the Cincinnati orchestra, another by the Boston Symphony orchestra and now comes word that his "Saturday's Child," for soprano, tenor and a chamber orchestra will be performed Dec. 15 at Budapest, under the direction of Lajos Shuk. This was heard once in Paris under Walter Strarum.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1933

CHILDREN TO ATTEND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two children in the Saturday and Sunday night classes at the Recreation Center, sponsored by the Council of Jewish Women, will be guests of the council at a Civic Music association concert Monday at which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play. The children will be chosen for their ability and interest in music.

The center's largest attendance for the year was 240, which number attended a boy and girl social Saturday. Eighty children already have made use of the branch library which has been at the center for two weeks through a loan of books by the Public library.

Minnie Shapiro is chairman of the Sunday night class council. Other officers are: Secretary, Ruth Sobel; treasurer, Lillian Graffin; members-at-large, Sonia Mowshovitz, Sylvia Boorky, Evedyn Freedman, Betty Colbert, Shirley Grace and Blanche Ostrow.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

6 - 1933

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra had further proof last night of the welcome which Providence always has for them. As soon as the brilliant maestro advanced from the wings toward the podium, he was greeted with applause which lasted for some minutes, and to which he was graciously responsive.

The concert was the first he has given in the Metropolitan Theatre, which is capable of holding a far larger audience than either of the two houses used for these concerts previously. To that fact, or perhaps to the prohibition celebrations, was due the number of empty seats—a phenomenon never before witnessed by this writer. But even if there were some empty seats, the number actually occupied was probably greater than the seating capacity of the other auditoria alluded to.

* * *

The program was varied, but notable in these days for the absence of any truly modern music, since Richard Strauss and his "Till Eulenspiegel" are now established as classicist by the younger generations. There were, however, two compositions which were new to Providence, these being "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," by Pierne, a work of great ingenuity and much charm, and the "Prelude to Khovanstchina" by Moussorgsky, whom most able critics today rate as the most gifted of all the Russian composers. He ended a life sadly marred by bad habits without having accomplished anything like all he might have done according to so great an authority as Rimsky Korsakov. But he accomplished a great deal nevertheless, and the opera of which we heard the prelude last night is not the least worthy of praise.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky opened with the famous "Eroica" symphony, that work which Beethoven himself preferred among all the immortal nine. It is, as all music lovers are expected to know, a work inspired by Beethoven's conception of Napoleon, the life-story of a hero. At least, so it is generally interpreted. But like the equally famous Fifth Symphony, it is susceptible of many another interpretation, and for ourselves we prefer to regard it as absolute music into the enjoyment of which we may enter without trying to translate its content into any terminology of realistic experience. Nevertheless it is true that when we recall really great performances of it, notably two by Toscanini, we find ourselves rising to the heroic mood. That was not the mood of Dr. Koussevitzky's performance last night; there was neither the customary color nor sense of adventure in the opening movement, and the funeral march, though lovely and impressive for its purely classic reading, was lacking in majesty. And majesty was the heart of Beethoven's genius. The last two movements were far more spirited, solely, we think, because the conductor and his men had become warmed up to their own best work. Which makes us wonder why it was chosen to occupy first place on the program. We must hear Dr. Koussevitzky play it again.

* * *

Of the two compositions which we heard for the first time in Providence, that of Moussorgsky made the more indelible impression. It was most subtly and beautifully timed, with all that virtuosity of which Dr. Koussevitzky is so brilliant an exemplar, especially when playing Slavic music. There was here a matchless tone and a fascinating phrasing that enthralled us. Behind it all was the deep tragic sense which seems to inhere in the finest Slavic genius. It came after the Pierne pastoral like a dramatic lyric by Browning after a poem by Sir John Suckling. Indeed there was in the pastoral not a little which reminded us of those accomplishments of the poets of the restoration who were equally at home with Chloe in a glade and Bess in a scullery. It was altogether delightful.

* * *

As for "Till," Dr. Koussevitzky gave that interpretation which has become so familiar to us, a subtle and insinuating one which, as has been said here before, is more akin to the humor of Anatole France than to the robust, rollicking and boisterous Teutonic story of Till's merry pranks. Through the whole concert, the various choirs of instruments were superbly satisfactory.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 6 1933

Boston Symphony Concerts Opened

First Offering of Season in Providence Applauded by Large Audience.

A program of which the principal number was the great Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," opened the Boston Symphony orchestra series for the season last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. In new sursoundings, with a list of selections worthy of the orchestra's highest traditions, this initial offering of a season by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had many aspects of extraordinary interest, and it is gratifying to note that the audience of fine proportions registered not merely approval but unrestrained enthusiasm throughout the evening.

Rhode Island music lovers have heard this great band of players year after year in old Infantry Hall, in the Albee Theatre, and now at the Metropolitan. The verdict necessarily is that no matter where it plays it remains as great as ever. Its illustrious conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the most famous of its long line of eminent conductors, is always the consummate artist, and the individual artists, all musicians of fine abilities, are unaffected by the circumstances of time or place. It was the great ensemble to which its hearers have become accustomed, an aggregation of players of which Boston and the whole nation have a full right to be proud.

The symphony, of course, was interpreted with the skill and intelligence to be expected of Dr. Koussevitzky, and played with sympathy and surpassing beauty by the orchestra. The towering genius of Beethoven is evident through it all, and it remains, as it has been since it was produced by the master, one of the great musical compositions of all time.

The other numbers on a finely arranged program were Pierne's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme," the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of Strauss.

The orchestra and its director were given a splendid ovation before the opening number and Dr. Koussevitzky was unable to begin the concert for some moments, until the enthusiastic applause had ended.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

6 1933

Paul Althouse and Elsa Alsen are to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra later in the season in Wagner excerpts. Elsa Alsen has been heard in our local Community Concert course and Mr. Althouse is engaged for the final concert in this season's series.

Dec 6 Providence Journal

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First of Its Season's Concerts Here Under Direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky at Metropolitan Theatre

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the magnetic leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky gave the first of its season's concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre last night.

It has always seemed that the last musical impression, being more fresh in the recollection, was the most vivid. Upon a recent appearance of the world famous orchestra in this theatre which is still new to us, many voices offered the ignoble sentiment "What other orchestra can ever equal this?" At that time this writer ventured the suggestion that there need be no concern regarding the volume or artistic subtleties of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This prediction was amply justified by the concert of last night. It cannot be said that past appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have ever been lacking in those splendid qualities which make it one of the finest orchestras of the world. Nor is this the time or place in which to proclaim those qualities which make it superior to any other orchestra we hear, or to place in high relief those soloists who by reason of superlative richness of tone quality or brilliance of technical dexterity deserve special claim to virtuosity.

The transference of this orchestra to another theatre has not made it materially better, but it may have made us more appreciative of its superb qualities. We have basked for so long in the refulgence of orchestral perfection that we have grown accustomed to it and we have welcomed another which, although it differs somewhat in kind, is nevertheless a glory of similar grandeur.

The way of this orchestra with this symphony, Beethoven's Thirce, was as one would expect. Under Dr. Koussevitzsky's watchful direction the melodic beauties of this beautiful and noble work were unfolded with consummate artistry and musical character. From the first impressive and commanding fortes of the symphony to the upbuilding of the last massive chords of the work, the gem-like beauties of Beethoven's masterpiece received glowing and faithful interpretation. Attention is directed to the delicate nuance of the 'cellos as soft and appealing as the sighing of the wind, as they revealed the exquisite variants of the major theme of the symphony. The flute was rich in its individual timbre and voice in its occasional utterances. One almost said "this flute" for this writer knows none other like it in the entire range of orchestral offerings. This voice is one of those which makes this orchestra doubly famous. Nor do we hear any string section which surpasses this of last night, in points of tonal richness, refinement of nuance, delicacy of expression and vitality of musical life and light.

Classicists of the past generation might well rejoice in the freshness and eloquence of musical speech released by this incomparable orchestra at Dr. Koussevitzsky's hands; those of the present may well adopt this rendition as authoritative and as satisfying all possible requirements of orchestral coloration and exposition.

Never has this writer heard Dr. Koussevitzsky so poetic and persuasive with his Beethoven, never the orchestra more at one with him in classic interpretation.

After the chaste nobility of Beethoven, hardly anything would sound as well; all else would necessarily be at some disadvantage by contrast, yet, as revealed by this potent and eloquent orchestra, Pierne's "Divertissements Upon a Pastoral Theme" came as a classic novelty which quite captivated the audience. The long and involved theme beautifully announced by Louis Speyer's English horn, which we have learned to know and love so well, commanded instant attention and admiration.

This was followed by the string orchestra in massive legato and followed by pleasing variations in free transcription. This yielded to the brass choir with crisp trumpets from a magnificent long crescendo and terminated in an extremely jazzy saltarello full of rhythmic verve and brio. Fascinating oddities of orchestration such as the piccolo against sustained bassoons added interest as did an extremely eloquent saxophone in solo utterance which proved amply the tonal and artistic possibilities of this much-maligned and misrepresented instrument. After this wealth of orchestration and tonal brilliance Mussorgsky left but little with us save the exquisite pianissimo of Mr. Boettcher's French horn.

The final number of almost unbelievable orchestral complexities with its maze of melodious contrapunal intricacies furnished a show piece of unparalleled magnificence. Grace of melodic line vied with infinite variety of tone color, with many pointings of solo instruments. Mr. Burgin's beautiful violin in glittering cadenza, and strophes for flute, clarinet, cor Anglais and flute added the tonal interest. This work will perpetuate the story of poor Till far more than the mere legend. It will also glorify the distinguished composer and every orchestra which plays it.

It is a great musical satisfaction to hear this difficult work played with such brio and artistic comprehension. Each of the groups sounded as one instrument in perfection of ensemble: clarity of articulation and richness of tone color combined to make this rendition memorable, a splendid tribute to the best days of a great contemporaneous composer and one who has set an example to the musical world for individuality of thought and novelty of orchestration.

Dr. Koussevitzsky was very cordially received, took at least a dozen bows before beginning the concert and was repeatedly recalled after each number by the large and applausive audience. We note with interest and much approval a recent thawing-out of our audiences, which hitherto have not been any too warm in their reception of musical greatness. Surely the musical magnificences of this superb concert were enough to evoke enthusiastic emotion in the most stolid.

The program:

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55 .... Beethoven
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

"Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" opus 49 .... Pierne
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" .... Moussorgsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, opus 28 .... Strauss

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Beauty

For the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Dec. 15-16, Dr. Koussevitzky now announces the first performances in this country of Markevitch's new orchestral "Hymn," deferred from November for lack of orchestral parts. Only one of the three pieces so labelled will be played, because of the close resemblance between them. Markevitch, almost needless to recall, is the young Russo-Parisian, whose imaginary ballet, "Rebus," produced a cold fury of contempt or a quietly reasoned admiration at Symphony Hall last spring.

Trans Dec 8

Conductor

Respectfully Inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky

NO MORTAL this, who stark against the light,
Enthralls the tides of music's shoreless seas,
The high-priest's ecstasy, the storm-king's might
Are one with all he knows, he one with these.

In shadowed caverns of the night he seeks
To read the lucent dreams whereby men live,
And paces lonely on the mountain peaks
To find the ultimate the gods may give.

Then like a Merlin, versed in ancient lore,
He conjures up an incandescent fire
Wherein the ghosts of dying voices soar
In song renascent of an old desire.

Ringed with the scorifying sound he stands,
A Titan welding beauty with his hands.

TRISTRAM LIVINGSTONE

...CLIPPING FR...
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
NEWS

RADIO Day By Day

ANOTHER series of winter broadcasts by the Boston Symphony orchestra has been placed on the Saturday night schedule of WJZ-NBC. The season will open Dec. 23 and continue through March 31.

Besides these broadcasts, a Sunday group of symphony programs is to be inaugurated on WJZ-NBC a week from Sunday evening, at 6. Guest conductors and soloists will be used. At the baton for the opening program will be Bruno Walter, with Jascha Heifetz as the guest violinist.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week:

Suite, "Moon Trails" .... Whithorne
(First Performances)
Rhapsody for Violoncello and Orchestra, "Solomon" .... Bloch
(Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti)
Introduction and Hymn .... Markevitch
(First Times in America)
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor .... Beethoven

About Markevitch's "Hymn" a note appears elsewhere on this page. . . . No music by Mr. Whithorne has hitherto been heard at these concerts. The incoming Suite translates into tones impressions of the arid "Death Valley" and the steaming "Devil's Kitchen" in California; the green hills along the southern California coast; the beach and surf at Malibu in Hawaii. Mr. Bloch's "Solomon" ("Schelomo") evokes the great king and the great age of Jewry; now comes deservedly to fifth and sixth performances in Boston

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, Dec. 18:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3........ Beethoven
Concerto, No. 1, in D minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Brahms
(Pianist: Leonard Shure)
Nocturnes: "Clouds"--"Fêtes" ...... Debussy
Suite, No. 2, from the Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë" .... Ravel

Mr. Shure is a former assistant to Artur Schnabel, now settled in Cambridge as pianist and teacher.

Master-Songs to Be Revived from Rav

The Cycle, 'Scheherazade,' Singer and Orchestra at Symphony Hall

Dec 7 Trans

IT IS nearly ten years since "Scheherazade," three poems by Tristan Klingsor, set for soprano voice and orchestra by Maurice Ravel, were first heard at the Symphony Concerts. Then Mr. Monteux was conductor and Mme. Janacoupolos the singer. Almost six years ago when the composer was guest of the Symphony Orchestra, they were heard ane. with an unsuitable singer who need not be recalled. Dr. Koussevitzky has long wished to return to them. Tomorrow and Saturday he has found the room. This time, the singer will be Mme. Averino, whose temperament and tones are sensitive to subtle music. Only a month ago she was in new flower at the concert of Schönberg's music in Cambridge.

In the special Ravel number of the Parisian magazine "La Revue Musicale," Monsieur Arthur Hoerée, in an article, "Les Mélodies et l'Œuvre Lyrique," likens "Scheherazade" to "a decorative panel into the making of which has gone the most exquisite craftsmanship." The first poem, "Asia," after a few introductory lines unrolls a picture of the gorgeous, cruel East. In translation by Hermann Klein:

. . . Fain would I now set forth in yon swift little schooner
Gently rocking in harbor this eve
With aspect strange and very lonely,
Which at tomorrow's dawn her red sails will unfurl
Like a gigantic bird of night in a golden sky.
Fain would I now set forth towards the islands of flowers
Listening the while as chants the wilful sea
The theme of some old magic spell.
Fain would I see Damascus and the cities of Persia with minarets so light high in the air
Fain would I see soft silken turbans twined
O'er dusky faces with glistening teeth;
Fain would I see dark eyes burning with love,
Their pupils shining and sparkling with joy,
Their skins a yellow of the ripest orange;
Fain would I see the dress with rich velvet folds,
The garment with long fringes bordered.
Fain would I see the calumets tight held in mouths
Hidden by beards grown long and snowy;
Fain would I see sour looking merchants with eyes askew;
The cadis, too, and the great viziers
Who have but to raise up their finger an inch
To grant either life or death, perchance, just as they will.
Fain would I see Persia, India, ay even China,—
Stout mandarins who loll under umbrellas,
Princesses sweet with tiny hands,—
And learned men loudly debating
Over poetry and the charms of beauty;
I would linger awhile at a palace enchanted
And, like some foreign travelling sage,
Contemplate at my ease old landscapes
Done in colors on lovely textures framed with pine,

With someone in the midst of an orchard, alone;
Fain would I see the murderous wretches who smile
Whilst the headsman chops off innocent heads
With scimitar deadly of true Eastern shape.—
Fain would I see poor beggars and rich queens;
Fain would I see the rose and trace of blood;
Fain would I see men die of love or else of hate. . . .

Monsieur Hoerée comments in free English paraphrase: "The sails of the fairy schooner scintillate from a thousand massed strings; in gently animated waves flutes and clarinets suggest Persian minarets. But the bark retards its course to view the 'dark eyes burning with love,' while the penetrating melody seems one of tender regard. The violins sing of the sumptuousness of rich velvet garments; the brass proclaims the 'life or death' dealt out by the viziers. A harp glissando turns the kaleidoscope, and a most resplendent China becomes at once the matter in hand for flutes, harp and celesta. Flutes and violas marvel at the enchanted palace; clarinets in low register, muted horns and tam-tam deal with the smiling assassins A gradual ascent brings the deep passion which mounts to an intense desire to 'see men die of love or of hate. . . .' But the bark has come to the end of its voyage. The fairy harmonies of the beginning invite the dreamer to tell his tale of dreams. . . ."

In the second and shorter poem, "The Magic Flute," we hear the voice of a handmaiden whose master is asleep; while she listens to the distant sound of her lover's flute—with muted strings as foundation:

. . . And when I draw near to the casement high
Then each note, as 'twould seem, doth hither fly
From the flute to touch my face
In mysterious embrace.

Says Monsieur Hoerée: "The voice mingles with the play of high-pitched instruments, in a savory counterpoint for two parts, as plastic as it is musical: for each note of the flute seems like a mysterious kiss on the cheek of the beloved."

In "Heedless," the third poem, likewise brief, a passing youth, strange, comely, singing, catches the eye and ear of a gazing girl who forthwith salutes and desires him. But he goes his way, indifferent. "The cantilena of wood-winds," notes Monsieur Hoerée, "which floats over slow strings evokes the seductiveness of this song. The 'false music' [that the youth sings] finds exact expression in the imprecision of two gracile intervals; a wanton melodic turn releases the profound melancholy of the parting. . . . Despite the unequal proportions, the different backgrounds, these three poems of 'Scheherazade' form a homogeneous whole, in curve like a long decrescendo. We have here the perfect type of songs with orchestra."

A. H. M.

At Cambridge

What began as a hope and a prediction in respect to the Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra became last evening a firm conviction. Earlier in the season, it appeared that thos who held tickets to the Thursday series in Sanders Theater would comprise a particularly fortunate class of listeners. Their good luck in these earlier concerts has been exemplified not only by Dr. Koussevitzky's choice of programs but by the mettle and spirit of the orchestra as well. Consequently, the mildly gracious response of last evening's audience was, to one visitor at least, a little disappointing.

The program contained five pieces in all, including one work of formal dimensions—the Third Symphony of Brahms, and an early classic—Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for string orchestra. It also listed a novelty—Pierné's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme"; a familiar repertory piece—the Prelude to Wagner's music-drama, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and one of the finest examples of contemporary British music—the "Norfolk Rhapsody," No. 1, of Vaughan Williams. This is not to say that quantity stood for quality; on the contrary, every item served both individually for merit and collectively for contrast. That this arrangement provided abundant satisfaction was evident in the general listening attitude, which was attentive. Indeed, the applause for the Symphony of Brahms recalled Dr. Koussevitzky to the stage for the familiar bow of acknowledgement with the standing orchestra; and the brisk clapping followed the Prelude to "The Mastersingers." Yet, on the whole, the response was surprisingly moderate in view of the enthusiasm which the musicians have aroused upor other occasions by a similar readiness of spirit and manner under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

In Mozart's little Serenade, Dr. Koussevitzky immediately established an amiable mood which extended far beyond the opening piece and which cast an atmosphere of elegance and cheerfulness about the entire program. Setting the measures in motion, he let them proceed by their own undulating momentum. The nimble strings touched with glint and sheen the meeting and parting strands of melody. The inherent airiness of the music evoked an independent and detached life.

There is a persistent and finally prevailing theme of sombreness in Brahms's Third Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky, however, emphasized in the opening movement its ever-present implications of noble aspiration and heroic achievement. He encouraged the broad melodies, the positive accents, the upsurging moods, the confident declamations of the individual choirs, the sonorous chorus of the entire orchestra. He shaped the "Andante" and "Allegretto" as interludes dealing in momentary fancies, half-sad, half-bright; gravely romantic reflections. He urged the earnest 'cellos to assert their stern advice. Again in the final movement, he summoned the heroic manner, yet it now indicated less the brightness of aspiration than the authority of experience, turning toward solemn, inward truths. So closely intermingled are the cheerful and melancholy overtones in this music that their relative values will appear in a slightly different light in every performance. How interesting the thought—and how it insures the immortality of the piece—that neither conductor nor audience will ever find them twice the same!

Pierné's "Divertissements" were as engaging as when previously heard in Symphony Hall. The audience expressed a lively pleasure in the good humor which pervaded them, the skill, with which the orchestral assignment were made, and especially the ingenuity of the saxophone solo, which was played by Mr. Tapley. The "Norfolk Rhapsody" of Williams exhaled a salty folk-song atmosphere which lingered in the memory long after the beautifully sustained final note.

N. M. J.

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled this program:

Symphony, No. 9 ....Mahler
Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra,
"Scheherazade" ....Ravel
(Singer: Olga Averino)
Suite, No. 2, from the Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë" ....Ravel

At the concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York, Mr. Walter will traverse a "unified" French program, viz.:

Danced Poem, "The Peri" ....Dukas
Concerto in G major for Piano and Orchestra ....Ravel
(Pianist: Harold Bauer)
Fantastic Symphony ....Berlioz

In turn in Philadelphia, Mr. Ormandy, conducting as guest, has arrayed a "unified" Russian program, viz.:

Overture to the Opera, "Russian and Ludmilla" ....Glinka
Classical Symphony ....Prokofiev
Suite from the Opera, "Love of Three Oranges" ....Prokofiev
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor ....Chaikovsky

In Chicago, Mr. Schnabel, now nearing the end of his American tour, will be assisting pianist to Mr. Stock and his orchestra in the following program:

Symphony, No. 2, in C major....R. Schumann
Humoresque in the Form of Variations. G. Schumann
Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe" ..Weber
Concerto, No. 4, in G major for Piano and Orchestra ....Beethoven

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
DEC 8 - 1933

Announcer and commentator for the Boston Symphony series to start Dec. 23 will be Arthur F. Edes, one-time WBZ announcer and more recently with WEEI. In the early days Edes was "E F. A." He started in radio with WBZ nearly nine years ago and had the distinction of having presided at the first Boston Symphony broadcast in 1926.

BALTMORE, MD.
SUN
DEC 9 - 1933

Who Wants More Sibelius?—Those in favor of having Dr. Koussevitzky direct more symphonies by Sibelius at forthcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may so signify by signing petitions placed for that purpose by a group of music lovers on the bulletin board of the Pratt Library (inside the fine arts and music room) and at the desk of the Peabody Institute Library. Those who have so placed the petition state that the Silbelius' Second Symphony was played at the last Boston Symphony concert here because the director had received a number of individual requests for it.

Dec 9, 1933 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music by Gustave Mahler and Maurice Ravel, two composers as disparate in style and temperament as can be imagined, occupies the program of the Symphony concerts this week. Just which piece was most superbly performed yesterday is difficult to say, for all were overwhelming. Ravel and Mahler each bring out different aspects of Dr Koussevitzky's interpretive capacities. The former, surely, could wish for no more brilliant playing of his scores than the conductor achieved yesterday. Mahler's Symphony, long and prolix, is just the sort of piece that needs the ministrations of a Koussevitzky. The conductor seems to have studied this score assiduously, for by subtle variations in dynamic emphasis and by careful moulding of phrases, he has given it a distinct outline of structure. Were this symphony to be played perfunctorily, the chances are that its deficiencies and not its finest qualities would be most perceptible.

The symphony had not been heard in Boston since 1931, when Dr Koussevitzky first performed it in the United States. Though written in the grandiose manner of the late 19th Century, of which Mahler was a spiritual child, it is great music in spite of its faults of repetition and turgidity. Great because its material is substantial, and great because Mahler, with unmistakable sincerity and the technical command of a master, poured into it the mingled feelings of his troubled heart. Though Mahler was prone to being windy, he was not guilty, in this work, of spinning out thematic material of small quantity and dubious worth.

Outwardly a ruthless tyrant of opera house and concert hall, Mahler was inwardly a sensitive soul, cruelly tormented by mundane affairs. During his last years he thought much of death, literally sick in mind and spirit This inward state is revealed in the Ninth Symphony and in "The Song of the Earth." The weariness of a man longing for peace can be felt throughout the first movement and the concluding adagio. Indeed, the muted brasses sigh out under the strings, shortly after the beginning of the andante, a motive that strikingly recalls the composer's musings, at the end of "The Song of the Earth," upon a pleasant land beyond death where "the distant skies are shining blue, eternally." Even the obstreperous rollicking of the scherzo, upon a country dance tune is soon interrupted by black melanchoy. The Rondo burlesque is a perfect frenzy of jangled nerves.

Yet like Wagner when he wrote "Tristan," Mahler the artist was able to preserve sufficient intellectual balance to express himself clearly.

Olga Averino, a Russian born soprano, sang the three poems, "Asia," "The Enchanted Flute" and The Indifferent One," of Tristan Klingsor, that Ravel put together in the suite which he called 'Scheherezade." This type of music, langorous and sensuous, is well suited to her clear though not exceptionally ample voice and to her personal style of singing. No fault, save perhaps that of indistinct enunciation of the French text, could be found with her work. She was heard to much better advantage than at the Boston Symphony's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony here last Winter.

Ravel momentarily dropped his seeming pose of cool impersonality when he wrote "Scheherezade," 30 years ago. Klingsor's poems evidently made a deep impression upon him, and he, in turn, created a musical setting that depicts graphically the substance of the texts. For once Ravel became sentimental and did not require sheer sonority to compensate for lack of genuine warmth of feeling.

The plangencies of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite ended the concert in an outburst of magnificent tone. One was left speculating as to whether, in the future, Ravel may not be regarded after Rimsky-Korsakov as the most consummate writer for orchestra of his time.

Emerson Whithorne's new "Moon Trails" will have a first performance at the Symphony concerts next week, and Igor Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" will be heard for the first time in this country. Bloch's rhapsody "Solomon" for cello and orchestra, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, will also be played.

C. W. D.

Post

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9,

SYMPHONY IN MAHLER AND RAVEL

Great Ninth Heard Again—Soprano as Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Mahler and Ravel, composers whose only meeting ground is orchestral mastery, shared the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Their mating proved a happy experiment.

MAHLER'S NINTH

From Mahler came the Ninth Symphony, introduced to America by Dr. Koussevitzky at a pair of Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1931 and heard soon after at a Monday evening concert, while Ravel was represented by his "Scheherazade" for soprano and orchestra and the Second Suite from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." In the "Scheherazade," Mme. Olga Averino was the soloist.

A fourth hearing of Mahler's Symphony naturally made for clearer appraisal of this remarkable work. The most moving and impressive portion of the symphony seemed yesterday to be, not the final Adagio that would wrest from the grave its secrets, but the opening Andante, which even more in its resignations than in its protests is music of a heart-shaking, heartbreaking sadness. The Scherzo, with its rustic gaiety and vigor, pleased as before.

An Act of Devotion

Again it was easy to be stirred by the ironical third movement that is said to have expressed Mahler's aversion to the futile hurly-burly of New York city, where the Symphony was sketched. But somehow added familiarity with the Adagio discovered a suggestion of pious commonplace in the theme in which Mahler intended to portray an other-worldly serenity. But that many found this movement beautiful and uplifting was plain enough from comment in the lobby, and the performance of it, like that of the Symphony as a whole, represented an act of devotion on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky.

While thinking him for the opportunity once more to hear his Ninth Symphony, is it out of place to suggest that there are five completed symphonies of Mahler that Boston does not know, and others that it has not heard in years?

Although her voice in the first of the "Scheherazade" songs lacked a little of the body and richness necessary for so opulently scored a music, Mme. Averino may be said to have sung the work notably. In the second song her tones were often of an exquisite beauty, while in all three she displayed a rare degree of sensibility and imagination and a musicianship none too common among the vocal sisterhood. Her singing aroused merited enthusiasm. Deservedly, too, Mr. Laurent was singled out for his performance of the obbligato in "La Flute Enchantee." Musically the third song now falls a little flat; the other two keep their romantic and pictorial quality.

It was likewise the greater Ravel who wrote the measures that depict the coming of dawn in "Daphnis." But even the brilliance of yesterday's performance could not banish the feeling that the final dance is inflated, but also diluted Rimsky-Korsakov.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1933

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Mahler, Symphony No. 9; Ravel, "Sheherazade." Three poems for voice and orchestra to the verse by Tristan Klingsor; Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet: Orchestral excerpts (second suite) soloist, Olga Averino

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was played in superlative fashion to an audience which filled the hall.

Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony filled the first half of the program. It is a work which can best be described as unhappy, for nowhere does the composer lift his thought entirely free from the mental gloom that pervaded his life during the period in which it was written. Despite a few discreet cuts, this symphony lasted about an hour in yesterday's performance,—not long for Mahler.

Steeped in the classics, Mahler failed to make his own the inherently dramatic qualities of the classical symphonic pace. His ideas are too fragmentary and he has the same difficulty as Bruckner in getting them under way. Philip Hale pertinently described him as "a composer of magnificent intentions which were seldom fully realized." His ideas fail to keep step with his vision. His handling of the orchestra, like his inventive talent, is not always original. But there is much that is truly beautiful, and less than usual of the banal, in this Ninth Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was so convincing, so ardent, that one willingly believed in it as a greater, more profound work than it really is. One's belief in it was dispelled only after coming out of the glamour built around it by yesterday's remarkable presentation.

Ravel's Sheherazade" and the second suite of orchestral excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet completed the program.

For the three songs—Asie, La Flute Enchantec, and L'Indifferent—which make up Ravel's Sheherazade, Madame Olga Averino was the soloist, an admirable choice. Madame Averino is a singer for whom the complexities of modern vocal scores have no terrors. Here is an artist whose imagination is exquisitely attuned to a beautiful voice and a rare musicianship. The songs themselves, are in one sense of the word, ineffective vocal writing; yet so surely were they paralleled with the exotic beauties of the accompaniment, that the singer won for herself applause that bordered on an ovation. To this the orchestra and its leader joined their hearty appreciation.

The orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet finished the concert. They were played with that amazing virtuosity which is a unique feature of the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky was in his element. No point in these beautiful scores missed fire. It was exciting and wonderful playing.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS
DEC 10 1933

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL RETURN TO AIR

Arrangements made by NBC to broadcast all Saturday concerts at home

Weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted ~~by~~ Dr. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, will be broadcast again this winter, the National Broadcasting Company announces. The radio season will open December 23d and run until March 31, 1934, except three Saturdays while the orchestra is on tour. Throughout that period all the regular Saturday evening performances in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be broadcast complete by an NBC-WJZ network, beginning at 8.30 p. m.

This world famous musical organization was the first really permanent orchestra in America, according to an authority, having performed regularly in full concert series since 1881. In the fall of 1932 NBC made arrangements to broadcast that winter's concerts to the nation, a radio contribution to music lovers by NBC comparable with its broadcasts of grand opera from the Metropolitan.

Koussevitzky, famous both as a conductor and musician, came to the Boston Symphony in 1924. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874, and at twelve became chief d'orchestre in the theatre there. Two years later he went to Moscow to study, then toured Europe for ten years and formed his own orchestra in 1909.

Every summer he conducts a special concert series of his own at the Paris Opera House and in the fall returns armed with new and unique scores for the Boston Symphony. This coming season is its tenth under Dr. Kousevitzky's leadership.

Her.

MUSIC

Dec. 23, 1933

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Rimsky-Korsakov program: "Sadko," a Musical Picture, op. 5; "Night on Mount Triglaff," act III of the opera-ballet "Mlada," arranged in concert form; Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Symphony hall was filled yesterday afternoon with an audience eager to hear the Rimsky-Korsakov program which Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged in commemoration of the 25th anniversary of the composer's death. The Boston Symphony orchestra and its leader were equally eager to do justice to the program.

A good deal of interest centred on the "Night on the Mount Trilaff" music, which is the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Mlada," an opera-ballet. Here curious Wagnerian influences crop up, even in the matter of orchestration. Naturally, the best parts of the work are those in which Korsakov has retained his unique individuality. He seems to have been touched, more than in passing, by the Wagner of the "Ring," "Tannhaeuser," and even "Tristan." There are times when the work makes its way hesitatingly; when one speculates as to the effectiveness of the concert version. However, the beauty of the work came to just expression in the expert, imaginative and devoted treatment given it by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The program opened with an excellent performance of the composer's "Sadko," which is a perfect illustration of his remarkably clear and brilliant tone-painting. The simplicity of his phrasing is united to an orchestral idiom that reflects the fantastic quality of the tales which held so much interest for Korsakov.

And then we had "Scheherazade"! It would be difficult to imagine a reading of this work more arresting than that given by Dr. Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony. It was a thrilling performance, replete with exciting dynamic contrasts. dulcet longings and intense passion. Of the many "Scheherazade" interpretations we have heard, this will leave the most interesting and permanent impression. A rich outpouring of applause was the reward of Dr. Koussevitzky and his artists.

Tonight's repetition of the Rimsky-Korsakov concert will be broadcast. Philip Hale, the esteemed critic, will be heard in explanatory remarks. These broadcasts—we believe there are to be 10—will carry to radio audiences a realization of the remarkable music the Boston Symphony brings weekly to its regular public.

Next week's concerts will be all-Wagner programs and will include the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the first act of "Die Walkure." There is no chorus in the first act, which presents but three characters: Siegmund, Sieglinde and Hunding. The soloists will be Paul Althouse, tenor; Elsa Alsen, soprano and Fred Patton, bass.

Announcement is made in this week's programs that subscriptions to the remaining four concerts of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven cycle are available. What better gift could come to music lover, young or old, than a chance to hear these concerts?

Jan. 7 there will be a concert by the Boston Symphony for the benefit of the pension fund. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist, playing Elgar's seldom-heard violin concerto.

N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 11 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

On the Retirement of Philip Hale and the Boston Critic's Lasting Influence on America's Music.

PHILIP HALE has retired. The public, the musical profession in all of its branches and every practitioner of his own art of criticism, will salute the Boston veteran as he puts aside the pen that has done such valiant and persuasive service in the cause that has remained dearest to his heart. His first vocation was the law, where his intellectual capacities might have carried him far, if Euterpe had not sounded a clearer call. An accomplished organist, a choral conductor acquainted with the practical problems of preparation and performance, his musical grounding in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart and Paris under Rheinberger, Urban, Raif, Guilmant, Haupt, Faiszt and Bargiel was such as to qualify him for the career of a musical executant.

But Philip Hale's destiny, as he soon saw it, was the destiny of the printed word, not the pedal or the podium. Today, with his eightieth birthday less than four months away, he may look back, if he so chooses, over the organists and the conductors of choral societies whose careers in America have run parallel to his and ask with no want of modesty whether there has been one among them of such widespread influence in the shaping of America's musical consciousness and musical progress as he in his chosen sphere.

Boston's Great Critic

THERE can be no measuring-rod for the achievements of such a career. The musical thought of an entire people owes something—we believe, much—to the newspaper criticisms, the magazine articles, the book studies, and most of all the program annotations of Boston's most celebrated musical writer. When he is gone, he will have left a heritage in the Boston Symphony annotations that will be consulted by musical scholars, time out of mind. Mr. Hale may smile at our merely middle-aged enthusiasm, but we propose him, here and now, as an immortal in the academy of arts and public benefactions, and this in spite of the circumstance that he is very much alive!

If those who control the destinies of the Boston Symphony are wise, they will continue to use the Hale annotations on various standard works as long as the factual content is unaltered by later information. They are unrivaled for their scholarship, their exhaustive scope, their illuminating detail, their skillful organization, their lucid and inviting style. Themselves a collation from many sources, their reliability and their completeness have caused the Boston Symphony program books to be regarded, in turn, as source volumes over a period of many years. Mr. Hale has been a newspaper critic since 1890, a program annotator since 1901. He retires the dean of deans in both branches of the literature that is concerned with the tonal art. His pen has never lost its trenchant wit, its broad tolerance, its swift and keen analysis. The Boston Herald, like the Boston Symphony, has shone with an additional luster by reason of his long identification with its fortunes.

Poe Tale Set to Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tcherepnin and Other Compositions Next Week

EDGAR ALLAN POE'S "The Masque of the Red Death," one of his later stories, in which he displays his remarkable skill in piling up the horrors leading to the climax of the "Red Death" that had devastated the country and for which there was no cure, is the subject of the latest of Tcherepnin's compositions, which will be heard here for the first time at the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening. The other numbers on the program will be Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The second Carnegie Hall concert will be next Saturday afternoon and the program will be Pierne's Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. At the Friday night concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music the Pierne number will be given and Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. All the concerts will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

---

10 Post Dec 23

RIMSKY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Silver Anniversary of Composer's Death Observed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That the best music of even a good composer can be considerably better than his second best was freshly demonstrated at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon when Dr. Koussevitzky placed the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov after that composer's musical picture "Sadko" and the "Night on Mount Triglav" from his opera "Mlada."

GOOD HOLIDAY FARE

The reason for this feast of Rimsky was two-fold. Not previously had the Symphony Orchestra marked the 25th anniversary of the Russian composer's death, which befell last June, and Rimsky-Korsakov's music, whether best or second best, makes excellent holiday fare.

Of the two pieces that preceded the more familiar "Scheherazade," "Sadko" is the better known. The excerpt from "Mlada" had been played at a pair of Symphony Concerts but once before, and that was exactly 12 years ago during the reign of Mr. Monteux. "Sadko" which as some will recall made an effective ballet for Mr. Diaghilev's ever-to-be-lamented Ballet Russe is neither deeply engrossing nor wildly exciting, but it is pleasing and pictorial, mildly stirring in its more enlivening measures. And the musical stuff of which it is made is often rich and lustrous.

Singular Orchestral Dress

The various fantastic apparitions that make the third act of the opera ballet "Mlada" are envisioned in a series of tonal frescoes that while not lacking in pictorial or imaginative quality would be more graphic and suggestive if scene and action could lend them support. In short, here is one more example of stage music that fails of full effectiveness when torn from its rightful environment. Heard in the concert room, and especially in so opulent a performance of as that of yesterday, this "Night on Mount Triglav" impresses chiefly by reason of its gorgeous and often singular orchestral dress.

Especially noteworthy is the use of flutes, alto flute and piccolos. It is also amusing to discover in one passage the origin of the infernal dance in Stravinsky's "Fire Bird."

Calls for Strange Instruments

In "Mlada" Rimsky departed from his usual custom and scored lavishly, calling to his aid certain instruments not to be met with every day in the week such as the deeper flute, the shriller clarinets and even a set of Pan's pipes and a lyre. By comparison the orchestra of "Scheherazade" is modest indeed. But the never-failing effectiveness of this earlier score made the "Mlada" music seem in retrospect fussily overlanden.

From the first Dr. Koussevitzky evinced a peculiar sympathy for "Scheherazade." Indeed it might be said that we of Boston had never suspected the full possibilities of the work until he revealed them to us. The performance yesterday was again brilliant and impassioned, and it evoked a storm of applause.

88

Globe

23, 1933 Dec

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky has dedicated the Symphony concerts this week to the memory of his countryman, Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakov, who died just six months more than 25 years ago. The program, therefore, is composed of the following three compositions by the great Russian teacher and master of instrumentation: "Sadko," a tone poem written in 1867; excerpts from th ethird act of the opera "Mlada," which Rimsky put together for concert performance under the title, "Night on Mt Triglaff," created between 1889 and 18[illegible], and the symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," put on paper in 1881.

Only once before, and that a decade ago, has the "Night on Mt Triglaff" been heard here. The story is a wild—to the Western mind, incoherent—mingling of realistic tragedy and sheer fantasy, concerned with princely greed for a neighboring province, love, murder, seduction and the gathering at night upon a cloud-wrapped, bleak mountain of sundry benign and evil humans and gods. Even Eugene O'Neill might find it hard to put as much as that into one play.

The opera was composed by Rimsky 20 years after a director of the Russian Imperial Theatres had suggested that Rimsky and three other Russian musicians unite their talents in a combined ballet, opera and stage spectacle upon the subject. The project was abandoned and Rimsky thought no more of his part until a friend reminded him of it in 1889. Then, after a visit that Summer to the Paris Exposition, where he heard certain exotic instruments, which he determined to use in the score, he began to compose "Mlada."

Though all three works show the genius of Rimsky at various points in his career they do not reveal steady growth as do, for example, the operas that Richard Wagner wrote at comparable periods in his life. "Scheherezade," the second in chronological order, is in all respects the best. A product, seemingly, of a musician in the prime of his powers, its themes are more distinguished, its instrumental garb more respendent. Its general form—the suite—makes for increased concentration of material and compactness of shape.

Here and there in "Night on Mount Triglaff" may be observed the influence of Richard Wagner. Rimsky's employment of woodwind in this work suggests that Stravinsky found an idea or two for his "Rite of Spring." The picture that "Scheherezade" paints, however, is more vivid than that of either "Sadko" or "Night on Mount Triglaff."

Rimsky's development of modern instrumentation is well known. His general style is probably unique, for most of the time he leaned to dramatic or at least to delineative music. He was not concerned with philosophy, with pouring out his heart, in the manner of the Germans of the 19th Century, nor, on the other hand, did he favor literal "program" music. His artistic purpose lay somewhere in between. He did not indulge in musical "realism" or in the evanescent impressionism of Frenchmen such as Debussy. Rimsky was, primarily, a first rate musical story-teller. No matter how personal his style, he revealed little of his inner self.

Like a fine liqueur, a little of his music goes a long way, for it is rich. An entire program proves cloying. Needless to say Dr Koussevitzky found these scores perfectly suited to his gifts of interpretation. Hardly a detail of beautiful phrasing or of dynamic shading escaped him. The concert yesterday was literally one of dazzling scintillating orchestral colors, the afternoon one of tonal magnificence.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will present the entire first act of Wagner's "The Valkyries," with the following soloists: Elso Alsen, soprano; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. The program will begin with the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhaeuser."

C. W. D.

Dec 19
Herald

MUSIC

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

Dr. Koussevitzky chose a particularly good program for the third concert of the Monday evening series. The audience was quick to respond and applauded enthusiastically for each number. The program was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture to "Leonore" No. 3
Brahms..Concerto for piano No. 1 in D minor
(soloist, Leonard Shure)
Debussy....................Two Nocturnes
Ravel............"Daphnis and et Chloe"
(second suite)

It would be hard to find a program of more general interest and, even, excitement than the above. And by no means the least exciting was the third Leonore overture. It shows how quickly and completely Beethoven could shift from composing symphonies and chamber works to the writing of dramatic music. It is no less astounding than a poet or a novelist turning playwright. It requires such an altered point of view to write successful dramatic music that only a versatile genius like Beethoven or Mozart can master the art easily. And when one hears so moving and thrilling a performance as that of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, it is increasingly amazing how an audience can put up with opera orchestras and their halting and sketchy playing that one so often hears.

Mr. Leonard Shure is a young pianist of impressive talents. What is more he brings to this difficult concerto of Brahms a maturity of intellect that one might not expect from so young an artist. In addition he has all the enthusiasm one could wish for and a technical equipment of considerable dimensions. Mr. Shure performed this long and intensely emotional and spiritual concerto with at times remarkable poetic fervor.

The concert ended, one might almost assert, as all concerts should end; that is, brilliantly. The Ravel is throughout brilliant, in orchestration, in rhythm and in color. Yet, curiously, it does not sound as "modern" as the nocturnes of Debussy that preceded it. Debussy's rhythms, if they are not bold, are subtler and more various than Ravel's. Naturally he was not writing for a ballet, as Ravel was, but at the same time his music has rhythmic quality that Ravel did not touch, also a far subtler imagination. This is not to say that Debussy's nocturnes are necessarily greater music than Ravel's "Daphnis," but merely to point out that as works of somewhat the same type and period they remain remarkably contrasted pieces. A textbook mind might lump these two composers together, yet they could hardly be more radically different.

A. W. W.

THIRD MONDAY OF SYMPHONY

Leonard Shure, Pianist, Assisting Artist

Post Dec 19

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Assisting the Symphony Orchestra last evening in the third concert of its Monday series was Leonard Shure, 23-year-old American pianist, now established hereabouts, as teacher and performer, after eight years' sojourn in Germany. Since Mr. Shure has been both student of and assistant to Artur Schnabel it is not surprising that he should have chosen to make his Symphony Hall debût in the First Concerto of Brahms or that he should have played this essentially serious work with a forcefulness and power, a deep earnestness and conviction that recalled his musical mentor. That Mr. Shure's performance of this exacting music showed no trace of immaturity, evinced no lapse from complete co-ordination and control may not be said. But at least there was no reason to regret his choice, and had he selected a showier, more outwardly rewarding composition, his reception by the audience could not have been warmer.

For the rest, the concert offered Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have a way of surpassing themselves at these Monday concerts and that of last evening furnished no exception to the rule.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 19

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Leonard Shure, a young American pianist lately returned from eight years of study and concert work in Germany, played for the first time last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was heard in the D minor concerto of Brahms, a formidable work and one full of difficulties. For this third Symphony concert of the Monday series Dr Koussevitzky also selected Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals" of Debussy, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

Mr Shure gave evidence of his exceptional talent at the age of 4. Study with Karl Reckzeh in Chicago followed; until his 15th year Mr Shure appeared publicly in this country. Then, in 1925, he went to Germany to study under Artur Schnabel, remaining with that master until 1928. Last night's performance, according to record, was his first public appearance in this city.

The resourceful technique of hand that enables him to overcome the many problems of execution in the D minor concerto is notable; yet even more impressive is Mr Shure's mature intellect. He really "interpreted" the work, and drew out all of Brahms' musical thought, even in the solid, austere first movement. The poetry of the slow movement was not slighted, nor the spicy Hungarian flavor of the Rondo obscured. A few passing deficiencies, such as undersounding the bass early in the first movement, a fleeting discrepancy in tempo with that of the orchestra during the adagio, did not mar the general excellence of his playing. Though he has yet to pass his 24th birthday. Mr Shure is a pianist of the first rank.

The program was especially satisfying, well varied and splendidly played. Dr Koussevitzky, save for certain fluctuations of tempo in the concerto, where none is indicated in the score, was at his best. C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 11 1933

MEMBERSHIP LIST TO CLOSE TONIGHT

The membership list for the 1933-34 concert series of the Civic Music association will close after tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the ~~Auditorium~~. Reopening of the subscribers' list two weeks ago has resulted in the addition of more than 100 adult and 50 student members to the association.

Admission to tonight's concert and those for the remainder of the season will be restricted to members, and to guests residing more than 40 miles outside of Worcester. After tonight the membership list will not again be open until next Spring.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct tonight's program which will include Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," by Mozart, and Ravel's "Daphne and Clemmnis."

Monitor Dec 12

Boston Symphony on Air

Russian recognition, though fairly new to the United States, may be rather "old hat" to musical Bostonians who have enjoyed a form of "Russian recognition" ever since Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came to American shores in 1924 to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And now comes word that weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony will once again be radiocast this winter, beginning Dec. 23. This season is the fifty-third of the orchestra, the tenth year under Dr. Koussevitzky, and the second under radio auspices.

Fittingly enough, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen an all-Rimsky-Korsakoff program for his first radio program, in which the chief item will probably be the "Schéhérazade" Suite. The concerts coming directly from Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard complete over an NBC-WJZ network from 8:30 to 10:15 p. m. approximately, eastern time. On three Saturdays, Jan. 6, Feb. 3 and March 3, the concerts will not be radiocast as the orchestra will be on tour. The series will close March 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
DEC 12 1933

Boston Symphony Concert Halted By Heavy Winds

Unusual Interruption at Auditorium Suspends Performance

By E. GWYN THOMAS

High winds, during the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening the Worcester Civic Music Association's new season in the Memorial Auditorium last night, caused the suspension of the program and an unscheduled "intermission" of about 15 minutes, marring an otherwise delightful evening.

The episode occurred just as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took up his baton for th[illegible] work of the evening, the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina." There came a noise representing nothing so much as off-stage thunder in an amateur drama. The noise died down and the "Prelude," a composition which calls for delicate shading at the introduction, began. However, the disturbance became so severe that Dr. Koussevitzky gave up with a despairing shrug of the shoulders.

Lifts Skylights

It was announced later that skylights on the roof of the building had become unfastened under pressure of high winds, causing the noise. The program was resumed and continued without further interruption.

The gracefulness of the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestra, the quality of tone, the beauty of phrasing and the musicianship of the orchestra and its virile conductor, was appreciated by the audience and won reward in generous applause.

Beginning the "Prelude" for the second time, Dr. Koussevitzky drew forth the sweep and dignity of the composition, ending in a thrilling climax that brought the audience to full acknowledgement of the greatness of the orchestra.

To many the collective artistry of the orchestra and its conductor was best evidenced in the exciting and exotic reading of "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite of orchestral excerpts from the ballet by Ravel. Here was a work that tested the technical ability of the individual musician and was conducted with an electrifying verve by the conductor. It was exuberantly intoxicating and a revelation in descriptive music.

Tchaikovsky

To lovers of true symphony music the Tchaikovsky "Fifth Symphony" in E Minor furnished the big thrill of the evening. The wealth of melody, the intensely emotional expression contained in the music, were exquisitely brought in the spirit and superb proportion of the reading.

The beauty and melody of the second movement, "Andante Cantabile," was breathtaking. The "Valse" was charming in its tonal unity and the thrilling "Finale" majestic and sparkling in turn, resulted in a definite pause before the salvos of applause became to beat. This was an indication of the supreme enjoyment of the evening and Dr. Koussevitzky brought the orchestra to its feet to share the ovation.

It was a performance that redounded to the glory of the orchestra and its leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD
DEC 13 1933

* * *

When the Boston Symphony orchestra begins its second series of concerts over a National Broadcasting company network on Saturday, Dec. 23, Arthur F. Edes will again be at the microphone as announcer and commentator.

Concise, straightforward and intelligent, Edes' introductions add substantially to the enjoyment of the music and to the brief addresses by Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the symphony.

Arthur F. Edes is one of radio's real pioneers. More than eight years ago, nine years next month, to be exact, he started his long term of microphone affiliation at WBZ, NBC Boston affiliate.

Edes, whose identification tag in those days was "EFA," his initials in reverse order, became program director of WBZ before forsaking that station in September, 1925, for WEEI.

Edes holds the distinction of having presided at the microphone during the Boston Symphony's first radio program in 1926, which was broadcast over WEEI and WCSH.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 12 1933

Boston Symphony Opens Season's Civic Concerts

The Civic Music series raised the curtain on another season's concerts last night at the Auditorium, where the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing under the baton of the famed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a brilliant concert for the largest civic music audience to date.

The orchestra made its first Worcester appearance within the period of a rather short memory and it upheld all the traditions and all the standards which made it a greatly talked about institution, especially in the music capitals of America which it toured last year. A few more cities will have the advantage of hearing Doctor Koussevitzky's players again this season.

The composers who have tried to catch the music of the wind and put it down in notes had all failed, it would seem, to have taken account of last night's gale.

Gale Adds Discordant Note

The program had opened with Mozart's "Cina Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for strings, a delightful flowing bit of music which was well received. The full orchestra had assembled for the prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky. A rumble was heard back stage. Doctor Koussevitzky waited. The rumble rose and fell. Still he waited. The audience was getting uneasy. One could hear the rumble back under the rear balcony.

At last the conductor lifted his baton, and the music went on. But the rumble also went on, now louder, now falling but still rumbling. Finally Doctor Koussevitzky rapped his stand and walked off the stage. Then Hamilton B. Wood appeared on the stage and informed the audience that the gale had ripped loose a skylight over the stage and that it would soon be battened down securely, eliminating the rumble from the symphonic effort.

Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe" ballet closed the first half of the program.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony

The main and best work of the evening was done in Tchaikovsky's E Minor Symphony. Through all four movements the orchestra played splendidly, ever responsive to rapid changes in tempo, in tone and in volume, to a conductor who labored mightily as he went through the major work of his Russian compatriot.

Dr. Koussevitzky has several peculiarities as a conductor, not in the quality of his music, but in the technique of his direction. He conducts rather easily, if the first part of the program is any criterion, working up gradually to the high points of his program.

If you sit behind him you may see only that he keeps his tempo with the baton in his right hand and that he moves his music up and down with pointed directions with his left, when necessity arises. But if you see him from the side directing a major piece like the Tchaikovsky symphony you will be sure he talks continually to his players, pleading, cajoling, commanding—with a skill which has brought the Boston organization to a high point of music excellence.

The large audience pleaded, too, for more, but nothing follows a symphony.

Last night's concert was an auspicious opening for the series. The large audience was indicative of the growing interest in Worcester of the civic music movement, which by now must have impressed the musically inclined with the assurance that it is undoubtedly here to stay.

W. E. H.

PHILIP HALE TO BROADCAST

From Symphony Hall comes the news that Philip Hale, for many years music editor of The Boston Herald, and author of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program books since 1901, will broadcast with the orchestra when it goes on the air for the first time this season on the evening of Dec. 23. The broadcast will come from Symphony hall and the concert will be one of the regular series.

Herald Dec. 14

Trans Dec 13

An illustrious violinist and an illustrious pianist will soon return to Boston. . . . On Sunday afternoon, Jan. 7, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Heifetz will join Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra in a concert for its Pension Fund. . . . On Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, in Jordan Hall, Miss Hess will play for the first time in Boston this season.

Impending Joys in The Concert-Halls

Trans Dec 14/33

The New Hymn of Markevitch, Whithorne en Voyage, Ravel Again?

TWO new pieces will begin the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. First stands an Introduction and Hymn by Igor Markevitch, announced for performance early last month, deferred because of lacking but necessary orchestral parts. Mr Markevitch—almost needless to recall—is the Russo-Parisian modernist, whose "Rebus," music to an imaginary ballet, distressed some and impressed others when Dr. Koussevitzky included it, last April, in concerts at both Boston and New York. Out of it spoke a youthful composer, born into a modernist time, accepting naturally its notions of music, absorbing as naturally its procedures, into both infusing a fertility and vitality of his own. He continues as such in the Introduction and Hymn now to be heard.

"Both pieces," writes A. H. M., "are detached from an 'Introduction and Three Hymns' produced in Paris last spring. The Introduction and Second Hymn move at slow pace; while the First and the Third Hymn are fast and keenly rhythmed. Similarities of mood between the Introduction and the Second Hymn, between the First and the Third Hymn persuaded Dr. Koussevitzky to play only one of the two pairs. He chose accordingly the Introduction and the First Hymn. The Introduction is rather short, with comparatively rhapsodic solo-passages for woodwinds throughout its course. The First Hymn is closely packed with modern counterpoint, moving in many high-powered rhythms simultaneously heard, using, besides, the devices of the most modern harmony. It proceeds in direct line of cumulative effect to the climax in full brass. Whether one likes the Hymn or not, it suggests in the reading a tonic, stimulating music."

Enter Mr. Whithorne

The second new piece is "Moon Trail," suite for orchestra by Emerson Whithorne, American composer now gaining place for the first time in the Symphony Concerts. He is at the end of his forties: dwells and works in New York; has written much music in many forms and moods. More or less of it is published. More or less has been variously played. By report he "stands between radicals and conservatives"; mixes "cosmopolitanism" and "Americanism"; writes "utility music" without a blush. His own predilections, as set forth in an article printed in Modern Music, run to "eternal" rather than "unstable things"; to "inspiration" rather than "cerebral commotion"; to "simplicity" rather than "complexity," but not to "a simplicity bordering on the banal."

Californian Panorama

Residence and travel in California three years ago touched Mr. Whithorne's imagination and generated the suite now in hand at Symphony Hall. Visiting a desert region of steaming clay and mounds of volcanic débris, he saw in imagination "the moon, a lone huntress, following this trail through the ages, witnessing earth's upheavals and man's tragedies in these strange places. For the purposes of composition he found contrast in the green hills of the coast; climax in the battling elements through the surf at Malibu, a rocky shore not far from Santa Monica. Accordingly he made this program for the four divisions of the Suite:

I. Death Valley—Over its fiery sands caravans have trailed to Death's lone hunting ground. Through the ages whirlwinds have done their twisting dervish dance across its burning floor. Thirsting and seared, brave men have sunk down to mingle their bones with these hungry sands—Death Valley.

II. The Devil's Kitchen—Great cinder-heaps tossed up by angry Gods; scalding jets of hissing steam shot out of boiling caldrons of liquid clay; one vast desert of loneliness where the wild jackass wanders complaining the long night through. Here the Devil's minions stir the pot and mix the brew, in this, the Devil's Kitchen.

III. Palos Verdes—High above the Pacific the verdant hills drowse in the heat of a summer afternoon. Emerald oaks cast rich shadows down velvet slopes. As in a dream tall ships move below across the mirror of placid waters.

IV. Surf at Malibu—Booming and roaring, the surf pounds out its mighty rhythm. Piled high on the shore by the western winds, it plays a Titans game of destruction. And through the clash of storms and wind and sea we hear Neptune's gusty laughter.

More Ravel?

Gossip goes that in the course of the season Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanromá will return to the Piano-Concerto of Ravel, first heard at Symphony Hall in the spring of 1932. Then the performance was hastily prepared; did neither the composer, the conductor, nor the pianist full justice. In itself the piece deserves to be newly studied and newly played—the more as it has steadily gained merit and vogue on both sides of the sea. In London and Paris it is now established and be-praised item in the current repertory. In New York, last week, Mr. Bauer forsook his classic Germans and recalled his Parisian years to play the piano-part with Mr. Walter and the Philharmonic Society.

The pianist distinguished himself; the audience rose to him and to the concerto; most of the reviews took the music for what it is—at beginning and end a game of skill, wit and fancy; relieved midway by an interlude of poetized sentiment. To be engaging and entertaining, as Ravel undoubtedly is throughout the Concerto, are as clear titles as thought or passion to place in well rounded and well diversified symphony concerts.

For Rimsky

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of Rimsky-Korsakov by a program drawn wholly from his music. It will begin with the early "Fairy Tale"; continue with the little-known "Night on Mount Triglav," from the opera, "Mlada"; end with the familiar "Scheherazade."

---

program.

For The Holidays

Trans Dec 15

Music and Dance

IN a year of innovation at Symphony Hall it considers also the children. For them it has put together a new entertainment, by title "Morning Varieties," first to be seen and heard on Saturday, Dec. 30, at eleven o'clock. To begin Mr. Fiedler and the little orchestra that he calls the Sinfonietta playing the overture to the opera, "Mignon," dances from Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker" ballet, Handel's Largo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee." For middle numbers, dances by Hans Wiener and his troupe—the waltzes, "Wine, Woman and Song"; a fairy pantomime, "The Princess and the Frog King," the amusing "Circus," other numbers. To conclude: the film of the Three Little Pigs and the Big Bad Wolf." . . . As likely as not there will be as many adults as children in the audience; but only the children will receive souvenirs.

90

a good start in

MUSIC

Globe Dec 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With his symphonic suite "Moon Trails," played from manuscript for the first time anywhere, Emerson Whithorne, the contemporary American composer, makes an initial appearance upon a Boston Symphony program this week. Igor Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" are given first performances in America, and Jean Bedetti appears as cello soloist in Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody "Solomon." Yet, in the face of all this, Beethoven literally and figuratively speaks the last word through the majesty of his C-minor Symphony.

In so far as imaginative power and emotion are concerned, Mr Whithorne's "Moon Trails" proved by far the more important of the new music. Sketched during a visit to California three years ago and orchestrated in New York last Winter, this symphonic suite endeavors to depict the scenic details of Death Valley, the Devil's Kitchen, the idyllic peace of the green heights of Palos Verdes above the rolling Pacific, and the roar of the surf upon the beach at Malibu. Yet on his own word, Mr Whithorne intended to make these "far more than nature pictures, rather man's struggle and suffering in nature's mighty laboratory."

Created by a man of strong esthetic convictions contrary to those now in vogue in the smarest musical society, this score is decidedly interesting, well written for orchestra and worthy of repetition. Not only are Mr Whithorne's thoughts conveyed more or less graphically, but there is beauty of tone and timbre for its own sake. And beauty is always welcome nowadays to the groping wanderer through the intricacies of contemporary musical geometry. It makes no great difference that occasionally Mr Whithorne echoes celebrated composers of the past. He was present to receive personally the plaudits of a pleased audience.

Mr Bedetti played the solo portions of Bloch's magnificent Rhapsody as if inspired. Perhaps he was, for this score is one of the most notable of the first quarter of the present century. Bloch speaks his own musical tongue, one distinguished by fastidiousness of style and variety of instrumental color. Into this rhapsody he poured the proverbially intense feeling of his race. Though the work is prolix, every note rings with sincerity. Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the orchestral part was likewise remarkable.

Igor Markevitch, who has turned 21 since his "Rebus" shattered the relative peace of Symphony Hall last April, wrote an "Introduction and Three Hymns," which were first heard in Paris last Spring. Dr Koussevitzky has elected to play only the Introduction and the first Hymn this week. They are plenty. No one can justifiably assail Markevitch's precocious grasp of his trade. But beyond technical competence there is little in this score worthy of note. Esthetic substance, warmth of feeling are sacrificed to the writing of strictly "absolute" music in a bare, cold style. Beginning quietly, the two pieces rise steadily in a crescendo that finds a climax at the end of the Hymn. Whatever melody there is in the Introduction has utterly faded from one's memory; nothing remains but an impression of nervous bustle and of complex, tangled counterpoint.

The memory of Rimsky-Korsakov, now dead 25 years, will be honored at the Boston Symphony concerts next week by a program devoted to his works.

C. W. D.

FIRST OF POP CONCERTS AT COPLEY-PLAZA TOMORROW

A series of Pop concerts, the first of which is to be presented tomorrow afternoon from 4:30 to 6 o'clock, will be offered at the Copley-Plaza every Sunday afternoon during the Winter, it was announced yesterday. The management invites music lovers to attend.

Meyer Davis' Concert Orchestra has arranged a variety of programs, which include the works of the old masters as well as the best of the moderns. Soloists of national repute will be heard occasionally, and it is planned to give young American composers an opportunity to offer their best works to Copley-Plaza patrons.

MUSIC

Herald Dec 16

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Ochestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the ninth concert of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Whithorne
Moon Trail, Suite (first performance)
Markevitch .... Introduction and Hymn (first performance in America)
Block .....Schelomo, Hebrew Rhapsody for cello and orchestra, Soloist: Jean Bedetti
Beethoven .... Symphony No. 5 in C minor

Mr. Whithorne writes better music than program explanations of that music. His suite is evidently supposed (from the description on the score) to be a sort of spiritual travelogue to some of the most sensational scenes in nature. The music is intended to suggest such spots as Death Valley and the surf at Malibu in California. But in truth the music is far more suggestive without the appended interpretations. It is original music, in that it does not give conventional program expression to the scenes to be described. For example the third part of the suite, the "verdant hills drowsing in the heat of a summer afternoon," is no regulation pastoral intermezzo. Nor is the "Surf at Malibu" typical sea music. Mr. Whithorne has used a large orchestra and used it freely in his own way, and the result is program music of singular charm. Mr. Whithorne was present in the audience and received considerable applause.

Markevitch's Introduction and Hymn is a disappointment for at least one who had some faith in the "darling of the Paris salons." Whatever there was of cleverness and wit in "Rebus" has been haughtily suppressed in this newer work. The introduction is incredibly thin, without any rythmic interest to sustain it. The hymn is jerky and confused rather than articulate. The music of this "new" Markevitch belong to the "back-to-the-child-and-the-savage" movement, so well exemplified in the drawings of Jean cocteau in one of that artistic weather-vane's numerous styles. In the case of Markevitch the fairy tale has been reversed: the darling has become the ugly duckling.

In a backhanded way it was a triumph for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra to be able to give an effective reading to the Introduction and Hymn. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Whithorne Suite was highly impressive; and it is a good sample of the orchestra's virtuosity that it could at once shift from Markevitch to the more sonorous quality required by Bloch in his Hebrew Rhapsody. Mr. Bedetti played the solo part admirably without overdoing the voluptuous nature of the music. He played with intense feeling and yet effortlessly and without any exhibitionism.

This Rhapsody of Bloch is certainly one of the finest things he has ever composed. In it there is a really national feeling and without any impression of straining for the definite effect. That, in its ecstacy of national mood, it goes on too long, few will disagree. It is a piece that broods and is filled with an opulant melancholy; an introspective piece and hence too heavy to maintain the atmosphere without some fatigue.

The concert ended with Beethoven's fifth, sending the audience away relieved from the sensation of argument and trial that went automatically with the performance of new works. The orchestra played it with all the animation and precision which has become customary with the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was in no sense stereotyped; some may have found it provocative. The concert next week will commemorate the 25th anniversary of Rimsky-Korsakov's death.

A. W. W.

Post Dec 16

NEW WORKS AND OLD BY SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Fifth Stands Out After New Stuff

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The hero of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was one Ludwig van Beethoven, whose Fifth Symphony put to rout the preceding pieces from the contemporary hands of Emerson Whithorne, Igor Markevitch and Ernest Bloch.

COMPOSER PRESENT

Mr. Whithorne's name appeared yesterday for the first time on a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The piece by which it was represented was a suite, "Moon Trail," inspired by scenes in the American Southwest and West, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, and then played for the first time anywhere. Separately the four movements of the suite bear the titles, "Death Valley," "The Devil's Kitchen," "Palos Verdes" and "Surf at Malibu."

Here is suggestive matter for music, but Mr. Whithorne has hardly made the most of it. His music, to be sure, does not wholly lack graphic and pictorial quality, but it has little interest and validity in its own right. And there's the rub. In such diverse examples of musical landscape as Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, "By the Shores of Sorrento" in Strauss' early "Aus Italien," or the movement, "Under the Pines," in d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountains," the music itself would appeal and impress were no title provided. The title there is gloss, but not a crutch; with Mr. Whithorne's pieces it is otherwise. The composer, who was present, was warmly received yesterday.

"Introduction and Hymn"

After the youthful Markevitch's witty "Rebus" of last season his "Introduction and Hymn," played yesterday for the first time in America, proved a disappointment. The "Introduction," with its severe simplicity, was promising, but the singularly titled Hymn seemed at first hearing to suffer from a poly-rhythmic complexity that served merely to create an impression of clutter and confusion. The first few measures were, in fact, stimulating. After that monotony resulted.

From Bloch came the Rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelomo," or "Solomon," with Mr. Bedetti as solo 'cellist. Though the fault seemed not to lie in the performance, this music was less effective yesterday than when last heard here, as though the years had robbed it of some of its one-time fervor and magnificence and had left chiefly a residue of gloom. As heard yesterday this Hebrew Rhapsody might almost have borne the title "Jeremiah." Mr. Bedetti was recalled many times.

Beethoven Good to Hear

After so much frustration the forthright music of Beethoven was good to hear. Happily Dr. Koussevitzky has overcome his one-time tendency to turn the Andante con moto into an Adagio espressivo.

If only he would state the germinal motive of the first movement with more of deliberate emphasis and less of agitation, there would be nothing but the highest praise to write of his and the orchestra's present version of the Symphony.

The audience heard this familiar masterpiece gladly.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Friday evening, January 5. HENRY LEE HIGGINSON organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, with GEORG HENSCHEL as conductor, and seventy players. The reception of its first concert by public and press was friendly, and in three years Mr. (later SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL) welded out of the individual musicians a fine ensemble, which he passed on to WILHELM GERICKE. Since then for fifty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been one of the most distinguished musical organizations in America. Under the great Dr. KARL MUCK the Orchestra reached a degree of perfection noted the world over, which made the tragedy of the war period of hatred and persecution especially bitter. Today SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, double-bass virtuoso, is leading the Orchestra to new heights of perfection. His highly individual interpretations and his adventurous championing of new composers have frightened only those conservatives who are afraid of brilliance. His reduction in the number of soloists is in the tradition of Dr. MUCK, who first forbade singers to come out with an accompanist and temporarily turn the concert into a recital. "KOUSSEVITZKY is the soloist," as more than one critic has noted, and indeed it is he who has supplanted these ladies and gentlemen. It is a great liberation in favor of balanced programs and a fuller repertory.

From Ardmore, Pa., and from New London, Ct., music lovers traveled to the Institute on December 8 to hear ROSA PONSELLE. The golden voice of this American prima donna thrilled a huge audience that called for encore after encore. No singer in recent years has received a greater ovation from an Institute audience.

90

MUSIC

Globe Dec 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With his symphonic suite "Moon Trails," played from manuscript for the first time anywhere, Emerson Whithorne, the contemporary American composer, makes an initial appearance upon a Boston Symphony program this week. Igor Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" are given first performances in America, and Jean Bedetti appears as cello soloist in Ernest Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody "Solomon." Yet, in the face of all this, Beethoven literally and figuratively speaks the last word through the majesty of his C-minor Symphony.

In so far as imaginative power and emotion are concerned, Mr Whithorne's "Moon Trails" proved by far the more important of the new music. Sketched during a visit to California three years ago and orchestrated in New York last Winter, this symphonic suite endeavors to depict the scenic details of Death Valley, the Devil's Kitchen, the idyllic peace of the green heights of Palos Verdes above the rolling Pacific, and the roar of the surf upon the beach at Malibu. Yet on his own word, Mr Whithorne intended to make these "far more than nature pictures, rather man's struggle and suffering in nature's mighty laboratory."

Created by a man of strong esthetic convictions contrary to those now in vogue in the smarest musical society, this score is decidedly interesting, well written for orchestra and worthy of repetition. Not only are Mr Whithorne's thoughts conveyed more or less graphically, but there is beauty of tone and timbre for its own sake. And beauty is always welcome nowadays to the groping wanderer through the intricacies of contemporary musical geometry. It makes no great difference that occasionally Mr Whithorne echoes celebrated composers of the past. He was present to receive personally the plaudits of a pleased audience.

Mr Bedetti played the solo portions of Bloch's magnificent Rhapsody as if inspired. Perhaps he was, for this score is one of the most notable of the first quarter of the present century. Bloch speaks his own musical tongue, one distinguished by fastidiousness of style and variety of instrumental color. Into this rhapsody he poured the proverbially intense feeling of his race. Though the work is prolix, every note rings with sincerity. Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the orchestral part was likewise remarkable.

Igor Markevitch, who has turned 21 since his "Rebus" shattered the relative peace of Symphony Hall last April, wrote an "Introduction and Three Hymns," which were first heard in Paris last Spring. Dr Koussevitzky has elected to play only the Introduction and the first Hymn this week. They are plenty. No one can justifiably assail Markevitch's precocious grasp of his trade. But beyond technical competence there is little in this score worthy of note. Esthetic substance, warmth of feeling are sacrificed to the writing of strictly "absolute" music in a bare, cold style. Beginning quietly, the two pieces rise steadily in a crescendo that finds a climax at the end of the Hymn. Whatever melody there is in the Introduction has utterly faded from one's memory; nothing remains but an impression of nervous bustle and of complex, tangled counterpoint.

The memory of Rimsky-Korsakov, now dead 25 years, will be honored at the Boston Symphony concerts next week by a program devoted to his works.

C. W. D.

FIRST OF POP CONCERTS AT COPLEY-PLAZA TOMORROW

A series of Pop concerts, the first of which is to be presented tomorrow afternoon from 4:30 to 6 o'clock, will be offered at the Copley-Plaza every Sunday afternoon during the Winter, it was announced yesterday. The management invites music lovers to attend.

Meyer Davis' Concert Orchestra has arranged a variety of programs, which include the works of the old masters as well as the best of the moderns. Soloists of national repute will be heard occasionally, and it is planned to give young American composers an opportunity to offer their best works to Copley-Plaza patrons.

MUSIC

Herald Dec 16

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Ochestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the ninth concert of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Whithorne
Moon Trail, Suite (first performance)
Markevitch .... Introduction and Hymn
(first performance in America)
Block .....Schelomo, Hebrew Rhapsody for cello and orchestra, Soloist: Jean Bedetti
Beethoven .... Symphony No. 5 in C minor

Mr. Whithorne writes better music than program explanations of that music. His suite is evidently supposed (from the description on the score) to be a sort of spiritual travelogue to some of the most sensational scenes in nature. The music is intended to suggest such spots as Death Valley and the surf at Malibu in California. But in truth the music is far more suggestive without the appended interpretations. It is original music, in that it does not give conventional program expression to the scenes to be described. For example the third part of the suite, the "verdant hills drowsing in the heat of a summer afternoon," is no regulation pastoral intermezzo. Nor is the "Surf at Malibu" typical sea music. Mr. Whithorne has used a large orchestra and used it freely in his own way, and the result is program music of singular charm. Mr. Whithorne was present in the audience and received considerable applause.

Markevitch's Introduction and Hymn is a disappointment for at least one who had some faith in the "darling of the Paris salons." Whatever there was of cleverness and wit in "Rebus" has been haughtily suppressed in this newer work. The introduction is incredibly thin, without any rythmic interest to sustain it. The hymn is jerky and confused rather than articulate. The music of this "new" Markevitch belong to the "back-to-the-child-and-the-savage" movement, so well exemplified in the drawings of Jean cocteau in one of that artistic weather-vane's numerous styles. In the case of Markevitch the fairy tale has been reversed: the darling has become the ugly duckling.

In a backhanded way it was a triumph for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra to be able to give an effective reading to the Introduction and Hymn. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Whithorne Suite was highly impressive; and it is a good sample of the orchestra's virtuosity that it could at once shift from Markevitch to the more sonorous quality required by Bloch in his Hebrew Rhapsody. Mr. Bedetti played the solo part admirably without overdoing the voluptuous nature of the music. He played with intense feeling and yet effortlessly and without any exhibitionism.

This Rhapsody of Bloch is certainly one of the finest things he has ever composed. In it there is a really national feeling and without any impression of straining for the definite effect. That, in its ecstacy of national mood, it goes on too long, few will disagree. It is a piece that broods and is filled with an opulant melancholy; an introspective piece and hence too heavy to maintain the atmosphere without some fatigue.

The concert ended with Beethoven's fifth, sending the audience away relieved from the sensation of argument and trial that went automatically with the performance of new works. The orchestra played it with all the animation and precision which has become customary with the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was in no sense stereotyped; some may have found it provocative. The concert next week will commemorate the 25th anniversary of Rimsky-Korsakov's death.

A. W. W.

Post Dec 16

NEW WORKS AND OLD BY SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Fifth Stands Out After New Stuff

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The hero of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was one Ludwig van Beethoven, whose Fifth Symphony put to rout the preceding pieces from the contemporary hands of Emerson Whithorne, Igor Markevitch and Ernest Bloch.

COMPOSER PRESENT

Mr. Whithorne's name appeared yesterday for the first time on a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The piece by which it was represented was a suite, "Moon Trail," inspired by scenes in the American Southwest and West, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, and then played for the first time anywhere. Separately the four movements of the suite bear the titles, "Death Valley," "The Devil's Kitchen," "Palos Verdes" and "Surf at Malibu."

Here is suggestive matter for music, but Mr. Whithorne has hardly made the most of it. His music, to be sure, does not wholly lack graphic and pictorial quality, but it has little interest and validity in its own right. And there's the rub. In such diverse examples of musical landscape as Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, "By the Shores of Sorrento" in Strauss' early "Aus Italien," or the movement, "Under the Pines," in d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountains," the music itself would appeal and impress were no title provided. The title there is gloss, but not a crutch; with Mr. Whithorne's pieces it is otherwise. The composer, who was present, was warmly received yesterday.

"Introduction and Hymn"

After the youthful Markevitch's witty "Rebus" of last season his "Introduction and Hymn," played yesterday for the first time in America, proved a disappointment. The "Introduction," with its severe simplicity, was promising, but the singularly titled Hymn seemed at first hearing to suffer from a poly-rhythmic complexity that served merely to create an impression of clutter and confusion. The first few measures were, in fact, stimulating. After that monotony resulted.

From Bloch came the Rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelomo," or "Solomon," with Mr. Bedetti as solo 'cellist. Though the fault seems not to lie in the performance, this music was less effective yesterday than when last heard here, as though the years had robbed it of some of its one-time fervor and magnificence and had left chiefly a residue of gloom. As heard yesterday this Hebrew Rhapsody might almost have borne the title "Jeremiah." Mr. Bedetti was recalled many times.

Beethoven Good to Hear

After so much frustration the forthright music of Beethoven was good to hear. Happily Dr. Koussevitzky has overcome his one-time tendency to turn the Andante con moto into an Adagio espressivo.

If only he would state the germinal motive of the first movement with more of deliberate emphasis and less of agitation, there would be nothing but the highest praise to write of his and the orchestra's present version of the Symphony.

The audience heard this familiar masterpiece gladly.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Friday evening, January 5. Henry Lee Higginson organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, with Georg Henschel as conductor, and seventy players. The reception of its first concert by public and press was friendly, and in three years Mr. (later Sir George Henschel) welded out of the individual musicians a fine ensemble, which he passed on to Wilhelm Gericke. Since then for fifty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been one of the most distinguished musical organizations in America. Under the great Dr. Karl Muck the Orchestra reached a degree of perfection noted the world over, which made the tragedy of the war period of hatred and persecution especially bitter. Today Serge Koussevitzky, double-bass virtuoso, is leading the Orchestra to new heights of perfection. His highly individual interpretations and his adventurous championing of new composers have frightened only those conservatives who are afraid of brilliance. His reduction in the number of soloists is in the tradition of Dr. Muck, who first forbade singers to come out with an accompanist and temporarily turn the concert into a recital. "Koussevitzky is the soloist," as more than one critic has noted, and indeed it is he who has supplanted these ladies and gentlemen. It is a great liberation in favor of balanced programs and a fuller repertory.

From Ardmore, Pa., and from New London, Ct., music lovers traveled to the Institute on December 8 to hear Rosa Ponselle. The golden voice of this American prima donna thrilled a huge audience that called for encore after encore. No singer in recent years has received a greater ovation from an Institute audience.

91

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 17 1933

REMINISCENCES OF ARBOS

Spanish Conductor on 70th Birthday Recalls Long and Vivid Career

By OLIN DOWNES.

ON the 24th of December Enrique Fernandez Arbos celebrates his seventieth birthday. As violin virtuoso, teacher and conductor he has been signally honored in many lands, and it is significant that, in spite of revolution, every succeeding government or Cabinet in Spain has been well disposed toward the activities of Arbos and of the Symphonic Orchestra of Madrid, which, with intervening tours and appearances as "guest" leader in many lands, he has conducted since 1904.

Arbos first appeared before an American orchestra when he became concertmaster of the Boston Symphony in 1904. He was one of the guest conductors of the New York Symphony Orchestra in the last season of its existence. Since that time he has appeared as guest conductor with most of the leading American orchestras. These appearances have conspicuously advanced his experience and reputation. Yet it may be said in no place has his career exerted so great an influence in music as in his native land.

* * *

Born in Madrid Dec. 24, 1863, the descendant of generations of musicians, he was precociously gifted. He had had experience as conductor with various European orchestras when he accepted the position of head of the Orquesta Sinfonica in 1904, but his appearances as leader in other lands than Spain have never severed this close association with the orchestra of Madrid, and with that body he has toured all parts of his own country.

This writer accompanied Mr. Arbos on laps of his tour several years ago in Spain, and the experience was unforgetable. There is nothing like the tour of this orchestra in America, either as regards the functions of conductor and orchestra, or the attitude of the public. The orchestra gathers together, apparently without warning, in the Spring, and is off to its first stopping place. It performed Beethoven's Ninth symphony one evening in Barcelona before an audience of 6,000-odd. It played in bull rings and theatres and civic edifices of all sorts and denominations, according to the district, and the size of the city. Its audiences gathered in apparently the same hit-or-miss fashion as the orchestra traveled. The players might be dead from an eighteen-hour trip on a train. They would bundle off, hold a hurried rehearsal, go to the theatre at 9 P. M. and gave a concert that lasted till 12. Then on the train again, and a night journey, and an afternoon concert in one place and an evening concert in another near by.

The orchestra was not subsidized. Conductor and men divided proceeds of the concerts according to the terms of a gentlemen's agreement.

As a matter of fact, no concert is remembered that had less than a crowded house, and this obtained whether the theatre was large or small. Those theatres, those audiences, in some little, baked, dreaming Spanish town, were things to be remembered—the wild enthusiasm over the symphony of César Franck or the Fifth symphony of Beethoven; the fluttering of fans to a light opera overture by Jiminez, and other Spanish music, sparkling, riant, but music which Arbos, in most cases, refused to attempt to transplant for his audiences over seas.

* * *

Sights and sounds of the route are indelible in the memory: the Spanish roads that wound over flat plains and the occasional muleteer with his animal and baskinets; the old cities and Roman aqueducts; the antique gate of Toledo. The way the Spaniards played Schubert: they might be tired, there might be a ragged attack; the orchestra was nevertheless astonishingly alive, brilliant, eloquent, for the men loved their music and they loved their leader, who also loved them and music, and was a conductor without pretensions, who cherished within him the sacred flame, and understood his men, and lived and worked and was exhausted with them.

Hearing recently of approaching festivities and honors to be extended Señor Arbos in his own land, this commentator wrote and asked for some reminiscences, which will later be put in finished literary form as part of a book of the conductor's memoirs. A few of these reminiscences, in Mr. Arbos's own words, follow:

"In order to give an idea in limited space of the evolution of symphonic music and that of the public in Spain, I shall recall a few instances from my experience.

"I shall copy the program of the orchestra of the year 1888 under the direction of Breton. Like others, it is very characteristic of the period, for it was selected by popular vote and gives an exact idea of the dominating niveau. The votes amounted to 1,180:

Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Minuetto	Solzoni
Melodia—Momento musical	Schubert
Polonaise de Struensee	Meyerbeer
Fantasia Morisca	Chapi
Overture of Cleopatra	Mancinelli
Variations of the sonata in A	Beethoven
March of the Torches, No. 3	Meyerbeer

"The following may be accepted as a summary of the transformation that was effected. First I introduced Bach. I recall that when we played the Brandenburg concerto in G major for three violins, three violas, three violoncellos and three basses, two encores were clamored for. A voice from the public shouted 'Gracias a Dios! This is music!' I also played all the orchestral compositions by Brahms, Schumann and those by Strauss, from 'Don Juan' to 'Heldenleben.' I followed with the French school, 'L'Après-midi d'un faune' (hissed), 'L'apprenti sórcier' (very poorly received), the symphony by César Franck, and gradually I introduced all modern music, and 'L'oiseau de feu,' by Stravinsky was played at Madrid before we had seen the Ballet Russe. Also all the Russian school, like the poems by Scriabin. A later program follows:

First Part.
"Iberia"	Debussy
Second Part.
"Sacre du printemps	Stravinsky
Third Part.
"Ma mere l'oye"	Ravel
"Daphnis et Cloe"	Ravel

* * *

"Together with this, the essential part of my effort has been to impose on the Spanish public its own composers. Indeed, I was honored to be the first to present many names enjoying today universal fame—Granados, Albeniz, Falla, Espla, Turina, Conrado del Campo, Halffter and others.

"Such has been our work in Madrid, and, as we shall see, I succeeded in extending it all over Spain. It occurred to me to travel in a manner which may not be comprehended in many countries—namely, to launch myself on adventure and the orchestra with me. I intended because of its great importance to go first to Barcelona, and although everybody tried to dissuade me, I had confidence in its public, which I had known already from my activity as a violinist, soloist and member of a quartet. An emissary was sent to this town on the Mediterranean in order to obtain subscriptions to a series of concerts. The evening before our planned departure we received the intelligence that nobody—absolutely nobody—had subscribed. The orchestra decided that under such conditions the planned trip had to be abandoned. I decided that I would leave on the following day and that everybody who cared to could join me. The unanimous response was that the orchestra would join me if there were a certain guarantee of money. I did then what Hernan Cortez had done when burning his ships behind him: I told my musicians that there was a fat quantity waiting for us, while in reality wasn't a centimo.

"The night of the first concert the audience was very small. I don't know how rumor got around, but after each intermission the audience increased, and we finished the concert with the hall almost entirely full. It was a tremendous success. Five more concerts followed, and after each I was made to come down from the stage, and the public, women and men, the latter with their heads uncovered, accompanied me through the streets to my hotel.

"The curious thing is that in the smaller places, where an orchestra was heard for the first time, music which one would think would provoke a success like the symphonies by Tchaikovsky, the overture "1812," &c., left the public cold. But Bach, Beethoven or Wagner aroused their emotion and enthusiasm. Prejudice and snobbism is entirely strange to this public of mine in shirtsleeves and sandals, consisting almost entirely of toilers of the field. When they applauded, they did it standing. Some cried, and I remember having overheard one night a comment made by a peasant to his friend: '... Caramba! And to think that after having listened to such music we have to harness now our mules and till the earth.'

"In some villages, like, for instance, Burriana, where no theatres existed, we had to play in an orange warehouse adorned with flowers. Or we had to play in the bull ring. There was not a hotel, and the orchestra was lodged with different families in the village.

"I remember that once when there was a bull-fight in the afternoon and our concert had been scheduled the same evening, the first part of the festive activity was not up to popular standard. As the public is very independent and employs very excessive forms of showing its criterion, they intended to burn the bull ring. There was lots of noise, and the gendarmerie was called out. An hour later we were to play 'Parsifal' with the Choral Society of San Sebastian. Indeed, I was very much afraid of the state of mind of the public, but the people who had carried on as described in the afternoon listened with such deep feeling that there was in the bull ring an atmosphere which can only be compared to that inspired by religion in a church.

* * *

Concert-Chronicle

Old Order Changes Trans Dec 18

THE RESCUE of the program-books of the Symphony Orchestra from senile decay goes on apace. Last spring when music of Markevitch appeared for the first time in them, he and it received barely a page. Last week, when his "Introduction and Hymn" came to hearing adequate, informing and interesting description of composer and piece was spread over six pages. The other novel number, Mr. Whithorne's Suite, "Moon Trail," was as intelligently and generously treated. Gone is the old crabbedness when a new work by a living, "modern" composer was in hand.

Others, still debatable and disliked, now receive becoming justice. In 1931, when Mahler's Ninth Symphony was produced for the first time in America, the program-book contained little or no description. Two weeks ago the whole course of the music was set out clearly. Deservedly the name of the new editor, who has made these betterments, Mr. J. N. Burk, now appears on the title-page. With him for the moderns and the editor emeritus for the "standard repertory," the program-books bid fair to regain their former quality and place.

From Saturday

With audiences, if not with reviewers, Markevitch and his music make their way. At the end of the "Introduction and Hymn" on Saturday came quick, widespread, warm applause, enough to recall Dr. Koussevitzky twice and to salute the standing orchestra, which had overcome exactions that not half their hearers suspected. . . . At both concerts Mr. Whithorne and his new Suite, "Moon Trail," were no less well received. . . . Long and hearty applause called the composer from his modest place. But, as modestly, he would go no farther than the head of the aisle to return thanks to both conductor and audience . . . The more adept listeners also noted that Dr. Koussevitzky now takes the slow movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony at a quicker pace than of old, agreeing at last to the "Andante" that Beethoven wrote over it as direction.

Dr. Koussevitzky And the Classics

Trans. Dec. 19

IT was indeed a program of classics that Dr. Koussevitzky prepared for last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy, Ravel, each in an accepted masterpiece. From Beethoven there was the third overture to "Leonore," from Debussy two of the "Nocturnes"—"Clouds" and "Festivals"——from Ravel the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloé," and from Brahms the First Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in D minor with Leonard Shure as soloist.

Mr. Shure is still a young man of twenty-three who has already gone far as pianist. A pupil of Schnabel, it can be heard that he is the "greatest" of the great man's pupils Be that as it may, by his performance of last evening he gives promise of becoming a pianist of the first water. Brahms's concerto is hardly one with which to win easy popular acclaim. Yet the signs of approval continued loud and long after the concerto last evening. In fact memory would have to go back a long time to recall an occasion which brought forth an equal amount of applause. For this young man technic has evidently long since become "mere technic." Difficulties he tosses off without taking thought over them or seemingly being aware of their existence. Technic has for him become a tool which he may use when and as he wishes. His tone is resonant and firm and at times keen-edged rather than of great sensuous charm. It is a tone for the noble things of music rather than for its sentiments and sentimentalities.

It was as a pianist dealing with the noble things of music that Mr. Shure prevailed last evening. The breadths and largenesses of Brahms's first movement appeared to create no problems for him. The somewhat ponderous ideas which it contains he proclaimed with a greater sureness than many a pianist would display with a lesser matter. The Adagio came contemplatively, quietly, with all due reserve. The more active rhythms of the last movement heightened the whole scheme of expressive effects. All in all, here is a young pianist who may well bear watching.

As for the orchestral pieces, with them once again Dr. Koussevitzky wrought the magic which it is his wont. The drama of the accused and betrayed Florestan, of the faithful Leonore—and of the thrilling trumpet signals—was once more tellingly unfolded. The subtleties and the languors, the shifting traceries and the gentle dreams of Debussy's "Clouds," the hard brilliance and the gorgeousness, the processional pomp of his "Festivals" again stood entrancingly revealed. And the colorful story of Daphnis and Chloé miming the adventure of Pan and Syrinx, with its preliminary music of a drowsy but glittering dawn, with its arabesques from Pan's flute, with its wild concluding general dance, was once more persuasively told. Last evening it seemed as if never before had the conductor reached an equal climax. Rhythms burned and seared, tensions increased until they were ready to snap, wildness—ordered wildness reigned everywhere.—Once more an audience rose to it. A. H. M.

Into Boston Ears Strange Russian Opera

92

Concert-Version of An Act Of Rimsky's "Mlada" At Symphony Hall

ONCE MORE Dr. Koussevitzky remembers an anniversary. Twenty-five years ago last June Rimsky-Korsakov died at Petersburg. Tomorrow and Saturday the conductor will fill the tenth pair of Symphony Concerts with his music. The program for both begins with the familiar tone-poem, "Sadko"—the legend of the minstrel who fell into the depths of the sea and there by his playing laid spell on the Sea-King's court. It ends with the more familiar and displayful suite, "Scheherazade." Between stands "Night on Mount Tryglav," Rimsky's version for the concert-hall of the third act of his opera-ballet, "Mlada." Only once before has it been heard in Symphony Hall, in 1921 from Mr. Monteux. Seldom has a piece of music had a more curious history. Seldom as well has there been so curious a concoction as this selfsame "Mlada." At one and the same time it is opera, ballet, pantomime and spectacle. The third act, moreover, exists in the concert-form into which Rimsky shaped it before the whole opera was produced.

By word of Rimsky-Korsakov's autobiography, "My Musical Life," it was in the winter of 1869-70 that Gedeonov, then director of the Russian Imperial Theaters, "had conceived the idea of producing a work which should combine ballet, opera and spectacle. For this purpose he had written the program of a stage-performance in four acts on a subject borrowed from the Elba Slavs, and had commissioned V. A. Krylov to work up the text. 'Mlada,' with its mixture of fantasy and every-day reality, was a most grateful subject for musical treatment. Gedeonov asked Cui, Borodin, Musorgsky and myself to compose the music for it. Moreover, Minkus, the official ballet-composer of the Imperial Theaters, was to compose the incidental ballet music." Cui was to do the first act and Borodin the last; while Musorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov were to divide the two middle acts between them. Before the work had progressed far, Gedeonov left his post and the "Mlada affair dropped into oblivion." Musorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," recently heard at the Symphony Concerts, was originally a part of this project. Borodin incorporated parts of what he had written into his opera "Prince Igor."

At the second anniversary of Borodin's death Liadov again brought up the matter of "Mlada," suggesting to Rimsky that he himself work up this material into an opera. The composer at once replied, "'Yes, you are right. I shall set out forthwith to work on this opera-ballet.' Gradually musical ideas came to me and a few days later there was no doubt that I was composing 'Mlada.'" During the following summer (1889) the composer attended the Paris Exposition. Here certain Oriental performances brought out the possibilities of "Mlada" so forcefully, that Rimsky at once began setting ideas on paper. By fall the whole had been sketched. The "Fairy Opera-Ballet, Mlada," in four acts was the result.

The "Night on Mount Tryglav," virtually the third act, is sure to be more fully understood, if it is heard against the background of the rest of the opera. The action passes in the ninth or tenth century in the town of Rhêtra near the River Elbe. The cast of characters includes ordinary mortals (Mstivoi, Prince of Rhêtra, his daughter, Woislava; Yaromir, Prince of Arcône, the High Priest of the temple of Radegast at Rhêtra, Loumir, a Czech singer), divinities (Moréna, infernal goddess, Chernobog, the Black God, Kastschei, the Immortal, whom Stravinsky also used in his "Fire-Bird," Topletz, god of inundations), shades of the departed (Mlada, Cleopatra).

Act I.—Mstivoi, Prince of Rhêtra, reminds Woislava of her promise to seduce Yaromir, Prince of Arcône, since it is highly desirable that Rhêtra possess Arcône. But Woislava is haunted by the shade of Mlada, who has been the betrothed of Yaromir, and whom she has killed at the instigation of her father. She invokes the infernal goddess, Moréna, for aid in winning the love of Yaromir, in return selling herself to Moréna. Yaromir comes in from the hunt, offers his booty to Woislava, whom he finds endowed with new graces (the work of Moréna). He soon falls violently in love with her.

Yaromir, fallen asleep, dreams a dream. The chorus of the Spirits of Light sing to him of pure, constant love, assuring him of their watchfulness over him. First he sees himself in the garden of Arcône with Mlada, then declaring his love. Next he dreams of the nuptial ceremony at which he is to be united with Mlada; discovers there particular friends, Mstivoi and Woislava; sees Woislava present the marriage ring to Mlada, sees her fall dying into his arms, while her soul taking flight in the form of a little star. He awakes from his dream: "'Tis Moréno who took you."

Act II.—Festival of Koupala in the temple of Radegast at Rhêtra. This is a great spectacle. In the carnival crowd one sees Lithuanian warriors, Gypsies, Hindus, a family from Novgorod and a Moor from the Caliphat, merchants, vendors and many others. They pray to Radegast for the success of their several ventures. The princes enter. Mstivoi bids several groups dance for the pleasure of Woislava and Yaromir. The shade of Mlada appears, places itself between the two, prevents them from embracing, disappears. Twice this apparition is repeated. Mlada beckons Yaromir to follow her. He obeys. While the prince renews the festivities with redoubled splendor, Woislava calls upon Moréna for aid in this new peril.

Act III.—To be heard at Symphony Hall—The scenes on Mount Tryglav are the answer to Woislava's prayer to Moréna. Once more the Princess would win Yaromir. We are in a wooded, rocky gorge on the mountain. In the distance the peak is covered with snow and glaciers. Thick clouds obscure the scene. As they break the night is clear but without moonlight. The souls of the departed enter from all sides, eventually fill the stage. They dance a Rondo Fantastique, a slow, light, gliding dance. When they group themselves at the two sides of the stage, a new moon appears in the sky. As it mounts higher and higher, illuminating the mountain top, the shade of Mlada appears at the tip of the peak, transfigured by its rays.

Scene 2.—The shade of Mlada beckons Yaromir to follow her:

> "It is I, dear betrothed!
> It is I; here in our domain
> The domain of souls."

During this scene, the shade of Mlada remains at a distance, inaccessible to Yaromir, while he sings of his love for her ('cellos in concert version).

The Shade answers:

> "Human passion, its wickedness, have broken my live, so young! Alas, one has torn me from thee. But thou art always dear to me. I will know how to defend thee. Always!"

The interchange between the two continues through an Allegretto amoroso. Yaromir tries to reach out to Mlada but she stops him with an imperious gesture. She vanishes. Trying to follow her, Yaromir falls to the ground. There is the noise of subterranean thunder. The shades flee in fright. The moon grows red.

Scene 3.—Chenobog, Kastschei (here the skeleton-man), Moréna, Sabbath of infernal spirits. The music becomes orgiactic. Spirits sorcerers, the black and red mob dance an "Infernal Round." Suddenly stops. Chernobog, in the form of a goat, arises from the ground. Behind him are Kastschei and Moréna. The dance is resumed with renewed frenzy. Moréna appeals to Chernobog for help for Woislava in her pursuit of Yaromir. In answer Chernobog conjures up Scene 4.—The sumptuous court of Cleopatra. Chernobog, Moréna and Kastschei place themselves beside the couches. The soul of Yaromir, in a long white shroud, immobile like a statue, is seen at one side. The soul of Mlada flies toward it, stands behind it, as if to protect it. There are dances to the accompaniment of "Pan's pipes," small clarinets, lyres, other exotic instruments. Cleopatra herself dances a voluptuous dance intended to lure Yaromir. (String unisons, rhapsodic, declamatory). The soul of Yaromir begins to come to life, but acts hesitantly. The shade of Mlada covers its face with its hands and begins to weep. In the orchestra a cock crows. Once more subterranean thunder; clouds.

Scene 5.—Morning. Yaromir alone. The music is that of the beginning of the act. One hears the murmuring of leaves and the warbling of birds. Yaromir recalls his dream. As a ray of sunlight falls upon him he calls upon a priest of Radegast to explain to him the mysteries of what he has experienced, to answer his questionings about Woislava and Mlada.

Act IV—Return to the festival at Radegast. Yaromir enters and tells his dream. Woslava confesses her crime, but pleads her love for Yaromir, urges the union of Arcône with Rhêtra. He scorns her. The forces of Light are triumphant over those of Darkness. The sixth scene shows the destruction of the temple, a tempest, the inundation of Mstivoi's land. Finally, on the heights above the calmed waters Yaromir and Mlada embrace, receive the blessing of the goddess of Light.

For the most part in "Mlada" Rimsky uses an orchestra of Wagnerian dimensions. During his visit to the Paris Exposition, he heard in a Hungarian safé an instrument named "Pan's Pipes." At an Algerian café he was impressed by sudden blows struck upon a large drum at the dancer's approach. He borrowed both for the scene in "Mlada" at Cleopatra's court; to them added lyres and two small clarinets. "All in all," he writes in his Autobiography, "my orchestral contrivances hit the mark."

In a preface to the score Rimsky describes the pipes as "a wind instrument which consists of a series of copper tubes. It is played glissando." The score then indicates the series of tones to which it is tuned. "The sound is similar to that of a piccolo." Rimsky also uses "lyres" which are tuned (as harps can be) to a diminished seventh chord. Another unusual instrument is a tympanum piccolo—a small kettle-drum tuned to the D-flat immediately above middle C, a very high note for a kettle-drum. . . . The music of the concert-version closely follows the action of Act III. At times one hears in it the composer of "Scheherazade." It is possible also from the vantage point of this score to look back at Wagner and forward to Stravinsky.

A.H. M.

Ourselves and Others

Trans Dec 22

At the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow, Dr. Koussevitzky will note the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of Rimsky-Korsakov by a program filled with his music. The three pieces are:

Tone-Poem, "Sadko" (1867)
"Night on Mount Tryglav." Concert Version of the Third Act of the Opera-Ballet, "Mlada" (1893)
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (1887)

In New York, Carl Lange, assistant conductor of the Philharmonic Society, has taken over its concerts between the departure last week of Mr. Walter and the arrival next month of Mr. Toscanini. Conductor and orchestra are heard in these numbers:

Sinfonia, No. 3, for String Orchestra, C. P. E. Bach
Pastoral Symphony.........Vaughan Williams
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz".......Ravel
Suite from the Opera, "Christmas Eve," Rimsky-Korsakov

In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski has set his hand to that difficult matter, the assembling of a Christmas program. Here it is:

Fantasia, for Double String Orchestra on a Theme by Tally's.........Vaughan Williams Trumpet Prelude.........................Purcell
Pastoral Symphony from the Oratorio, "Messiah" ....Handel
Choral Prelude, "Nun komm der Heiland" Bach
Fantasia on Christmas Carols for Orchestra, Chorus and Baritone Voice.Vaughan Williams
Symphony, No. 2, in C major........Schumann

In Chicago, Mr. Stock and his orchestra go their tranquil way with this program:

Ballet-Music from the Opera, "Nuschi-Nuschi" ....Hindemith
Symphony, No. 6, in F major ("The Pastoral") ....Beethoven
Poem of Ecstasy........ ....Skriabin
Dances from the Ballet, "Feramors".Rubinstein

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week for the first time in the fifty-three years of the orchestra, an entire act of an opera will be sung and played, without settings, costumes or action. Dr. Koussevitzky's choice has lighted upon the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre," independent, for the most part, of visualized action. In it Else Alsen will sing the music of Sieglinde; Paul Althouse, that of Siegmund; Fred Patton, the brief interjections of Hunding. To begin the concert, the Bacchanale from the Paris version of "Tannhäuser."

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 7, for the increase of its Pension Fund, Mr. Heifitz will play the solo-part in Elgar's Concerto for Violin, hitherto unheard either at the Symphony Concerts or from the violinist. The full program stands:

Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra........Elgar
Three Hungarian Dances.............Brahms
Bolero .... Ravel

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
[illegible] 2 1933

MUSIC VIEWS

By EUGENE STINSON

MR. STOCK gave us a sort of Christmas program last night, with no Christmas music on it. There were Hindemith's "Nusch-Nuschi" dances, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony," Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy" and the music, which Mr. Stock has begun to make occasional to the holidays, from Rubinstein's "Feramors."

Ever since Mr. Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra here early in the season, I have wished to make a comparison. It is true that visiting orchestras enliven our keenness as to what is possible to the symphonic scope and that the spirit of competition, which is so salutary an element in all life, sometimes leaves the Chicago Symphony public downcast, if only because we know too little of the outside world correctly to place our own orchestra in the general scheme where it belongs.

Its season is now well enough advanced to show us that this year Mr. Stock's orchestra has lost nothing that was valuable to it, and that its gains, if some there be, lie in the direction of a more vigorous and concentrated utilization of these values.

There is no use sidestepping the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Philadelphia orchestra rejoice in a degree of fine, conscious and stimulating grade of workmanship which it is beyond our orchestra's ability—but also its aim—to attain. Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Stokowski bring from their men an intensity and perfection of performance which Mr. Stock does not elicit and which he even seems not to wish for.

The work of these visiting conductors is stirring on this account, and in careless moments I, like others, have found myself envying their respective publics. It is not wise, however, to consider what might be gained, without also considering what might be lost, were Mr. Stock to turn overnight into one or another of the conducting idols of the radio public, and, when they come here, of Chicago.

We know too little of either man to be able to judge of them with safety. We know only their best, which is all any intelligent man would offer unfamiliar publics on the road. We do not know how either of them conduct Beethoven or Brahms, who are two of the test composers, and who have been signally absent, I believe, in the four programs Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have conducted here between them. We know that Mr. Stokowski conducts Debussy with immeasurably more imagination and taste than Mr. Stock. We know that Mr. Koussevitzky conducts Tschaikowsky with more flair and more eloquence. I doubt that either is so versatile, however, and I would wager anything I own that each is less flexible in his talent than the conductor of our own orchestra.

For what Mr. Stock's avoidance of virtuosity really portends is his interest in music rather than in the performance of music. In a way this is a handicap, which I shall discuss later. But fundamentally this is an asset which, year in and year out, no other quality or talent could compensate the lack of. Mr. Stock has now and again permitted all of us to be bored at his concerts. Judging very seriously, I have concluded that I should rather be bored by Mr. Stock than to be disappointed in either Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski.

How, then, could Mr. Stock offset his lack of showmanship? I think he could offset it by abandoning his sometimes unfortunate conciliatory attitude to the public. I think he ought to stop taking away with one hand, in one part of the program, what he grants with and in the other. I think he should never be less than bold in challenging the taste of the public, and never less than sincere in upholding his own.

I think his programs run too frequently to hodge-podge, and far too seldom to concentration upon a single man, a single period, a single aim, in all the manifold and bounteous history of a beautiful and expressive art. In standing for everything in music, Mr. Stock runs the risk of seeming to stand for nothing. And in standing for opposites in one and the same concert he merely mystifies the ignorant and disappoints the enlightened.

But that does not mean he is not a great man and a great conductor. I find him an infallible musician, and the worst experience I can have in Orchestra hall is to hear him conduct a masterpiece I know he loves, and to realize that he is worrying because it has not been sufficiently rehearsed and is keeping his attention less upon its significance and his own reaction to it than on the aid he must render his players. But when everything goes smoothly, Mr. Stock is the most honest musician, where workmanship is concerned, I have ever heard, and from him I hear less performance, but more music, than from any conductor I remember.

MUSICAL AMERICA
N.Y. DEC 25 1933

DECEMBER 25
1933

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Distinguished Russian Conductor Is Now Celebrating His Tenth Season as Baton Chief of the Boston Symphony. During That Time He Has Broken a Lance for Much New Music, but What Is More Important, He Has Been Able to Restore the Boston Symphony to Its Old-Time Place as One of the Pre-eminent Orchestras of the World

---

Front Views and Profiles

By June Provines

Critic—
Executive—
Actor—
Booth—
South Americans

IT is of interest to music lovers, perhaps, that Boston's Philip Hale, probably the best known program annotater in the country, is in town. Mr. Hale writes the program notes for the Boston Symphony orchestra, including, naturally, those in the program when that orchestra played here Monday. Past 80, Mr. Hale, white-haired, slight of build, with a clear blue eye, is spending most of the time quietly with his sister on Burton place. One of the few visitors he has received is Carleton Smith, the young Chicagoan who combines teaching economics at De Paul university with lecturing on music. Despite the fact that Mr. Hale says he finds talking about music disagreeable ("Next to listening to it the next most disagreeable thing is talking about it" is what he actually said), he talked at some length. . . . There is a "lot of rot in Bach," who, he says, repeated many things he had written according to a formula. . . . Mozart, he thinks, was perhaps the greatest of musical geniuses. . . . Walt Whitman wrote the best line ever written in English about music, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instrument." . . . Ernest Newman of the London Times is the greatest living writer about music. . . . Music critic himself for years, he adds that "musical criticism isn't worth a damn."

* *

Concert-Chronicle

Schnabel's Return

THE New York Herald Tribune, which enjoys the confidence of Artur Schnabel announces the pianist's return to the United States for a longer tour through the second half of next season. In the course of it he will play two concertos at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. It appears that "he has expressed admiration for the major Symphony Orchestras of the East and for the Boston Symphony in paritcular. When he was rehearsing with it in 1931, he remembered, he was almost impelled to stop playing to listen to the orchestra itself." He was impressed also by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Golschmann.

For his own concerts next season, he intends to divide two programs between Schubert, Mozart and Beethoven. Each will contain a sonata from Schubert, another from Mozart. To the first he will add Beethoven's far-flung Variations on a Waltz of Diabelli; to the second the so-called "Hammerklavier Sonata," Op. 106. Since Mr. Schnabel drew no small audience last November to his one concert in Boston, he and his managers might safely risk two in this second and longer tour. Mr. Schnabel, finally thought well of the young American pianists who sought his advice; noted their preference for Mozart and Beethoven as compared with Liszt and Grieg; found audiences like-minded and uncommonly responsive.

At Acme

Though it is three days afterward, this chronicle returns briefly and unabashed to the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, because throughout conductor and orchestra gained and sustained the highest pitch of performance, thus far, in the musical year. Whether they were playing "Sadko," "Scheherazade" or the concert-piece from "Mlada," they joined the utmost technical skill with tone, accent and color to full understanding and feeling for the music in hand; so conveyed it to their audience; so attained the ultimate goal of performance. The more the pity that the preoccupations of Christmas reduced here and there the usual audience. In recollection of the scenes from "Mlada," there is time also to repeat Mr. Gilman's vivid sentence about Rimsky-Korsakov, apropos the almost simultaneous hearing in New York of the suite from his opera "Christmas Eve";

> Rimsky the spinner of orchestral tales and legends, the master of tonal wonders and enchantments, unique and irrestistible.

EMINENT BOSTONIANS

To the Editor of The Herald:

A friend has sent me an editorial from The Boston Herald on former and present Bostonians who have made the city notable. I do not object to any of the names in your list, although one or two of them are unfamiliar to me, but I think you have overlooked some men who should fairly be included. First of all, I would have chosen the great explorer, Admiral Richard E. Byrd. I would also add as a banker Daniel G. Wing. Each of these was born outside of Massachusetts, but they have made their reputations while residents of Boston. Cardinal O'Connell obviously should be in the classification.

I would put in Dr. George B. Magrath, whose reputation also is national, and Starling Burgess, the yacht designer; Elihu Thomson, the telephone pioneer, and Dr. Harvey Cushing, even if he is no longer a Bostonian. I would suggest two or three so-called "institutions" to those which you mentioned. I would say that the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Pop concerts, the Christmas eve carols on Beacon Hill, Ford Hall, the Old South Forum, Boston Common and the Gardner Art Museum would be adornments to any city, American or European. J. W. PERKINS.

Chicago, Dec. 24.

Concert-Chronicle

Dec 24

For the Scientists

THIS AFTERNOON at four o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will give a closed concert for the pleasure of the members of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, their hosts and other guests. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct. The program, to run no longer than a hour. traverses:

Suite for String Orchestra..... ....Corelli
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantschina," Musorgsky
Nocturne, "Festivals"... ....Debussy
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor........Beethoven

From Symphony Hall

After much work on the part of the librarian, Mr. Rogers, a complete score, as Wagner wrote it, for the first act of "Die Walküre" has been assembled at Symphony Hall. Note for note and instrument for instrument, it will be heard at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday with Miss Alsen and Messrs. Althouse and Patton for singers. Few opera houses do as much for their Wagner.

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will revisit New York for concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The novel pieces to be included in Dr. Koussevitzky's programs are Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" and the orchestral version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Mlada." Both have been recently played at Symphony Hall.

MUSICAL AMERICA NY
DEC 25 1933

DECEMBER 25
1933

DR.
SERGE
KOUSSEVITZKY

The Distinguished Russian Conductor Is Now Celebrating His Tenth Season as Baton Chief of the Boston Symphony. During That Time He Has Broken a Lance for Much New Music, but What Is More Important, He Has Been Able to Restore the Boston Symphony to Its Old-Time Place as One of the Pre-eminent Orchestras of the World

---

Front Views and Profiles

By June Provines

Chicago Daily Tribune Dec 23 33

Critic—
Executive—
Actor—
Booth—
South Americans

IT is of interest to music lovers, perhaps, that Boston's Philip Hale, probably the best known program annotater in the country, is in town. Mr. Hale writes the program notes for the Boston Symphony orchestra, including, naturally, those in the program when that orchestra played here Monday. Past 80, Mr. Hale, white-haired, slight of build, with a clear blue eye, is spending most of the time quietly with his sister on Burton place. One of the few visitors he has received is Carleton Smith, the young Chicagoan who combines teaching economics at De Paul university with lecturing on music. Despite the fact that Mr. Hale says he finds talking about music disagreeable ("Next to listening to it the next most disagreeable thing is talking about it" is what he actually said), he talked at some length. . . . There is a "lot of rot in Bach," who, he says, repeated many things he had written according to a formula. . . . Mozart, he thinks, was perhaps the greatest of musical geniuses. . . . Walt Whitman wrote the best line ever written in English about music, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instrument." . . . Ernest Newman of the London Times is the greatest living writer about music. . . . Music critic himself for years, he adds that "musical criticism isn't worth a damn."

* *

Concert-Chronicle

Schnabel's Return Tran Dec 26

THE New York Herald Tribune, which enjoys the confidence of Artur Schnabel announces the pianist's return to the United States for a longer tour through the second half of next season. In the course of it he will play two concertos at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. It appears that "he has expressed admiration for the major Symphony Orchestras of the East and for the Boston Symphony in paritcular. When he was rehearsing with it in 1931, he remembered, he was almost impelled to stop playing to listen to the orchestra itself." He was impressed also by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Golschmann.

For his own concerts next season, he intends to divide two programs between Schubert, Mozart and Beethoven. Each will contain a sonata from Schubert, another from Mozart. To the first he will add Beethoven's far-flung Variations on a Waltz of Diabelli; to the second the so-called "Hammerklavier Sonata," Op. 106. Since Mr. Schnabel drew no small audience last November to his one concert in Boston, he and his managers might safely risk two in this second and longer tour. Mr. Schnabel, finally thought well of the young American pianists who sought his advice; noted their preference for Mozart and Beethoven as compared with Liszt and Grieg; found audiences like-minded and uncommonly responsive.

At Acme

Though it is three days afterward, this chronicle returns briefly and unabashed to the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, because throughout conductor and orchestra gained and sustained the highest pitch of performance, thus far, in the musical year. Whether they were playing "Sadko," "Scheherazade" or the concert-piece from "Mlada," they joined the utmost technical skill with tone, accent and color to full understanding and feeling for the music in hand; so conveyed it to their audience; so attained the ultimate goal of performance. The more the pity that the preoccupations of Christmas reduced here and there the usual audience. In recollection of the scenes from "Mlada," there is time also to repeat Mr. Gilman's vivid sentence about Rimsky-Korsakov, apropos the almost simultaneous hearing in New York of the suite from his opera "Christmas Eve":

> Rimsky the spinner of orchestral tales and legends, the master of tonal wonders and enchantments, unique and irrestistible.

EMINENT BOSTONIANS

To the Editor of The Herald:

A friend has sent me an editorial from The Boston Herald on former and present Bostonians who have made the city notable. I do not object to any of the names in your list, although one or two of them are unfamiliar to me, but I think you have overlooked some men who should fairly be included. First of all, I would have chosen the great explorer, Admiral Richard E. Byrd. I would also add as a banker Daniel G. Wing. Each of these was born outside of Massachusetts, but they have made their reputations while residents of Boston. Cardinal O'Connell obviously should be in the classification.

I would put in Dr. George B. Magrath, whose reputation also is national, and Starling Burgess, the yacht designer; Elihu Thomson, the telephone pioneer, and Dr. Harvey Cushing, even if he is no longer a Bostonian. I would suggest two or three so-called "institutions" to those which you mentioned. I would say that the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Pop concerts, the Christmas eve carols on Beacon Hill, Ford Hall, the Old South Forum, Boston Common and the Gardner Art Museum would be adornments to any city, American or European. J. W. PERKINS.

Chicago, Dec. 24. Herald Dec 27

135

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Dec 27

For the Scientists

THIS AFTERNOON at four o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will give a closed concert for the pleasure of the members of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, their hosts and other guests. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct. The program, to run no longer than a hour, traverses:

Suite for String Orchestra..................Corelli
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantschina," Musorgsky
Nocturne, "Festivals"..................Debussy
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor........Beethoven

From Symphony Hall

After much work on the part of the librarian, Mr. Rogers, a complete score, as Wagner wrote it, for the first act of "Die Walküre" has been assembled at Symphony Hall. Note for note and instrument for instrument, it will be heard at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday with Miss Alsen and Messrs. Althouse and Patton for singers. Few opera houses do as much for their Wagner.

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will revisit New York for concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The novel pieces to be included in Dr. Koussevitzky's programs are Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" and the orchestral version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Mlada." Both have been recently played at Symphony Hall.

Trans 64

DECEMBER 28, 1933

--- Films

New Adventure This Week At Symphony Hall

With Singers and Orchestra, Whole Act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere"

IN his later operas Wagner wrote an intrinsically symphonic music, though it was to be heard in the theater and not in the concert-hall. In opera houses, an operatic orchestra plays it—always in America, usually in Europe, inferior to a symphony orchestra of the first rank. Nor are conductors in opera houses, however able and sensitive, often to be compared with the higher placed conductors of symphony concerts. Consequently the increasing transfer of long scenes or whole acts of Wagner's music-dramas from the theater to the concert-room. There they are heard without settings, costumes or stage-action; but there also the orchestral part sounds as it seldom does in the theater; while with it the voice-parts are blended in unusual fusion.

In the United States many cities with notable orchestras and conductors go operaless or receive only occasional visits from touring companies mediocre or worse. Even Boston, nominally a capital of music, has known no opera worthy of the name since the winter of 1931. In such condition is valid reason for an occasional pair of Symphony Concerts filled with an act from one or another of Wagner's music-dramas, or from other operas in which the orchestral part is more than accompaniment and can be transferred significantly to the concert-hall. Hence the decision of Dr. Koussevitzky to include operatic acts or scenes in the present series of Symphony Concerts. Next Friday and Saturday, he, the Symphony Orchestra, Mme. Alsen, Mr. Althouse and Mr. Patton will be heard at Symphony Hall in the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre" from the first measure of the prelude through the final measures of the ecstatic close. Within the longest memories there has been no such pair of Symphony Concerts.

A daily newspaper lacks room to unfold in words, as graphically as may be, the long and surcharged course of this first act of "Die Walküre." It can, however, set in background for this considerable excerpt from the music-drama in which Wagner's mature genius first declared itself. It may also find material in an article that Mr. Lawrence Gilman, the master-writer about Wagner in the American press, contributed some years ago to The New York Herald Tribune.

How is one to account [Mr. Gilman wrote] for the transformation of the Wagner of "Lohengrin" into the Wagner of "Das Rheingold," with an interval of only five years between the two works. What happened to that unparalleled brain between 1848 and 1853? Some miraculous unfolding, is all that one can answer—a miracle as baffling as that which confronts us when we turn from Beethoven's Second Symphony to his Third.

Similarly, what was it that turned the composer of "Das Rheingold" into the composer of "Die Walküre"? The two works were separated by only one month's interval. Wagner completed the instrumentation of "Rheingold" on May 28, 1854; on June 28 he began the composition on "Die Walküre." He rose from the completion of "Rheingold" an authentic but immature genius of astonishing originality—a genius with faculties incompletely developed and applied. Thirty-one days later he sat down to "Die Walküre," and the first measures that he wrote disclosed a consummate master writing with absolute certainty of styl and fullness of power, and producing, at top speed, music that is among the greatest that he or any one else has given us. He was to continue at the top of his form for another quarter of a century—"Siegfried," "Tristan," Meistersinger," Götterdämmerung," "Parsifal," were all ahead of him. But in nothing that he was afterward to write in those marvelous scores did he transcend the greatest things in "Die Walküre."

The endless miracle of "Die Walküre" is the godlike energy and stride and power of the tone-poet whom this score reveals. The puny, bandy-legged neurasthenic, moaning over his bodily ills and his poverty, and ceaselessly passing the hat, becomes in this music a Titan of art, riding the storms like his own cloud-sweeping Donner, a brother of wind and flame, with all the spring in his voice and the ancient mysteries of destiny and death shadowing his eyes.

More wonderful still, his vision and his expressional capacity have become so deepened and enhanced that they have unlocked for his imagination every secret of the human heart. That is the new and the distinguishing feature of "Die Walküre," as we reach it in our advancing journey through Wagner's works. We have left behind us the fresh wonder-world of "Rheingold," with its non-human heights and depths, and have re-entered the greater world of men and women, with their human ecstasies and woes. It was an old world to Wagner—he had known it in his "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin." But he comes back to it here with his understanding and his powers immeasurably increased. He is now the consummate master, the effortless craftsman, superbly confident and at ease. There is no demand upon his expressional capacity to which it is unequal. In Meredith's words, he "can spring imagination with a phrase."

Turn where you will in the score of "Die Walküre" [Mr. Gilman continues] and you will find mastery of tonal speech. Nowhere does the music falter or weaken in its obedience to the tone poet's will. Its gamut is immense; yet everywhere within that horizon-leaping range the music speaks the mind and heart of its begetter with uncanny fulness and precision and subduing eloquence. . . . It is this that makes "Die Walküre" the first of his scores in which his powers as a musician are completely adequate to the task that his imagination as dramatist and poet has set for them. It is easy to imagine him returning in after years to the subject of one of his earlier operas and giving it an immeasurably more potent setting. Indeed, he did precisely that when, as the matured composer of "Tristan und Isolde," he returned to the "Tannhäuser" that he had completed fifteen years before and charged its first two scenes with all the eloquence of his ripened art. Imagine the drama of "Tannhäuser" recomposed throughout by the author of "Tristan"!

But a revised "Walküre" is unthinkable. Setting aside one lyric peccadillo twenty measures long, there is nothing in the whole course of the tremendous work that it is easy to think of as differently conceived and uttered. And this is the first of Wagner's scores of which that could be said. It marked the beginning of his period of complete command over the stuff of his imagination and the materials of his art. Thenceforward his speech was commensurate with his emotion, his vision, his will "Die Walküre," then, reveals to us, for the first time, the greater Wagner. He is now the manipulator of a technique absolutely sure, endlessly resourceful; and he is the master of an expressional instrument so sensitive, so delicate, yet so puissant, that it can denote the drooping of an eyelid or the heartbreak of a god.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 30 1933

WAGENAAR DESCRIBES SYMPHONIC PROGRAM

Critic Analyzes Numbers To Be Given at Bushnell.

Paying suitable tribute to the genius of Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, and setting forth the program to be given by that famous organization here Wednesday evening on the occasion of the third concert in the Bushnell symphonic series as outstanding in every particular, Bernard Wagenaar, composer and critic, gave a clear and concise analysis of the various numbers to be given by the Bostonians during the course of his third Hartford lecture of the season, last evening, in the Colonial room at the Bushnell Memorial.

The program to be given by Dr. Koussevitsky includes "Second Symphony in D major" by Jean Sibelius, "Concerto Grosso Opus 6 No. 5" (for strings) by Handel, the "Prelude" to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantschina, and Richard Strauss' fantastic symphonic poem "Till Euleenspiegel."

The lecture was illustrated by means of piano scales and it was regretted that a recording of the Sibelius "Symphony" could not be obtained. In addition to his analysis Mr. Wagenaar continued his talks on the development of musical structure, which he began here in November on the occasion of his first lecture, just previous to the concert of the Philadelphia symphony orchestra Mr. Wagenaar traced the thematic development of the various works to be heard by means of illustrations which he played on the piano.

Subsequent lectures by Mr. Wagenaar will take up for discussion the concerts to be given here in February by the Cleveland symphony orchestra and in March by the New York Philharmonic symphony orchestra under the leadership of the famous Arturo Toscanini.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

DEC 31 1933

BOSTON GUEST CONDUCTORS

Sir Henry Wood of England and Arnold Schonberg, Austrian modernist composer, will be guest conductors of the Boston Symphony this month.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 30 1933

Symphony Is Topic Of Wagenaar

Program of Boston Orchestra at Bushnell January 3 Is Discussed in Lecture

The program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, as the third concert in the Bushnell Memorial series on January 3, was discussed by Bernard Wagenaar in the second of his pre-concert lectures in the Colonial Room of Bushnell Hall Friday night.

Mr. Wagenaar pointed out that the program is particularly well suited to the orchestra which is to play it, in that the works emphasize the choirs of strings which are especially fine in the Boston Symphony ensemble.

The program will open with the Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 5, by Handel, followed by the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantschina," Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel," and concluding with Sibelius's Second Symphony in D Major.

Mr. Wagenaar pointed out the fact that the fifth concerto is especially Handelian in character, perhaps more so than any of the other eleven which the opus comprises.

The fairy tale-like coloring of the "Khovantschina" prelude was also pointed out and illustrated on the pianoforte, as well as the peculiar Russian flavor from the repeated use and favor shown to fourths.

Strauss Work Lauded.

Mr. Wagenaar enthusiastically described the "tonal photography" of the symphonic poem "Til Eulenspiegel," which he likened to a motion picture in the way that the composer has been able to paint with extreme concreteness and vividness the merry pranks of the legendary German rogue. He maintained that the opening phrases of the music, with their connotation of "Many years ago," was without parallel for evoking the fairy tale mood and almost literal statement of the first words that begin a myriad German tales.

The merger of classical form and modern expression in the Sibelius D Major symphony No. 2 was emphasized by the lecturer, who said that the composer is in his opinion considerably underrated and between the devil and the deep sea, in that he is not academic enough to satisfy those who favor traditional symphonic composition, and not modern enough for those who insist on complete assumption of the contemporary movements in music.

The combination of warm romantic mood, pastoral and liturgical feelings in the score was described and explained.

All four works were illustrated on pianoforte only, as records were not available for gramophone rendition as at the last lecture.

Mr. Wagenaar continued his discussion of the structural form of musical composition, continuing from his explanation of three part song forms given in the previous talk. Last night he took up the rondo form, illustrating the three major embodiments from the works of Mozart, Beethoven, and Chopin, and pointing out how the rondo is the basic and elementary form of which the sonata, symphony, concerto, etc., are developments.

NEW YORK SUN

DEC 30 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to New York this season to give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 4, at 8:45, and Saturday afternoon, January 6, at 2:30. At each concert Serge Koussevitzky will present Ravel's setting for voice and orchestra of "Sheherazade," poems of Tristan Klingsor entitled "Asie," "La Flute Enchantee" and "L'Indifferent." Olga Averino, soprano, will take the solo part.

On the Thursday evening program there will be the first New York performance of "Introduction and Hymn," the latest score of Igor Markevitch, the twenty-one-year-old Russian composer. This piece had its first performance in Paris last summer, and was recently introduced in Boston by this orchestra. The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for string orchestra, and close with Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

The Saturday afternoon program will open with music from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Mlada," arranged in concert form. It is entitled, "Night on Mount Triglaff." The closing number will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its second visit of the season here this week, giving concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In the Thursday program Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce here an "Introduction and Hymn" by the twenty-year-old Russian composer Igor Markevitch, whose "Rebus" made a mixed impression when first presented here by the same orchestra last April. The "Introduction and Hymn" was first played last summer in Paris, where the composer makes his home, and was first played in this country by the Boston Symphony in its home concerts of December 15 and 16.

Olga Averino, Russian soprano, who is known here as a recitalist, will sing Ravel's "Shehérazade," a setting for voice and orchestra of three poems by Tristan Klingsor. The whole work, composed in 1903, is not unknown here, although it has not been frequently performed. Mozart's "Eine klenie Nachtmusik" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" will be the other numbers.

"Shéhérazade" will be repeated Saturday afternoon, when the program will begin with an unfamiliar Rimsky-Korsakoff number, "Night on Mount Triglav," from the suite taken from his opera "Mlada." The other number is Beethoven's fifth symphony.

The Brooklyn program includes besides "Shéhérazade" Ravel's second suite from his ballet "Daphnis et Ehloé" and Brahms's Third Symphony.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 31 1933

Arnold Schönberg will make his first appearance as a conductor in America with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts of Thursday, January 11, in Cambridge, and Friday and Saturday, January 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. His program, representing various periods of his creative activity, includes "Verklärte Nacht," "Begleitungsmusik für ein Lichtspiel" (incidental music for a motion picture film), five orchestra pieces and his transcription of a Bach prelude and fugue.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 31 1933

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY—Bronze sculpture by Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the famous conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

MUSIC

Herald Dec 31

MORNING VARIETIES

Yesterday morning in Symphony hall the first of the "Morning Varieties" was presented before a capacity audience. Arthur Fiedler was the master of ceremonies and conducted a small orchestra of Symphony players. He was assisted on the stage by Hans Wiener and his group of dancers. In addition the Silly Symphony, "The Three Little Pigs," was shown. The musical program was as follows:

Thomas..............Overture to "Mignon"
Strauss .... Waltz, Wine, Woman and Song
Tchaikowsky ....Nutcracker suite
Schubert .... Ballet no the Moment Musical
Handel .... Largo
Fucik ....Ballet, the Circus
Rimsky-Korsakov
The Flight of the Bumblebee
The Princess and the Frog King,
Dance ballet and play

There is no reason why Mr. Fiedler's experiment should not take the place of the long lost children's concerts of Mr. Schelling and indeed go them one better. People had to be turned away from the hall yesterday, which fact can not be entirely due to the little pigs. Evidently there are many who like to hear the popular classics of music and see some graceful ballet dancing. If Mr. Fiedler would sneak in by the back door some more dignified and less hackneyed music, these concerts should fill a much needed educational place. Mr. Fiedler is right, however, not to emphasize that aspect of his program and is wise to include a silly symphony at the end.

Something may well be accomplished merely by accustoming children to come to hear music in Symphony hall, so that they may learn that music is not necessarily a grim duty to be seldom performed. But surely there are better overtures than "Mignon" that can be played without frightening away clients who are afraid of becoming profound, "foreheads villainously low," Mr. Huxley called them. The accompanying dances by the Hans Wiener group are a good idea, but one that should not be overdone. Mr. Fiedler conducts without delay or explanation, letting the audience find its place in the dark and thereby teaching it to be prompt. Finally, here is children's entertainment given in a straightforward way. Let us hope the next concert will be equally popular and somewhat more educational with the same gratifying absence of pose.

A. W. W.

Dec 31 BOSTON SUNDAY POST

Two Guest Conductors Listed for Symphony---Music Notes of Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the Christmas season over, Dr. Koussevitzky's annual mid-winter holiday is close at hand. This week he and the orchestra journey to Hartford, Brooklyn and New York; next Sunday they will be back in Symphony Hall for the second of the season's Pension Fund Concerts at which Jascha Heifetz is to be the soloist. Then comes the fortnight's respite for Dr. Koussevitzky and the appearance at Symphony Hall of two guests conductors.

* * * *

The first of these guest conductors this season wil be Arnold Schoenberg, the distinguished Austrian composer now sojourning in our midst. Cambridge will hear him first, in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, Jan. 11. He will conduct in Boston at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13. Mr. Schoenberg has appeared here as composer to be honored and in New York he has made his debut as lecturer, but these three concerts will constitute his first hearing in this country as orchestral conductor.

* * * *

On all three occasions Mr. Schoenberg will conduct the same programme, one made entirely from his own music, as is altogether fitting. There will be those, however, who will demur at Mr. Schoenberg's own choice of his works to be heard. Despite his reputation and the great importance of his influence upon the music-making of the first decades of the 20th century, comparatively little of Mr. Schoenberg's more characteristic music has been made known to us here in Boston. There was hope in certain quarters that these concerts which he is to conduct would provide the opportunity to gain acquaintance with the new variations, which his admirers declare to be a triumph of the composer's musical orchestral pieces, heard here under Dr. Muck 19 years ago and never repeated. At that time four of the five were considered the last word in cacophony. It would have been interesting to hear how they sound today as played under the baton of their composer.

* * * *

But Mr. Schoenberg, coming as guest conductor, evidently wishes to avoid any possible distress on the part of his hearers. And so he is playing the music of his younger days, not that of his maturity, music written when the romantic impulse had not yet given way to the workings of a more than commonly complex musical intellect. His transcription for full orchestra of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat and his Tristanesque sextet for strings, "Verklaerte Nacht" (Transfigure Night"), both already known here, together with the symphonic poem "Pelleas and Melisande," then to have its first Boston performances, will make Mr. Schoenberg's programme.

* * * *

This "Pelleas and Melisande" is Opus 5 of the published works of Schoenberg and belongs to approximately the same period as the "Verklaerte Nacht," which is Opus 4 and the redoubtable "Gurrelieder." It was first performed, as was the "Verklaerte Nacht," in Vienna in the first decade of the century at the instigation of Gustav Mahler, who took a great interest in Schoenberg and his work. In 1911 Schoenberg went to Berlin and was long identified with the musical life of that city; now he has joined the many eminent musicians who have turned their backs upon Germany.

* * * *

Although the dates of the concerts, which he is to conduct on Jan. 19 and 20, seem still rather far in the future, it should here be noted that the second of this midwinter season's guest conductors will be Sir Henry Wood, one of England's outstanding musicians and known particularly to the world at large through his directing of the London Promenade Concerts.

and Rhode Island

MUSIC

Dec 30 Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Wagner program: Bachanale ("Der Venusberg") from Tannhaeuser; Act 1, "Die Walkuere, music drama in three acts. (First performance at these concerts). Soloists—Siegmund: Paul Althouse, tenor; Sieglinde Elsa Alsen, soprano; Hunding: Fred Patton, bass.

An experiment of import and of great interest, was that made by Dr. Koussevitzky at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It required courage and imagination to break through conventions and present the entire first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" at a regular symphony concert; and it required great devotion on the part of the codnuctor to bring it, in a limited time, to a performance of such finish. Yesterday's presentation gave concrete evidence that every moment of rehearsal had been used to advantage and that the whole concept had been dominated by definite ideals on the part of Dr. Koussevitzy.

There is a good deal to be said for, and something against, the idea of concert presentations of Wagner operas. At all events it leaves no one indifferent. When an artist's innovations no longer cause discussions, or even decided differences of opinion, he is in danger of being soon forgotten. Those who were dissatisfied with the single act of "Die Walkuere" as a concert number, were surely not in the majority. It naturally slows down the potency of Wagner's music to have the characters appear in concert garb and on their best concert behavior.

The listener who is well versed in the work, misses the scenery and finds the singers' placement on the stage inhibiting. On the other hand, the listener who allows these hindrances to completely prevent his enjoyment of Wagner's score, is esthetically in swaddling clothes. Wagner's idea is not completely expressed in concert performances, no matter how fine, but no one pretends that it is. That Boston is eager to hear Wagnerian opera was demonstrated by the way in which a large audience drank in every bit of yesterday's opera offering and remained at the end to give voice to more than normal enthusiasm.

Yesterday's arrangement of the orchestra was different than usual, but it certainly seemed justified by the results obtained. When the singers are placed on the stage with the orchestra, instead of on a higher level as would be the case in opera, extra care must be used in matters of tonal balance. In just these points Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished the unusual.

Never did one choir overbalance another; never did the sound become thick or noisy. We venture to say that singers never had an easier time in getting their voices through the orchestral texture of Wagner than they did yesterday with the Boston Symphony. The result was a performance without shouting and without useless strain.

"Die Walkuere" is an opera that ever belonged to the greatest achievements of Dr. Karl Muck. To have heard him conduct it at the Berlin Opera, in bygone days, was to receive ineradicable impressions. The Koussevitzky reading is individual and is marked by great beauty, unusual ardor and a forceful refinement. There are many today who thank Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, whose co-operation was nothing less than remarkable, for the chance to hear an entire act of a Wagner opera, instead of the dismembering of different acts, as is usual on Wagner programs.

The soloists deserve praise for their diction. To single out any one for particular commendation would scarcely be a compliment, for they interpreted their respective roles so as to cause us to forget Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton and to centre our attention on Sieglinde, Siegmund and Hunding. An ovation was the reward of conductor, soloists and orchestra.

The concert commenced with a brilliant performance of the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."

The next regular concert of the Boston Symphony will be Jan. 12. The program will be devoted to the works of Arnold Schoenberg, who will conduct.

ALL the world loves a baby! Don't miss the beautiful Baby Calendar for 1934 which will be given free with The Sunday Herald. It is printed in rich rotogravure and is suitable for framing.

95

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY—Bronze sculpture by Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the famous conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

MUSIC

Herald Dec 31

MORNING VARIETIES

Yesterday morning in Symphony hall the first of the "Morning Varieties" was presented before a capacity audience. Arthur Fiedler was the master of ceremonies and conducted a small orchestra of Symphony players. He was assisted on the stage by Hans Wiener and his group of dancers. In addition the Silly Symphony, "The Three Little Pigs," was shown. The musical program was as follows:

Thomas	Overture to "Mignon"
Strauss	Waltz, Wine, Woman and Song
Tchaikowsky	Nutcracker suite
Schubert	Ballet no the Moment Musical
Handel	Largo
Fleck	Ballet, the Circus
Rimsky-Korsakov	The Flight of the Bumblebee

The Princess and the Frog King,
Dance ballet and play

There is no reason why Mr. Fiedler's experiment should not take the place of the long lost children's concerts of Mr. Schelling and indeed go them one better. People had to be turned away from the hall yesterday, which fact can not be entirely due to the little pigs. Evidently there are many who like to hear the popular classics of music and see some graceful ballet dancing. If Mr. Fiedler would sneak in by the back door some more dignified and less hackneyed music, these concerts should fill a much needed educational place. Mr. Fiedler is right, however, not to emphasize that aspect of his program and is wise to include a silly symphony at the end.

Something may well be accomplished merely by accustoming children to come to hear music in Symphony hall, so that they may learn that music is not necessarily a grim duty to be seldom performed. But surely there are better overtures than "Mignon" that can be played without frightening away clients who are afraid of becoming profound, "foreheads villainously low," Mr. Huxley called them. The accompanying dances by the Hans Wiener group are a good idea, but one that should not be overdone. Mr. Fiedler conducts without delay or explanation, letting the audience find its place in the dark and thereby teaching it to be prompt. Finally, here is children's entertainment given in a straightforward way. Let us hope the next concert will be equally popular and somewhat more educational with the same gratifying absence of pose.

A. W. W.

Post

BOSTON SUNDAY POST

Two Guest Conductors Listed for Symphony---Music Notes of Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the Christmas season over, Dr. Koussevitzky's annual mid-winter holiday is close at hand. This week he and the orchestra journey to Hartford, Brooklyn and New York; next Sunday they will be back in Symphony Hall for the second of the season's Pension Fund Concerts at which Jascha Heifetz is to be the soloist. Then comes the fortnight's respite for Dr. Koussevitzky and the appearance at Symphony Hall of two guests conductors.

* * * *

The first of these guest conductors this season wil be Arnold Schoenberg, the distinguished Austrian composer now sojourning in our midst. Cambridge will hear him first, in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, Jan. 11. He will conduct in Boston at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13. Mr. Schoenberg has appeared here as composer to be honored and in New York he has made his debut as lecturer, but these three concerts will constitute his first hearing in this country as orchestral conductor.

* * * *

On all three occasions Mr. Schoenberg will conduct the same programme, one made entirely from his own music, as is altogether fitting. There will be those, however, who will demur at Mr. Schoenberg's own choice of his works to be heard. Despite his reputation and the great importance of his influence upon the music-making of the first decades of the 20th century, comparatively little of Mr. Schoenberg's more characteristic music has been made known to us here in Boston. There was hope in certain quarters that these concerts which he is to conduct would provide the opportunity to gain acquaintance with the new variations, which his admirers declare to be a triumph of the composer's musical orchestral pieces, heard here under Dr. Muck 19 years ago and never repeated. At that time four of the five were conconsidered the last word in cacophony. It would have been interesting to hear how they sound today as played under the baton of their composer.

* * * *

But Mr. Schoenberg, coming as guest conductor, evidently wishes to avoid any possible distress on the part of his hearers. And so he is playing the music of his younger days, not that of his maturity, music written when the romantic impulse had not yet given way to the workings of a more than commonly complex musical intellect. His transcription for full orchestra of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat and his Tristanesque sextet for strings, "Verklaerte Nacht" (Transfigure Night"), both already known here, together with the symphonic poem "Pelleas and Melisande," then to have its first Boston performances, will make Mr. Schoenberg's programme.

* * * *

This "Pelleas and Melisande" is Opus 5 of the published works of Schoenberg and belongs to approximately the same period as the "Verklaerte Nacht," which is Opus 4 and the redoubtable "Gurrelieder." It was first performed, as was the "Verklaerte Nacht," in Vienna in the first decade of the century at the instigation of Gustav Mahler, who took a great interest in Schoenberg and his work. In 1911 Schoenberg went to Berlin and was long identified with the musical life of that city; now he has joined the many eminent musicians who have turned their backs upon Germany.

* * * *

Although the dates of the concerts, which he is to conduct on Jan. 19 and 20, seem still rather far in the future, it should here be noted that the second of this midwinter season's guest conductors will be Sir Henry Wood, one of England's outstanding musicians and known particularly to the world at large through his directing of the London Promenade Concerts.

and Rhode Island White

MUSIC

Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Wagner program: Bachanale ("Der Venusberg") from Tannhaeuser; Act 1, "Die Walkuere, music drama in three acts. (First performance at these concerts). Soloists—Siegmund: Paul Althouse, tenor; Sieglinde Elsa Alsen, soprano; Hunding: Fred Patton, bass.

An experiment of import and of great interest, was that made by Dr. Koussevitzky at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It required courage and imagination to break through conventions and present the entire first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" at a regular symphony concert; and it required great devotion on the part of the codnuctor to bring it, in a limited time, to a performance of such finish. Yesterday's presentation gave concrete evidence that every moment of rehearsal had been used to advantage and that the whole concept had been dominated by definite ideals on the part of Dr. Koussevitzy.

There is a good deal to be said for, and something against, the idea of concert presentations of Wagner operas. At all events it leaves no one indifferent. When an artist's innovations no longer cause discussions, or even decided differences of opinion, he is in danger of being soon forgotten. Those who were dissatisfied with the single act of "Die Walkuere" as a concert number, were surely not in the majority. It naturally slows down the potency of Wagner's music to have the characters appear in concert garb and on their best concert behavior.

The listener who is well versed in the work, misses the scenery and finds the singers' placement on the stage inhibiting. On the other hand, the listener who allows these hindrances to completely prevent his enjoyment of Wagner's score, is esthetically in swaddling clothes. Wagner's idea is not completely expressed in concert performances, no matter how fine, but no one pretends that it is. That Boston is eager to hear Wagnerian opera was demonstrated by the way in which a large audience drank in every bit of yesterday's opera offering and remained at the end to give voice to more than normal enthusiasm.

Yesterday's arrangement of the orchestra was different than usual, but it certainly seemed justified by the results obtained. When the singers are placed on the stage with the orchestra, instead of on a higher level as would be the case in opera, extra care must be used in matters of tonal balance. In just these points Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished the unusual.

Never did one choir overbalance another; never did the sound become thick or noisy. We venture to say that singers never had an easier time in getting their voices through the orchestral texture of Wagner than they did yesterday with the Boston Symphony. The result was a performance without shouting and without useless strain.

"Die Walkuere" is an opera that ever belonged to the greatest achievements of Dr. Karl Muck. To have heard him conduct it at the Berlin Opera, in bygone days, was to receive ineradicable impressions. The Koussevitzky reading is individual and is marked by great beauty, unusual ardor and a forceful refinement. There are many today who thank Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, whose co-operation was nothing less than remarkable, for the chance to hear an entire act of a Wagner opera, instead of the dismembering of different acts, as is usual on Wagner programs.

The soloists deserve praise for their diction. To single out any one for particular commendation would scarcely be a compliment, for they interpreted their respective roles so as to cause us to forget Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton and to centre our attention on Sieglinde, Siegmund and Hunding. An ovation was the reward of conductor, soloists and orchestra.

The concert commenced with a brilliant performance of the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."

The next regular concert of the Boston Symphony will be Jan. 12. The program will be devoted to the works of Arnold Schoenberg, who will conduct.

ALL the world loves a baby! Don't miss the beautiful Baby Calendar for 1934 which will be given free with The Sunday Herald. It is printed in rich rotogravure and is suitable for framing.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

9b

DEC 31 1933

A Rimsky Revival

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Concert Version of the Third Act of the Opera Ballet 'Mlada' Will Be Played Here by Mr., Koussewitsky and the Bostonians

Well over a quarter of a century ago, at a concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra conducted by Modest Altschuler, New York heard its first and, if I am not mistaken, its last performance of Rimsky-Korsakow's "A Night on Mount Triglav," which Mr. Koussewitsky and the Bostonians are to play for us at their Carnegie Hall matinee on Saturday of this week. One does not easily understand the neglect of the piece during this long interval: Rimsky has been anything but unpopular here, and "A Night on Mount Triglav" is as representative of his admired characteristics as any of his more familiar works. It is possible that the piece, a concert hall arrangement of the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," was played here during the season of 1921-22, when Pierre Monteux introduced it into the repertory of the Boston Orchestra, but the records available to me offer no confimation of this, and I proceed on the supposition that the work is unknown to a generation of concert goers here who will need to be informed that it stands on a level with Rimsky's best work—stands, indeed, in certain respects, on a higher level than even "Scheherazade," for example, and far above such relatively inferior productions as the suites arranged from other of Rimsky's operas, "Christmas Eve Revels," "Sadko," "The Tale of the Tsar Saltan" and "The Tsar's Bride." One finds M. Callovressi, writing of Rimsky's operas, and placing "Mlada" at the top of the list, out of admiration for the music of the third act; and other authorities have expressed an equally high opinion of the work.

* * *

The history of "Mlada" is curious and interesting. Gedeonov, director of the Petrograd opera and a playwright of some reputation, conceived it as an opera ballet upon which five composers were invited to collaborate: Ludwig Mincus was to write the ballet music, and Borodin, Cui, Moussorgsky and Rimsky were each to set an act of the text, which Gedeonov supplied. Borodin and Moussorgsky complied; but the project was ultimately abandoned for reasons of economy. Borodin incorporated much of the music he had written in "Prince Igor," and more was issued, after his death, as a "Finale From Mlada," edited by Rimsky. Moussorgsky, to whom the composition of a witches' Sabbath had been assigned, had adapted to this purpose the orchestral piece, "A Night on Bare Mountain," familiar to us in Rimsky's version. It is not recorded that Rimsky engaged to fulfill his agreement with Gedeonov before the collapse of the plan; Liadow is said to have urged him—presumably at a later date—to use Gedeonov's text for an opera entirely his own, but it was not until '88 that he finally decided to do so.

The determining factor was probably supplied by his discovery among Borodin's effects of the "Mlada" fragment already referred to, which he edited for publication. Rimsky set to work in September of '88 and by Christmas of the following year the opera was completed. The music of the third act was performed at an orchestral concert the same Winter, but the opera itself did not see the stage until '92. Its production then was a failure; nor did it ever subsequently achieve a permanent place in the Russian repertory. But Rimsky salvaged the best pages of the score in a suite of dances published by Beliaeff in '95, and in his concert version of the third act, "A Night on Mount Triglav," printed by the same firm seven years later. Portions of "A Night on Mount Triglav" later found their way into a score compiled at the instigation of Serge Diaghilew for a ballet on the subject of Gauthier's "One of Cleopatra's Nights."

* * *

The action of Gedeonov's libretto for "Mlada" is thus summarized in Montagu-Nathan's excellent book Rimsky-Korsakow:

"Mstivoi, Prince of Phetra, having designs on the neighboring principality of Arkonsk, has caused his daughter, Voislava, to present to Mlada, bride of Yaromir, its ruler, a poisoned ring. Not caring to depend on her own charms for the captivation of the bereaved Yaromir, now expected as a visitor to her father's court, Voislava invokes the aid of the infernal goddess Morena. . . . Yaromir conceives a passion for Voislava, which survives even a dream in which the cause of his bride's death is revealed, but so surely as he attempts to embrace his consoler, the Shade of Mlada intervenes and ultimately succeeds in carrying him off. Returning he kills Voislava, whose soul descends to Hades with Morena."

The third act of "Mlada" depicts the revels of infernal spirits, the retinue of Chernobog, the Black King, on the slopes of Mount Triglav, and the temptation of Yaromir, led to this place by the spirit of Mlada, by a vision of Cleopatra (the scene, quite differently conceived, for which, in the first projected version of the opera, Moussorgsky adapted his "Night on Bald Mountain"). The published score of the concert version is prefaced by the following argument:

"The stage is filled with thick clouds. Darkness. The clouds gradually scatter and finally completely vanish. Shooting stars. A clear moonless night. A gorge by Mount Triglav. The shadows of the deceased fly together from all sides and begin a fantastic round dance. The gorge is illuminated by the rising full moon, in the rays of which the shadow of Princess Mlada appears, leading Yaromir on. . . . The dead interrupt their round dance. Carried away by his passionate impulse, Yaromir attempts to approach Mlada. The latter's shadow vanishes, Yaromir disappearing in its wake. The moon grows ruddy. Subterranean thunder; the souls disperse in terror. Flight of night birds. Evil spirits, werewolves, specters and witches appear; snakes and toads creep from the rocks of the gorge. The spirits of darkness play and dance. Out of the hellish round dance Chernobog, the Black God, appears, in the guise of a he-goat, with his retinue. With an incantation he conjures up the souls of Yaromir and the Egyptian Queen Cleopatra. It is pitch dark. The stage is transformed into a gorgeous Egyptian hall. Cleopatra, surrounded by dancers and female slaves, reclines on a sumptuous couch of purple. Cleopatra passionately lures on Yaromir; the latter's soul grows animated; Mlada's shadow covers her face with her hands and weeps. A cock crows. Everything disappears in an instant. Darkness of night; thunder; stillness. The clouds scatter, day breaks. The southern slope of Mount Triglav, covered with woods. Yaromir is asleep. Nature awakens; leaves rustle and birds twitter. A ray of the rising sun falls on Yaromir. Full day."

Seven movements comprise the score, which is played through without pause: Introduction; Round Dance of the Spirits; Entrance of Mlada and Yaromir; Infernal Round Dance of Chernobog and the Spirits of Evil; Apparition of Cleopatra; Morning—Yaromir Alone.

* * *

The subject matter, obviously, is characteristic; so too is the score. But "A Night on Mount Triglav" is nevertheless built on a scale which Rimsky seldom attempted; in proportions and style it is more truly symphonic than anything we find in the earlier or the later operas. The harmonization too is richer, more complex, more subtle. Shortly before Rimsky set to work on "Mlada" he had heard for the first time Wagner's Ring of the Nibelungs; the experience matured and inspired him, and its effects are obvious in the music of the opera he subsequently composed; and though listening to "A Night on Mount Triglav" we can still agree with the critic who remarked that "Rimsky's music consists of color rather than expression," we recognize that here at least the approach to music of expression is made. "A Night on Mount Triglav" is in many respects an extraordinary score, and not least in this.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first act of Richard Wagner's music-drama, "The Valkyries," the second work of the cycle, "The Ring of the Niebelungen," is heard in concert performance at the Symphony concerts this week. This portion of the score is presented on this occasion with no "cuts." Dr Koussevitzky has thus set a commendable precedent, for previously an entire act of a Wagner music-drama had never been heard at these concerts. Indeed, according to Mr Hale's invaluable index in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, of this work only "Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music" and "The Ride of the Valkyries" have been offered on a "regular" program. Though not wishing to appear greedy, one may, in a burst of enthusiasm over the marvelous performance yesterday, suggest that the third act would be welcomed at future Boston Symphony concerts.

Elsa Alsen, a soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, assumed the music of Sieglinde, and Paul Althouse—American tenor returning this year to the Metropolitan after several years of absence—that of Siegmund. Fred Patton, bass, was heard as Hunding. Though Dr Koussevitzky began the program with the "Bacchanale," which Wagner wrote for the notorious Paris performance of "Tannhaeuser" in 1861, the concert was unusually short, being over at 4:05.

While fingering dusty volumes of mediocre and bad literature which hysterically set forth the marvels of Richard Wagner's art work, one has often wondered what impelled so many souls to write such stuff. Most of them, whose work collectively forms a large bulk now forgotten, must surely have been sincere. Yet the reason is not obscure.

His music is not only irresistible to an imaginative and perceptive listener, but prompts one to write and speak most extravagantly of Wagner's genius. And out of extravagance come incoherence and absurdity. An appraisal as cool and deliberate as the brain which created this music is required to detail accurately all the many sides of Wagner's genius. To no other man has it been granted to write such orchestral scores at once glorious for mere sound and marvelous for the profundity and the variety of the moods and feelings, the incidents and the aspects of character which those of Wagner make manifest. In his "Ring" and all that followed, Wagner was, figuratively, both a musical dramatist and psychological novelist. His intricate symphonic scores not only express in the vocal and instrumental parts what is happening upon the stage, how the characters feel, and reveal the motives for their actions, but, especially in the orchestra, supply a sort of author's commentary upon all.

Wagner was not born a mature genius. He had, by hard work, study and the experience of years, to develop his powers. "The Valkyries" is an integral step in that development, both reflective of what he had previously composed and prophetic of the greater art-works to come. Yet, to our 20th century ears, even this work with its obvious flaws surpasses nearly everything written by other "dramatic" composers.

Richard the Incomparable has had no equal in the past, and he may not be excelled in his field in the future. Beethoven, Sibelius and Brahms, to set down inevitable examples, may be as great, but their music is different. That difference, of course, is the point. The passing of years generates some peculiar—and oftentimes ridiculous—changes of opinion. The attitude of a certain group of callous and purblind contemporaries who patronize Wagner is typical. But in comparison to his soul-shaking utterance, the esthetic dabblings of Markevitch and the latter-day Stravinsky are small tonal potatoes.

All three soloists yesterday achieved remarkably fine performances, Mme Alsen and Mr Althouse particularly. These musicians have penetrated the secret of good Wagner singing. They sing and do not shout or cackle. They know how to obtain rounded phrases and how to bring out the tonal beauty and the textual import of Wagner's "word-tone-speech." Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale was rather heavy and disappointing, but otherwise his conducting revealed him at his thrilling and gorgeous best. The performance was of a quality which, ironically, will probably never be heard in any opera house.

There are no concerts next week, since the orchestra goes to New York. Two weeks hence, Arnold Schoenberg will be guest conductor in a program of his own music.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, DECEMBER 30,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS 'WALKUERE'

First Act of Opera Given With Voice Parts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music that ranks with the greatest, and 80 years old, made its first appearance yesterday on the programme of a Symphony Concert, a fact not so surprising when it is explained that this music was the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

MUSIC SPEAKS FOR ITSELF

Wagner in concert form has long been a controversial issue. By token of yesterday's performance under Dr. Koussevitzky, with Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton for the singers, the reasons why this music should be so presented considerably outweigh the reasons why it should not. What would have been the effect of yesterday's performance upon one who did not know the music-drama on the stage cannot here be set forth.

But the listener who knew the opera in the form which Wagner intended probably had little difficulty in recalling at will scene and situation. And often there was no need for such exercise of the imagination. For the most part the music spoke for itself, and even with an eloquence and a graphicness of delineation that is seldom attained in the opera house.

All in the Orchestra

For this two explanations may be offered. In the first place the orchestral performance was immeasurably superior to that generally encountered in the theatre. In this, his first real opportunity here Dr. Koussevitzky placed himself among the greatest living exponents of Wagner's music. And what opera house could provide the equal of the orchestra which yesterday stormed or sang upon the stage of Symphony Hall?

A second explanation is one that reflects a little upon Wagner's practicality as music-dramatist. There are places in the second act of this "Valkyrie," as elsewhere in the works of Wagner, where the extensive musical commentary makes for irritating halts in the action. Take for example the conclusion of the meal in Hunding's hut when Siegmund, Sieglinde and Hunding must sit for so long silent and immovable. Yesterday the musical revelation of their several and sometimes conflicting thoughts could in rare degree be enjoyed and appreciated for its own sake.

Althouse Is Siegmund

Thus, indeed, two aspects of Wagner's unparalleled genius stood forth in uncommonly sharp relief; his unfailing mastery of the orchestra and his unequalled power to mirror in tone each mood and sentiment.

Yesterday's performance, had also its vocal virtues. Mr. Althouse, in far better voice than Boston has lately known him, sang Siegmund's music with rare sensibility and insight, with remarkably clear enunciation and with an admirable feeling for rhythm.

Miss Alsen's Sieglinde

Miss Alsen, too, excelled her earlier Bostonian appearances, and from initial surprise to final ecstacy and excitement Sieglinde's measures received full justice at her hands. Mr. Patton, lacking the advantages of costume, was yet a sufficient Hunding, tempering his native rudeness with a grudging show of the hospitality that his code required.

All but 10 minutes of yesterday's concert fell to this act of "Walkuere." Before it came the Bacchanale from the Paris version of "Tannhauser" in a performance chiefly remarkable for its treatment of the sensuous languors of the closing section. It may be added that the audience rose to this Wagner concert with unmistakable enthusiasm. May the future bring more of its ilk.

1934

97

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JA[illegible] 7 - 1934

Music

There is so little time between the end of any musical event and the "deadline" for reviews going to press for the morning editions, that any comments except those bearing immediately on the performance in hand, must be foregone.

Therefore, to say anything of expository or "by the [illegible]" interest, it is necessary to have recourse to some such department as this.

Not only the paucity of time, but also the laws of "news" make it incumbent upon the reviewer to give first consideration to performers and performance. Then, if there is still space left—and a column fills with the rapidity of a pousse-cafe glass under a rainspout—and the hands of the clock have not completed the 11 to 12 oclock circumference, he may now consider the more academic phases of the concert or recital—the music itself.

There is room for considerable debate upon which is more important, the music or its performance, and which therefore should be given first consideration. For the reviewer however, this debate does not exist—as has been said the performance constitutes the "news," except upon rarest occasions, and the exigencies of time and space therefore necessitate a department such as this to serve as an orphanage for academic considerations of music.

—

The program note on the Prelude to Mouussorgsky's "Khovantschina," played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week says that the music "illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin in Moscow." According to Riesemann who is probably the outstanding authority on this composer, Moussorgsky calls the Prelude "Dawn on the Moskva River."

Topographically this is a distinction without a difference, as the river practically borders the Square. To the average reader of this program note, and unfamiliar with Moscow, there must be considerable difference in connotation which might well confuse his comprehension of the piece.

"Dawn over Red Square' suggests a city scene, while "Dawn on the Moskva River" suggests something more bucolic and hence more idyllic—a rather marked difference in mood, which is the essential quality of a tone poem such as this.

What makes the point really worthy of consideration is that this Prelude and the prelude to the last scene in "Khovantschina" are probably the two finest tone-poems which Moussorgsky composed and seems a shame to approach them without accurate knowledge of their topical content.

Structurally the opening Prelude consists of five melodic variations, equally varied in harmony, rhythm and figures, on a theme of highly national character. The form of melodic variations is thoroughly familiar to Russians through their folksongs. When sung by several singers in succession no two stanzas are usually alike. Each singer attempts to introduce into his stanza as many variations in melody as possible, partly from a virtuoso desire for embellishment, and partly to suit his own voice and mood. Thus the song loses all rigidity and takes on a living quality capable of varying in every movement.

Moussorgsky made most effective use of this peculiarity of Russian folksong as a means of musical expression, and nowhere with more consummate skill than in the opening prelude to "Khovantschina." It is always the same landscape, yet it seems to change constantly under the different light of the approaching dawn. The effect is entirely parallel to those attained by the Impressionists with their lily ponds and haycocks—subtle, sensitive interplay and interchange of light and atmosphere over one subject—and expressed in this case by the melodic variations o nthe opening folk theme.

It is not, of course a representation of sunrise, as the piece utterly lacks the "pomp and circumstance" with which this phenomenon is customarily brought off in musical scene painting. It is the light and mood of dawn intimately and poetically expressed, and with infinite delicacy, from which one can learn the charm of the Russian landscape as well as Moussorgsky's fine achievement in the art of musical landscape-painting.

Sibelius, whose Second Symphony in D major also appeared on the Boston orchestra's program, has few more fervent supporters than Dr Koussevitsky. Evidently the admiration is mutual, as the Finnish composer has promised the conductor that he will be the first to perform the score for the Eighth Symphony, now long in composition. The score was promised several years ago but what with one thing and another, has not yet been completed, apparently.

"Two years ago," said Dr. Koussevitsky Wednesday evening, "away back in 1932, I received a cable from Sibelius saying 'The Symphony is finished'—but even yet I have not seen it, nor do I know when I shall."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 8 - 1934

Symphony Concert Suggestions.

To the Editor of The Times:

The recent concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was much enjoyed by those attending. Nevertheless, there are a few observations which might be made as to the concerts given in Hartford by various orchestras. As we do not have a local symphony orchestra and are obliged to depend upon out of town organizations it is most important that we should have programs based upon standard composers such as Beethoven, Haydn, Tschaikowsky, Mozart, and Brahms. This week we heard a symphony of Sibelius, who does not rank in the class with the other composers mentioned.

In former days the programs began usually with an overture, which opened the evening in a pleasing manner. Nowadays overtures do not appear on the programs of Hartford concerts . Another change which is by no means satisfactory is the playing of the symphony at the close of the program. The close attention given by the audience to the earlier numbers has by this time caused more or less fatigue so that the symphony, the heavest number on the program, cannot be so well appreciated.

Perhaps it is not too much to expect that these suggestions may be given some consideration by those who have charge of arranging and selecting program for symphony concerts in Hartford.

MUSIC LOVER.

West Hartford, Jan. 5.

PAWTUCKET, R
TIMES

JAN 1 3 1934

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

Sir Henry Wood, Guest Conductor, Plans Special Numbers.

Sir Henry Wood, the celebrated conductor of Queen's Hall, London, will make the first appearance of his visit to America when he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest at the second symphony concert of the season in Providence Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15. Sir Henry has been a prime factor in the development of musical performance in England for many years. He has been the conductor of the Promenade concerts since they were founded in Queen's Hall, London, in 1895. At these and at the series by the Queen's Hall orchestra, he has introduced to his country important new music of the last 40 years. He will also lead the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

For his Providence program, Sir Henry Wood announces two English scores of special interest; a suite which he has arranged drawn from the dramatic works of Henry Purcell, the 17th century composer, and Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. In these Variations upon a theme which is not definitely disclosed, Elgar characterizes his various friends, none of whom are mentioned by name. Also upon the program is a little known Rondino of Beethoven, for eight wind instruments, and the Andante from the first Cassation of Mozart, for strings. These pieces belong to the youthful days of the two composers. Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody complete the program.

NATIONAL WANT-AD WEEK JAN. 14 TO 21

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN [illegible]

Two Leading Musical Events Scheduled for Current Week

Providence Festival Chorus Presents Annual Mid-Winter Concert This Afternoon.—Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night

The annual mid-winter concert by the Providence Festival Chorus at the Metropolitan Theatre this afternoon and the Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday night in the same auditorium bring two of the important musical events of the season into the same week. The Festival Chorus concert is discussed elsewhere in today's Journal.

The Symphony's program, the second of the season, is of unique interest not only for the fact that it will be conducted by a distinguished visitor, Sir Henry Wood, but for its content. In it will be found an array of works that are in the main unfamiliar to most concert-goers. Sir Henry is noted for the freshness and vitality of his programs, of which this one may be taken as an example. He has been a prime factor in the development of musical performances in England for many years. Conductor of the Promenade Concerts since they were founded in Queen's Hall, London, in 1895, of the Queen's Hall Orchestra series and other concerts, he has introduced to his country most of the important new music in the last 40 years.

He will be making the first public appearance of his present visit to this country Tuesday night and will later in the week conduct the orchestra in Boston, taking the place of Dr. Koussevitsky during the latter's customary mid-season vacation. The program for Tuesday and other announcements of the week follow:

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sir Henry Wood, guest conductor, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 o'clock.

Suite, arranged for orchestra by Sir Henry Wood .... Purcell
Rondino (for eight wind instruments) .... Beethoven
Andante from Cassation No. 1 for strings .... Mozart
"Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, opus 36 .... Elgar
1. "C. A. E." L'istesso tempo
II. "H. D. S.-P." Allegro
III. "R. B. T." Allegretto
IV. "W. M. B." Allegro di molto
V. "R. P. A." Moderato
VI. "Ysobel" Andantino
VIII. "Troyte" Presto
VIIII. "W. N." Allegretto
IX. "Nimrod" Moderato
X. "Dorabella—Intermezzo." Allegro
XI. "G. R. S." Allegro di molto
XII. "B. G. N." Andante
XIII. "X. X. X.—Romanza" Moderato
XIV. "E. D. U.—Finale"
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem .... Strauss
"Norwegian Rhapsody" .... Lalo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD
AMERICAN

JA[illegible]

Star Of Opera Will Sing Here With Symphony

When Rose Bampton, prima donna contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, makes her Baltimore debut on January 24, as soloist with the National Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, she will sing three numbers. Her first offering will be an aria from Gluck's "Orfeo." This will be followed by an aria from Rossini's "Cenerentela." In the latter part of the program she will sing the famous Aria de Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

The concert will be directed by Dr. Hans Kindler, and the orchestral works will include a Mozart symphony and numbers by Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Tschaikowsky.

The second of the series of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be given at the Lyric on January 31.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JA[illegible]

FESTIVAL CHORUS WILL SING TODAY

Advent of 11th Season Will Be Celebrated with 20th Major Presentation.

ROYAL DADMUN IS SOLOIST

Musical Event Under Sponsorship of Stephen O. Metcalf to Be Held in Metropolitan Theatre at 3:15

The Providence Festival Chorus will celebrate the advent of its 11th season and its 20th major presentation this afternoon when, with Royal Dadmun, eminent American baritone, as its guest soloist, it offers its annual winter concert at 3:15 in the Metropolitan Theatre under the patronage of Stephen O. Metcalf.

Comprising approximately 300 voices the chorus will be directed by John B. Archer in a program of English, Russian and sacred numbers by noted composers.

Box Office Open at 10 A. M.

It was stated at the Metropolitan Theatre box office last night that reservations will be accepted, by telephone or otherwise, up to 2 o'clock this afternoon, which will be the deadline for holding seats. After that all tickets will be on general sale. To accommodate music lovers who may desire to take advantage of the reservation facilities the box office will be opened at 10 o'clock this morning. The telephone number, unlisted in the current directory, is Gaspee 9165. Seats are available at 25 cents and 50 cents, a scale made possible by Mr. Metcalf's sponsorship.

Today's soloist, Mr. Dadmun, has appeared with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras, the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto and the New York Oratorio Society. He is to have three groups of numbers in today's concert. Among the composers whose works he will sing are Rachmaninoff, Leoncavallo, Koenemann, Edouard Grieg and Roger Quilter.

Walter R. Morris will sing an obbligato solo during that part of the program devoted to the Russian pieces.

[illegible] Column 4

Ruth Burt Sampson is to accompany Mr. Dadmun and George Faulkner will be the chorus accompanist.

[illegible]
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM

JAN 1 6 1934

SAYS MANY SO-CALLED FOLK SONGS ARE FAKES

BOSTON, Jan. 16—Many so-called folk songs are fakes, Sir Henry Joseph Wood, famed conductor of the New Queen's hall orchestra in London, believes.

In an interview, the chubby-cheeked and van-dyked Sir Henry, who is to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra week, obs[illegible] a chuckle:

"There is too much pious regard by some people for anything suspected of being a folk song. I think a good many of them must have resulted from some drunk leaning on a beer barrel and singing a bad, bad tune badly. Then someone came along looking for a folk song, said, 'How lovely!' and saved the thing."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1[illegible] 1934

Sir Henry Wood

Eminent British musician will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at concert in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Music at Library

Of the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday evening the Providence Public Library has Elgar's "Enigma" Variations and Strauss's symphonic tone poem, "Don Juan." Both are arranged for piano playing, the first by the composer himself, the second by Otto Singer. The other selections on the program have been ordered and will be available as soon as received. Descriptive notes on some of these selections, Purcell's Orchestral Suite, the "Enigma" Variations and "Don Juan," may be found in such books as "The Concert-Goer's Library of Descriptive Notes," by Rosa Newmarch; "Stories of Symphonic Music," by Gilman, and "Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp.

There is an interesting interview with Sir Henry Wood, the guest conductor, to be found in "The Etude" for December, 1927, entitled "Roads to Success in Music," in which he stresses his early activities and the many years of preparatory training as factors in the success of his later achievements.

The music collection includes several of the selections to be sung by the Providence Festival Chorus at its concert today. They are as follows: The sacred choruses, "By Babylon's Wave," by Gounod, and "Sing Unto God," by Handel; the choruses in the English group of songs, "Turn Back O Man," "The Blue Bird" and "Swansea Town," and "Kalinka" of the Russian group.

Of the songs which the soloist, Royal Dadmun, will sing the following are listed: "Invocation of Orpheus," Peri; "Eros," Grieg; the two by Rachmaninoff, "O Thous Billowy Harvest Field," and "As Fair Is She as Noonday Light," and the Prologue from "Pagliacci."

At the beginning of the year 1934 the library finds it has a music collection comprising 14,794 pieces of music and 2221 volumes of musical literature ready to serve its community. A piece of music may be explained to mean one separate score, or it may mean a collection containing a number of selections. It has been largely through the interest and support of public spirited musicians that the library has so steadily built up this collection.

Valuable gifts of music have been generously given to it, these gifts sometimes representing the entire libraries of discriminating musicians. That the musical people of Providence appreciate this music and the service its library offers, is evidenced by the fact that during the year 1933 music scores were borrowed 10,363 times and musical books 2559 times.

98

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

98

JAN 14 1934

As Music Goes

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for Tuesday night is unusual in its number of works that are not well known to this or, we think, to any public. The offering of these novelties, for such as they are, teaches that there is a great deal of very good music, even of the classics, which is seldom heard. The well read musician could name a large number of works very well worth the hearing which are seldom if ever heard in these times. And occasionally some stranger, more from erudition than from courage, astonishes us with a program such as this. Sir Thomas Beecham did this very thing on his memorable visit to this city. In addition to seldom heard works he brought classic renditions of the "old masters" which were good to hear and which gave pause. In like manner one considers this choice of program by one from across the seas which may be representative of a school of thought with which we are not too familiar.

It is but natural that a conductor's programs would reflect his inner thoughts or that the ways of his orchestra should take paths which would lead them into divert green pastures. On one hand we find a tendency toward what some are pleased to call modernism, on the other we may hear much of a music that is glittering in its attractiveness yet leaves nothing for contemplation and reflection. Occasionally a bored or irritated public will burst into flame which burns feebly for a while and then dies out for lack of fuel. Yet it is the public which is to be pleased, and the "one that pays the public has the right to name the tune." Nor has this public ever sought to dictate what programs should be. Its suggestions have always been mild, and most humble. Music critics are for the most part kindly disposed towards those who would fain offer incongruous atonalities and physical monstrosities in place of good "old English roast beef." It is rare for one to come down flat-footed and dub music very bad and unwholesome or to suggest that form of musical ration which he thinks is suited to his public.

In the same way the public listens, applauds and retires quietly to think it over, and if it rebels against its musical fare, it grieves silently without moan or cry.

A Modern Idea

In pictorial art we are now taught that angles are more graceful and beautiful than curves and that the human figure is best portrayed by odds and ends of cubes arranged in masses to suit the mood of the artist. Incongruity and incoherence are the watchwords of some of our linear thinkers. We have very much the same thing in music. There is a cult or group which would substitute discord for melody, erratic cavortings for stately measure, and noise for music.

But Sir Henry Wood does not bring us any such program. No loyal Briton could resist the urge to bring to us music which was English in character. He might have done us a real service and brought a program of British composers—there have been enough of them and we should know more of what is being done on the "Tight Little Island." Yet he brings us Purcell, of the time of Handel, and Scarlatti and the admired Elgar of our own time and thought. He does not prescribe what we ought to have, but what will interest and please us. He is no severe tutor, yet he exposes our ignorance, for we do not know any too much about Purcell or Elgar.

The Elgar of "Gerontius," "Caractacus" and "The Apostles" is well worth a long sermon. What little the old fogies know about Elgar was gained from the performances by the Arion Club of these magnificent oratorios. His originality of musical thought, his expert handling of the modern orchestra and his wealth of musical invention place him among the very great living composers. It is because we have not heard his works oftener that we do not know him better. To Sir Henry Wood for the "Enigma Variations" and to Heifetz, now playing the masterly Elgar violin concerto, are due our thanks for this fleeting glimpse of true musical greatness.

Musical Intelligence

How many of us could recognize our friends in musical allusion or description is not easy to tell. How well it worked when the experiment was made in England has not yet been revealed unto us. It must have been a very closely knit circle of musicians and a very highly educated coterie at that to recognize character as interpreted in music. As far as musical intelligence, or even literary appreciation goes, it is not easy to conjecture how many of us would know our best friends were they described in prose or verse. It has been said, however, that the English public is far better informed in matters musical than we are. Until very recently the English press has surpassed us in the quality of its musical criticism, and even now one welcomes as authoritative the dicta of Ernest Newman and Fox-Strangways. Yet it would not be easy to find among American composers compositions which equal these oratorios of Elgar or the epoch-making works of Vaughan Williams, Bantock, Holst, Bridge, Bax and the brilliantly cometic William Turner Walton.

Yes, we must pause a long time before we may claim musical supremacy. We must leave our smug satisfaction and acknowledge our faults before the record of these great musicians. Should defence of this postulate arise it must be remembered that many composers who reside in this country are Americans in domicile only, being foreigners in race and language, whereas most of the English musicians are distinctly British in race, language and tradition. There is a thoroughness and genuineness in the sincerity of much of this music which we lack because of the lower standards of musical education which prevail here. This does not mean that we do not make good music in this country but it cannot be denied that, save for some of the latest developments of modernistic idioms we have not made nearly as much nor as good as the English.

A good many years ago an English orchestra gave two concerts here through the enterprise of the lamented Warren Fales. With two or three exceptions this orchestra was composed of native born Englishmen. Can America duplicate such an orchestra? Or can it furnish forth many symphony orchestras in which a majority of its members can understand the English language? Or its conductors speak it?

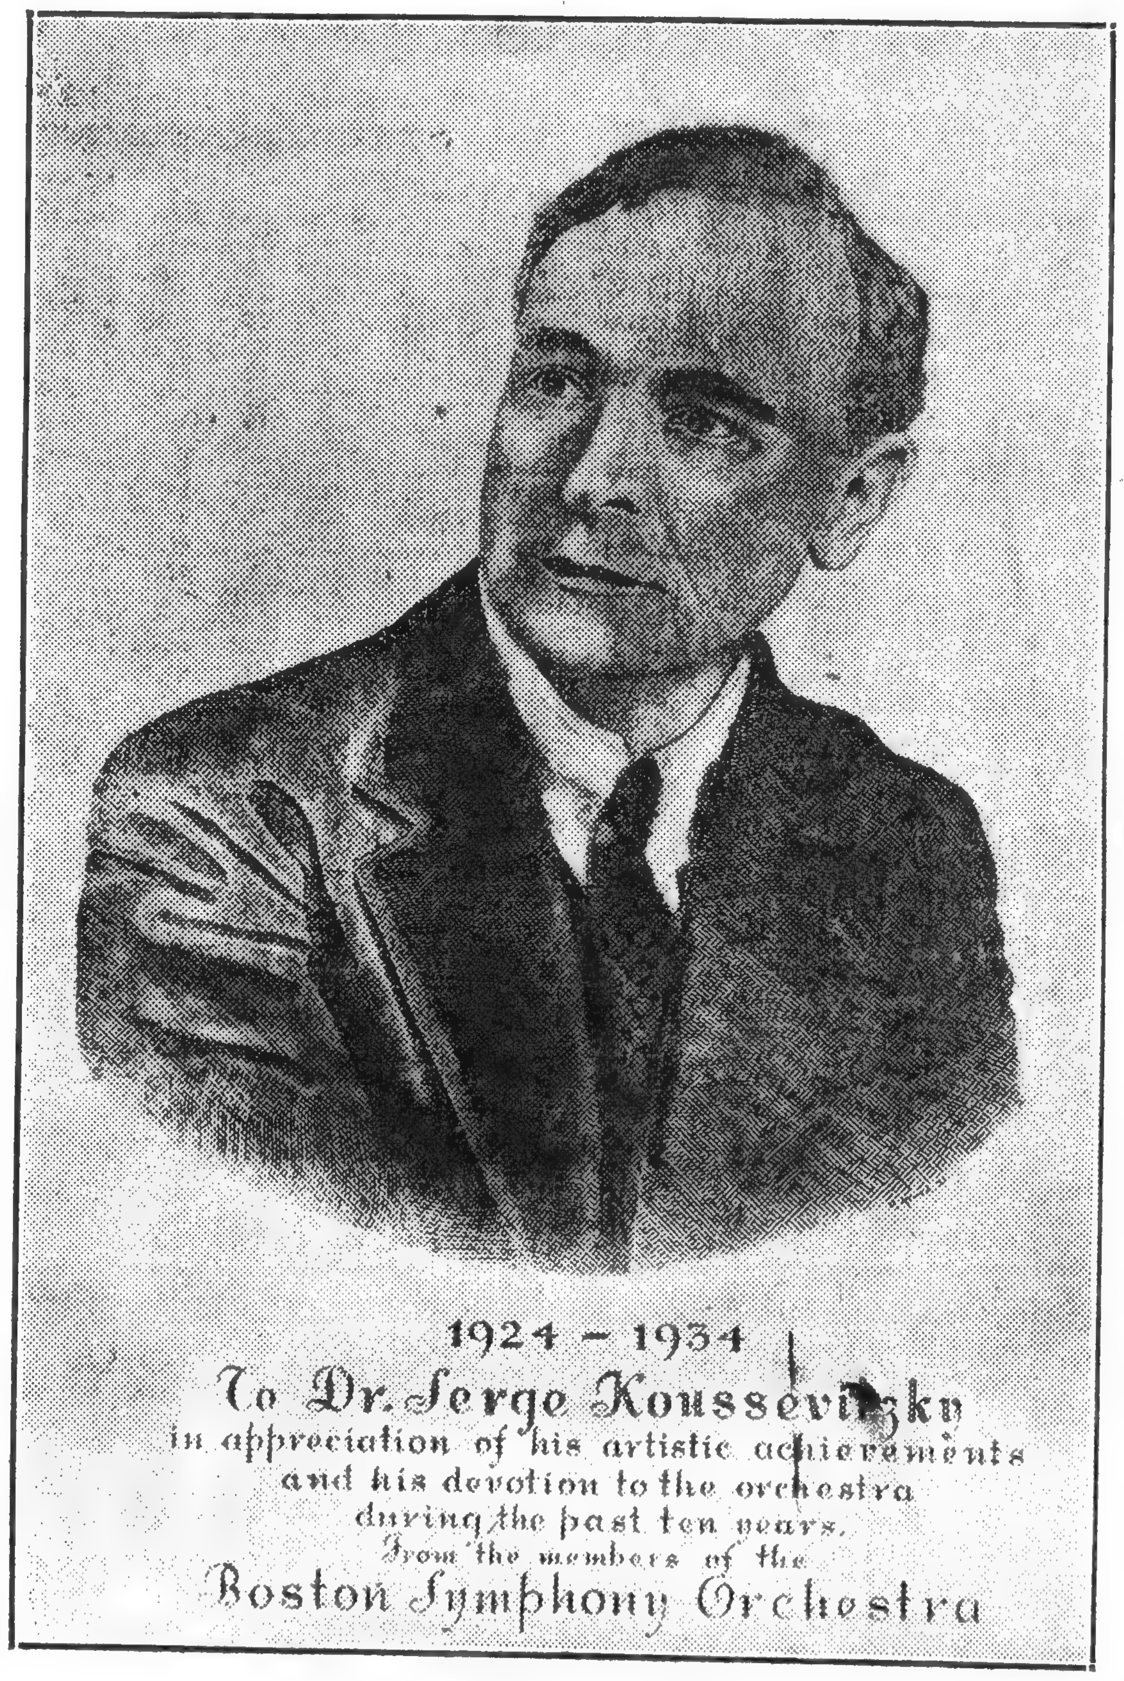
So we welcome the great Sir Henry Wood—would that he had brought more of the music which is close to his heart. We admire his catholicity of musical taste, we appreciate his prominent position in English music and we shall accept as authoritative his interpretation of his friend's music. Without knowing him we may predict that his work will be safe and sane and that he will add to our fund of musical information and musical pleasure.

SIR HENRY WOOD, who is seen here saying good-bye to his daughter in London, has waited fifty years for an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and yesterday he left for America to fulfil that ambition. "I cannot tell you what great pride it will give me," he said to the "Daily Express" Liverpool Correspondent. "When I was a little boy I was taken to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It fired me with two ambitions—to become a musician and to conduct that particular orchestra. At last the invitation has come."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY,

nd Players === Music

The Tie That Binds



1924 – 1934
To Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in appreciation of his artistic achievements and his devotion to the orchestra during the past ten years.
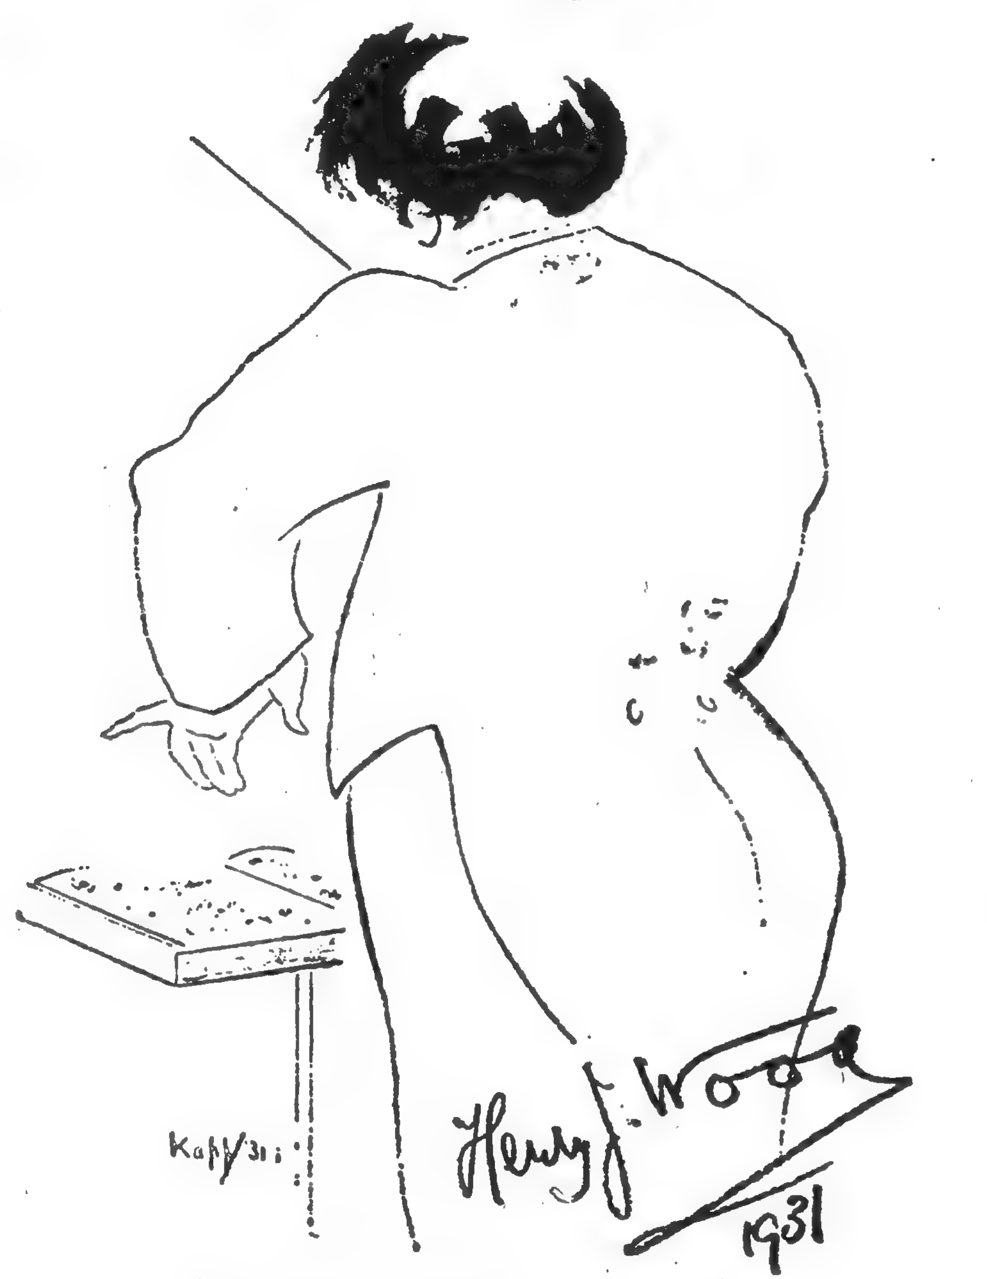
From the members of the
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Koussevitzky in Silver

Plaque Given to the Conductor by the Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a Recent "Family Dinner," to Mark Ten Years of Work Together

"Reverse English"



Sir Henry Wood Conducting

As the Audience at the Symphony Concert Today Saw the Noted Guest (Sketch Reproduced by Courtesy of the British Broadcasting Corporation)

Sir Henry Wood, Incoming Guest

From "The Proms" in London To Symphony Hall, Other Prospects

As guest-conductor through the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's holiday, Sir Henry Wood began rehearsals yesterday with the Symphony Orchestra; goes with it this evening for a concert in Providence; resumes rehearsals in Boston; awaits the "subscription audiences" of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall. His long career and high place in London, his "Prom" concerts there every August, September and October, have made him known to many Bostonians. At Symphony Hall they will see the same stout, energetic figure, the keen eyed, bearded face, the flower in buttonhole that they have known at the Queen's Hall overseas. As it is, a note about Sir Henry's present and past, his ways with his work and his ideas about it is in order. To hand is an article that his friend, Sir Hugh Allen, contributed a few years ago to the London Observer. From it come the following paragraphs:

"There is no gainsaying: Henry Wood is the Proms. Far and wide the mention of his name brings the Proms to the mind. The sixty programs of the series reveal him and stand for the confession of his musical faith. He says you must know your classics, and he plays them annually in great array. Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, and Schubert are always there; Bach comes more and more into his own; Handel is no longer neglected. And on this foundation of certainties he builds a robust constitution which can easily and happily digest his Strauss, Skriabin, Stravinsky, Bartók, those other complexities of sounds into which modern composers so readily fall. Nor will he allow British music to be neglected, and sees to it that the elder generation is represented equally with the more recent Vaughan Williams, Holst, and Bax.

"As to the younger generation of composers, there is an ever-increasing number of these who rise up and call him blessed for the work he does for them and what he does for their works, and for the help and encouragement he gives them while they are learning to walk. And then there are the executive artists who have been baptized into the Proms and have started their careers with the stimulating feeling that they have taken their first jump under the searching eye of a most exacting but kindly conductor. Sir Henry has always believed that everyone who is to make good must go through the mill. He is a fine example of that process himself; and he sees to it that all the people who come into his sphere of operations shall undergo this salutary discipline. For orchestra, singers, players, and audiences alike, the Proms are the mill where the grinding is done, and the flour is of the finest and very nourishing.

"How comes it that Wood has made for himself such a position in this country as a conductor? He started with the most serious handicap. He is a real Britisher, born and bred in this country. He learned all his music in England; and has practised his profession unremittingly in England for England. No one has exercised a finer influence on his time and generation or given himself so unsparingly to its service. More than anyone before him, he has come into touch with our music in every part of the kingdom, and has felt the pulse of our musical life. He has never visited any society or organization that he did not leave it the better for the contact. And the reason for all this is that he learned his job by actual experience and never took anything at second-hand, and so has some practical solution for every problem that presents itself.

"Sir Henry's life is an example of self-help and hard work, and his motto 'Thorough.' The effect of a life so lived is that everybody trusts him, for they know he will deliver the goods. When Sir Henry calls a rehearsal for ten o'clock, you may set your watch by the first beat he makes—and everybody is there! If he promises a composer that his work shall be rehearsed at 11.10 he will hear it rehearsed then. If he has arranged that a composer shall rehearse his own works at that hour, provided the composer is there himself at that time, it will be done to the minute. This quality of reliability is not always found with the artistic temperament, but Wood has it 'in excelsis.'

"This reliability, an immense range of musical sympathy, and a commanding personality are the factors in the hold that he has obtained on the English mind. They have helped to make the notable successes he has achieved and the records he has established. Nothing is left to chance with him. He is a veritable glutton for work. No point of organization is too trivial for his attention, no phrase-mark unimportant. And behind it all and through it all are warmth, imagination and a noble view of his calling. He has had an unrivaled experience in his art and has covered more ground than one can measure. He has filled life to the brim. He has led us a long way and for a long time, and we are all devoted to him."

Globe Jan 16

SIR HENRY WOOD TO CONDUCT HERE FOR DR KOUSSEVITZKY

After Rehearsal, Famous London Leader Takes Time Out to Appraise Things Musical

"You have a magnificent orchestra in the Boston Symphony, and I think Dr Koussevitzky has done remarkable work," said Sir Henry Wood as he emerged from the conductor's retiring room in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. He had just completed the first rehearsal of a program which he will conduct at the regular subscription concerts here next Friday and Saturday. He is to appear as guest during Dr Koussevitzky's annual two weeks' vacation.

"You know, I visited Boston years ago, in Gericke's time, just to hear two concerts by the Boston Symphony. It was all a part of the musical education my father planned for me. This, however, is the first time I have conducted here."

Seating his short, stocky figure upon a lounge, Sir Henry talked affably, eagerly, for nearly an hour. But first he had to speak his admiration for the scenic beauties of our North Shore, which he visited Sunday.

An Organist at 10

"I have never seen anything like it except, perhaps, at Oslo, in Norway."

Born Henry Joseph Wood in London, 63 years ago, he was knighted in 1911. For about 40 years he has been one of England's most prominent musicians. His parents were musical and from them he received his first instruction in the tonal art. At 10 he was a church organist. The thorough training he received qualified him for manifold activities in the art, but conducting has been his chief work. For a time he taught singing. Beginning his career as conductor with opera companies, it was not long before his ability brought him before the musical public of London. In 1895 he founded what have ever since been known as the "Promenade" concerts. They may roughly be compared to our "Pops."

A profound believer in putting before the public the best in symphonic literature, Sir Henry is also a very practical man. He weaned his audiences from lighter music to the more substantial masterpieces.

"We had to do this gradually," he said, smiling. "If we had begun with the sort of program which I am to conduct here this week, we would have been obliged to shut up. As it was, the first 10 years were difficult But now the "Proms" public will subscribe, weeks in advance, to a series of eight concerts virtually devoted to the music of Bach. I am proud of this."

SIR HENRY WOOD

"They need a little light French cooking."

Pays Tribute to Radio

"The foundation of this general admiration for Bach was laid about 10 years ago, when the boys of some of our public schools (we should call them private schools over here) were required to take part in a performance of the B minor Mass. It was amusing, at first, to see those boys of Eton and Harrow going about with vocal scores under their arms."

Sir Henry looked a little old-fashioned in appearance, dressed in a black suit and high black boots, with a bow tie at the top of a stiffly starched shirtfront, and a small stud, relieving the expanse of gleaming linen. But his animation and easy manner of speaking, together with his interest in such a modern aspect of life as the radio, belie his graying beard.

"I believe very much in the wireless (the English term for radio)—as a medium of bringing to many the best in music. But they ought to realize that music by wireless is not quite the real thing.

Favors Women in Orchestras

Sir Henry spoke of the radio orchestra which he leads, that of the British Broadcasting Company veering to the subject of women as orchestral players.

"There are 16 women in this orchestra. I favor the idea, for in my opinion men play better when there are women playing with them. Women, generally speaking, are especially adept with the woodwind instruments. I don't care so much to hear them play the horn or the trombone, for example."

"You have some very interesting American composers over here, such as Howard Hanson and John Alden Carpenter. American composers ought not, however, to be too greatly influenced from outside.

To Leave Here Jan 28

"We have some promising young men in England, too, especially William Walton, who is very clever without being eccentric. So many young men try to be too original, instead of regarding themselves as a logical outgrowth of what has gone before. But British composers ought to be careful not to make their music sound too much like 'roast beef.' They need a little light French cooking."

Sir Henry was pleased to hear, after these observations, that Walton's music has met with particular approval here in Boston.

Sir Henry will also conduct the Boston Symphony in Providence this evening. He will remain in the United States until Jan 28. His last scheduled appearance is a radio concert in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

18 1934

Tin Pan Alley Solace
'Many Folk Songs Fakes'

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Here's solace for the American composer struggling as a product of American soil.

Musical bigwigs at home and from abroad have been laying down the law that he must study folksong—Indian, Negro, old English of Colonial vintage—soak himself in it and write like it. He has been told to see what the famous Vaughan Williams and others have done for England by grace of folksong study.

Americans have been told by Englishmen that the path to writing characteristically American music was by taking inspiration from the old English folksongs brought over by the early Colonists.

This was set down as so much bother and bosh by Sir. Henry Joseph Wood today in an interview after rehearsing the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he will lead as guest conductor Friday and Saturday.

Asked what he would say to American composers on the subject of basing their works on folksong inspiration, Sir Henry replied with a jovial toss of his bushy head and Van Dyked chubby-cheeked visage:

"There is too much pious regard by some people for anything suspected of being a folksong. Many so-called folksongs are fakes. I think a good many of them must have resulted from some drunk leaning on a beer barrel and singing a bad tune badly. Then someone came along looking for a folksong, said, 'How lovely!' and saved the thing."

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

JAN 19 1934

"Schoenberg, composer and orchestra conductor, was unable to lead the Boston Symphony because of a strained back." So that's what that sort of music does for a fellow! But who's surprised?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 21 1934

◆ ◆ ◆

A representative gathering of society attended the concert presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening. As usual, a number of dinner parties preceded the concert.

Concert-Chronicle

New to Boston Trans Jan 18

FOR his concerts on Friday and Saturday as guest-conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Sir Henry Wood has chosen numbers which bear witness to his catholic taste, his regard for native English music, his ability to build a program in which rarely played pieces predominate. His loyalty to the music of his own land brings to this program the seventeenth-century Purcell (who has often been proclaimed the greatest musician England ever produced) with a suite assembled and re-scored by the conductor from an opera, two sonatas and incidental music to forgotten Restoration plays. The program brings also the "Enigma Variations" of Elgar, the elder master among living English composers. They are seldom heard in America. Novel to the Symphony Concerts are a Rondino for wind instruments by Beethoven and an Andante from a Cassation by Mozart; while Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody" has been played at Symphony Hall only at widely spaced intervals and not at all recently—1888, 1891, 1919. Only one repertory piece stands upon this program, Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan."

The Suite assembled by Sir Henry out of Purcell's works runs in five numbers:

1. Prelude, Molto maestoso, said originally to have preceded Act Third of the opera, "Dioclesian," but in the edition of the Purcell Society it introduces the chorus, "Behold, O Mighty'st of Gods," in the mask, in the Fifth Act of that opera. Sir Henry scores it for moderately full orchestra, including glockenspiel and organ.

2. Minuet, from the incidental music to Elkanah Settle's tragedy, "Distressed Innocence, or The Princess of Persia." It is exceedingly simple and short—only sixteen measures. Sir Henry opposes two oboes and two bassoons to the string choir in dialogue.

3. Largo, from the Fifth Sonata for two violins, viol de gamba and thorough bass. Sir Henry sets it for organ and strings.

4. "Song of the Birds" from the mask in Thomas Shadwell's adaptation of Shakspeare's "Timon of Athens." Immediately after the overture, two of Cupid's followers, George and Jacob, sing as a duet:

> "Hark! how the songsters of the grove
> Sing anthems to the God of Love.
> Hark! How each amorous wingèd pair
> With Love's great praises fills the air,
> On every side the charming sound
> Does from the hollow woods rebound."

There is an obbligato of two flutes in the original. Appropriating them, the arranged score employs three flutes, two clarinets, two horns, glockenspiel and strings.

5. Finale. Vivace from the First Sonata. This is again scored for the whole ensemble. Sir Henry's Suite is still in manuscript. It is dated Nov. 7, 1909.

Beethoven's Rondino needs only a brief note. Though it was published after his death, it belongs to his youth at Bonn before he went in his later twenties to live at Vienna. Presumably it was intended as "table-music" for the entertainment of the Elector of Cologne (who also kept his state at Bonn) Max Franz, youngest son of the Empress, Maria Theresa. It is written for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. The principal theme is heard at the beginning from the first horn. In orthodox rondo-fashion, there are several short contrasts between repetitions of this theme.

Mozart's Andante is from The First Cassation, No. 63 in Köchel's catalogue. A Cassation, be it said, is a piece of instrumental music in several movements, popular in the eighteenth century, usually intended to be played in the open air. In some respects it resembles other forms of the time, the Serenade and the Divertimento. The movements of the complete Cassation from which Sir Henry takes the Andante are (1) Marcia, (2) Allegro, (3) Andante, (4) Minuet, (5) Adagio, (6) Minuet, (7) Finale: Allegro Assai. The largest number of instruments used in any of these divisions are two oboes, two horns and strings. The Andante, which is in exceedingly simple two-part form, is scored for strings alone. It was written in Mozart's fourteenth year. A. H. M.

Post Jan 20

8

SIR HENRY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Wins Orchestra as Well as Audience as Master

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday, for the second time since Dr. Koussevitzky became conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, a guest conductor, who was altogether a worthy substitute, stood in his place. Before it was Sir Thomas Beecham. Yesterday it was again a Britisher, Sir Henry Wood.

A MASTER CONDUCTOR

It does no good to cry over spilt milk, but there must have been many who sat before Sir Henry Wood yesterday who recalled with regret his inability to accept the invitation extended him in 1918 to become the immediate successor of Dr. Muck. By every sign Sir Henry won yesterday's audience as he had so plainly won the orchestra itself. A man wholly without show or ostentation in manner, he is nevertheless thorough master of the art that he has so long and so notably practised. He plays upon the orchestra as upon an instrument, surely and resourcefully and always musically.

There have been performances in Symphony Hall of Strauss' "Don Juan" more tumultuously passionate, more incandescent perhaps, than that of yesterday. Yet it is difficult to recall one in which Strauss' score has seemed so beautiful as sheer sound or so superbly fashioned. Any suspicion that the work was ageing was silenced. The music had assumed classic contours. Here was a masterpiece in which form and expression were in perfect equipoise. Thus to hear Strauss in these questioning days was salutary.

Elgar's Music Revealed

As for the performance of Elgar's "Enigma" variations which, to general acclaim, had ended the first part of the concert, it is enough merely to say that never before in Symphony Hall had the music been completely revealed. Ernest Newman has long been telling us that English music, particularly Elgar's, should be conducted by an Englishman. And no doubt he is right. There are Anglo-Saxon traits, a peculiar sentiment, a certain kind of strength, that a conductor of an alien race may not exactly sense. Especially memorable yesterday were the performances of those two most appealing variations, "Nimrod" and "Dorabella." A most excellent composition this, marred only by a suggestion of obviousness at the end. Restraint becomes the Anglo-Saxon better than exuberance.

This same racial sympathy was observable in Sir Henry's conducting in the orchestral suite which he himself has skillfully fashioned from the dramatic and chamber music of a much earlier Englishman, the 17th century Purcell, a composer of whom most of us all know too little. What strength and solidity there was in the Prelude from the incidental music to the play "Dioclesian," what touching beauty in the Largo from the fifth Sonata for strings, what charm or vigor, as the case might be, in the three remaining movements.

Two Novelties

There were two other novelties in this programme of six brief pieces, itself a welcome change from the more usual order of things. Of these one was an early, sufficiently agreeable but far from important Rondino for eight wind instruments by Beethoven, the other a wholly delightful Andante for strings from a Cassation composed by Mozart in Italy at the age of 14.

Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody, last heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1919, brought the end, in a performance that glorified a not too impressive music, that again set in relief the virtues of a band and conductor most fortunately joined.

Globe MUSIC Jan 20

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sir Henry Wood, the eminent British conductor, appears as guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in the absence of Dr Koussevitzky upon the latter part of his annual vacation. Though his name is inseparably associated with the Queen's Hall "Promenade" Symphony concerts in London—a British musical institution, which he founded nearly 40 years ago and has carried on ever since—Sir Henry has had long and varied experience as conductor of choral and operatic music, as well as a teacher of singing. A man of 63, short and stocky, he would have looked on the podium yesterday—had his clothing been disheveled and his hair and beard longer—strikingly like the famous drawings of Brahms conducting. (Yet there the similarity ends, for the mighty Johannes was no great shakes when it came to directing an orchestra.)

Sir Henry elected to play a curiously assorted program of six items, one which looked over-long on paper but which was not more than the length of an average Symphony concert. The first was a charming suite by Henry Purcell, the 17th century Englishman, drawn from music he had written to contemporary stage pieces and from purely instrumental works. This was orchestrated, a little too heavily here and there, by Sir Henry himself in 1909. The suite was played for the first time in Boston, as were a youthful—though posthumously published—rondino for eight wind instruments, by Beethoven, and an andante for strings from a "Cassation" that Mozart composed in Italy when he was 14. The more substantial items were Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma Variations," by which this contemporary Englishman, whom Sir Henry Wood greatly admires, may possibly be most widely known among musicians; Richard Strauss' still verdant symphonic poem. "Don Juan," and Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody," a synthetic and stale compound out of a musical chemist's dusty laboratory.

From the first, Sir Henry confirmed accounts which have come from Europe of his authority as an orchestral drill-master and a musician intent upon polish of detail. An initial glimpse of his wide, practical beat with baton swinging boldly almost at arm's length, a beat which he retained even in passages of most involved counterpoint and phrasing, conveyed an idea of the magnetism and force which have in part won him the European reputation he enjoys.

He mentioned to the present writer, during an interview earlier in the week that he likes "drama in music." His interpretations yesterday reflected this conviction, though even in "Don Juan" the drama was that of a man whose intellect is always master of his temperament. The ultimate degree of gorgeousness of tone and of subtle nuance, together with the emotional flights usually to be observed in Boston Symphony concerts were replaced yesterday by steady rhythmic swing and an emanation of thorough intellectual grasp of the scores. Strauss' venerable hero went through his amorous adventures with gusto; he did not, however, reveal high blood-pressure. Save for a tendency to transform an andante into an adagio, there was nothing in Sir Henry's conducting to which even the most prejudiced listener might reasonably take exception.

Sir Henry was more shrewd than some might at first suspect, in placing the pretty little pieces of Beethoven and Mozart upon his list. Simple as these may seem, they require fastidious manipulation of the instruments involved. In their fashion, they are distinctly "virtuoso" pieces.

The audience and the members of the orchestra alike bestowed on Sir Henry applause of utmost cordiality, applause that suitably rewarded the work of one of the most prominent musicans of our time.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will play Stravinsky's ballet music for strings, "Apollon Musagete"; Roy Harris' new "symphony; 1933," and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

C. W. D.

Read the Want pages in tomorrow's Globe. To get the best results from your Want and Classified advertisements, use the daily and Sunday Globe.

Concert-Chronicle

Jan 22 Trans

Sir Henry Takes Leave

THE audience of Saturday evening at the Symphony Concert lagged not at all behind the audience of Friday afternoon in warm welcome to Sir Henry Wood, in apparent pleasure in program and performance. Between conductor and orchestra flowed also a constant stream of amenities. The whole week's visit indeed, could hardly have been more fortunate. Sir Henry and Lady Wood go from Boston, which they have thoroughly explored, to New York, where he has engagements to keep in radio studios. Between Schönberg in Cambridge and Sir Henry in Boston the former standard for guests at the Symphony Concerts seems regained.

Incidents and Prospects

When the Symphony Orchestra goes on tour southward during the week of Jan. 29, Mr. Sanromá will be heard in various cities in Professor Hill's Concertino for piano. Later in the season Dr. Koussevitzky will find room for it at Symphony Hall. Hitherto it has been played only at Cambridge and New Haven.

---

adv. Jan 21

America First—

Concerning the Va

Schoenberg and His Little Known Musi

By Moses Smith

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra audiences had looked for ward with great eagerness to the recent prospect of watchin Arnold Schoenberg conduct a program of his own music. A sudden muscular strain prevented him from leading the or chestra before the Friday and Saturday listeners, and caused his symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," previously unplayed here, to be omitted from performance.

This was a major tragedy of our musical season. It must have caused Schoenberg keen disapment, for he had enjoyed rehearsing these excellent musicians. There was some balm for him, it is true, in the fact that he had already conducted the same program, as scheduled, at Cambridge. He was greeted there with the greatest warmth by the Harvard University audience, while his music moved deeply all within earshot.

The situation had its ironical aspect. For when you examined the scheduled program, which included the symphonic poem, the string sextet, "Verklaerte Nacht," and the brilliant transcription of a Bach organ prelude and fugue in E-flat, you found none of the works by which Schoenberg has become famous (or infamous, according to the point of view) for having caused a revolution in the language of tone.

* * *

"VERKLAERTE NACHT" was composed in 1899, when Schoenberg was 25 years old. A romantic poem by Richard Dehmel inspired the composer to write music in the style with which he and almost all other young composers were in ardent sympathy—the emotional, chromatic, sensuous style of Richard Wagner. Three years later he wrote "Pelleas and Melisande," developing that same style to even greater richness. Although these creations bore the unmistakable label of post-Wagnerianism, they also bore witness to the creative genius of Schoenberg, and attracted the attention of cognoscenti to a new master. Hearing them today (I was fortunate enough to hear "Pelleas" by bits in rehearsal) the listener is impressed with the beauty of these compositions in their own right.

But for Schoenberg they marked a close to his first period of composing. He felt himself within bonds. In such a style he could say no more, for there was nothing more for him to say. That is why he began to make a new tool, a new style, a new language. The years that followed saw him creating this new language, breaking from the past, step by step—the string quartet of 1904 and 1905, the chamber symphony of 1906, and the second string quartet of 1907-1908. In the last movement of this second quartet (which we heard early this season) the bonds were definitely broken. Schoenberg was free.

* * *

WHAT were the bonds? To describe them without recourse to the technical language of music is impossible. In brief, Schoenberg renounced the sacred principle of tonality. He broke down the seven tone scale—major and minor—with its insistence on the keynote as the most important, and other tones more or less important, according to their relations to one another. Schoenberg embraced, instead, the chromatic scale of twelve notes, all equal and independent.

The first effect was that the very meaning of melody was changed, for what is melodic in the twelve-tone system may be sheer nonsense to ears accustomed only to the traditional seven-tone scale. Secondly, inasmuch as Schoenberg used melodies simultaneously with the freedom of his predecessors, he obtained dissonances dreadful to a race nurtured on the old harmony and counterpoint.

If this seems abstruse, consider the actual reception accorded Schoenberg's first compositions in the new manner. His first quartet required forty rehearsals for performance in Vienna in 1907; and at the concert Schoenberg became involved in a heated wrangle with a member of the audience who insisted on whistling at the music. At subsequent performances of the chamber symphony and the second quartet disturbances increased, and there was wild disorder in the audience. (It is safe to predict there will be no such scene when the chamber symphony is played in Boston next month by Arthur Fiedler and his Boston Sinfonietta.) As Schoenberg's style developed inexorably, the audience became more riotous. In fact, it became necessary to form a society to insure the performance of the compositions before invited guests, so that the music might be heard free from interruption and disturbance.

* * *

Thus comes the paradox that a man who has been called "one of the most universal spirits in the history of music" should sing his lays to deaf ears. Thus the paradox that a man whose pupils revere him, the very music of whose pupils is acclaimed as the work of genius, a man to whom the very greatest masters of our day have paid direct or indirect tribute—that this man should be, so far as his revolutionary music is concerned, unknown to the general public.

* * *

LET us listen now to the great Maurice Ravel: "Never be afraid of imitating. As for me, I joined the Shoenberg school when I wrote my 'Poems of Mallarme' and especially my 'Chansons Madecasses' . . . If these didn't become entirely Schoenbergian it is because I am less afraid, in music, of the element of charm, which he (Schoenberg) avoids to the point of asceticism, to the point of martyrdom"

* * *

SCHOENBERG had originally announced, for his Boston symphony programs, instead of the symphonic poem, two of his more recent and controversial works—the Five Orchestral Pieces of 1909, which Karl Muck once introduced to a scandalized audience, and the "Music Accompanying a Cinema Scene," of 1930. The only American performances of the latter work have been in Havana, Cuba, and at the Hollywood Bowl, both times under the direction of Nicolas Slonimsky, brilliant Boston musician and champion of the neglected music of our time.

Why did Schoenberg change his mind, and apparently settle on a "safe" program? It is inconceivable that the change was due to outside pressure—either from Symphony Hall or any other source. Is it not more likely that the reason is to be found in this epilogue from one of his admirers, Erwin Stein:

"For there is hardly any other way of becoming really familiar with the music of Schoenberg than by studying his works, by studying all of them, in the order of their creation."

Perhaps Schoenberg wanted to start the educating process now!

Aaron Richmond presents
3 Performances Only-Mail Orders No
REPERTORY HUNT. AVE. FEB. 2-
FRI.-SAT.. EVES.; SAT. MAT.

OBSCURED TEXT

101

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 1934

Sir Henry Wood.

There was opportunity last Fri afternoon to hear the Boston S phony orchestra under the direc as guest-conductor of Sir He Wood, who for some 40 years directed the Promenade concerts Queen's hall in London and of also the orchestra of the Natio Broadcasting Co. In appeara he is somewhat short and sto suggesting perhaps the roast of Old England, or, as some has pointed out, the picture Brahms. But once in action th was nothing stodgy about his terpretation of the music in ha His own arrangement of a S from the theatre music of Pur was capitally done. The little R dino of early Beethoven and Andante of the young Mozart w heard at these concerts for the f time, one being expressively pla by a group of the wood-winds horns. Judging from comm heard during the intermission finer interpretation of Elgar's "En ma" Variations has ever b heard in Symphony hall. The co poser is the conductor's friend a fellow Britisher. Naturally brought to his reading of the sc more than ordinary sympathy knowledge. It was a vivid pres tation of the series of musical p traits, in which contrasts w sharply marked in which the m nificent orchestra gave of its b under Sir Henry's leadership. If, is the report, the visiting cond tor was less successful with Strauss "Don Juan" than Dr. Ko sevitzky, to a listener who has happened to hear the Koussevitz version, Sir Henry infused it w no little tonal life and color. T Lalo Norwegian Rhapsody, for hi one imagines, was piece from routine repertory, pleasing, but especially distinctive. Let it be sa that, unless this observer is mista en, Sir Henry took the audien by surprise. Clearly he is pra ticed and resourceful conductor, a not by any means lacking in te perament. By the audience he w warmly received. And no less co dially by the members of the chestra who evidently has sens his merits. Half-way across t platform after acknowledging plaudits, he would break into amusing little trot before he disa peared from view. At the close the program there was doubti that the general verdict was th the visiting conductor had ma

---

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

JAN 25 1934

SCREEN
—and—
MUSIC

By DONALD KIRKLEY

YEARS or so this write

The Greatest Symphonist—

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, evide ly does not share the opinion of so Sibelius enthusiasts that Baltim can stand more than one of that co poser's symphonies in a season. A hearing the November concert h Philip S. Hensel, Jr., circulated a tition wherein Mr. Koussevitzky asked for more of the same. petition, with thirty-nine signatu was duly forwarded to Boston.

In reply, the conductor wrote art as follows: "Although I shall e able to include a symphony ibelius in our program on Janu (having played the Second at st concert in Baltimore), I ha planned to give our Baltimore ence the beautiful and rarely p ormed masterpiece, Verklarte Nac y Arnold Schonberg." Elsewhere the letter Mr. Koussevitzky refer to Siekk Sibelius as "the great symphonist of our day."

—o—

Maria Olszewska—

CONSIDERED BY SOME as the greatest co tralto of the day, Maria Olszewska w make her first concert appearance Baltimore tomorrow at the 4 o'clo recital of the Peabody Conservatory Music. She attracted wide attenti last season when she sang Bragaene "Tristan und Isolde" with the Metr politan Opera Company, and is no in her second season with that group.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 1 - 1934

oston Symphony Orchestra Delights In Lyric Concert

a purveyor of words and ideas are times when such com ties seem exasperatingly inade , especially when attempting t down in cold type some sug on of the achievements of a r orchestra.

ch is the predictment confront s now, when desirous of mak ublic proclamation of the Bos Symphony Orchestra's distin ed performance at the Lyric evening.

r the evening's opening Dr. Koussevitsky chose to con his men in Arnold Schonberg's klaerte Nacht," that notable g sextet which has been gthened in the orchestral score full orchestra of strings.

MODERN IN MOOD

ting from the last year of the teenth Century, it is complete today in mood and form, and pite of the highly emotional er of its program this is never ed to dominate the cool, clear of the moonlight illuminating night that forms the setting he passage of a pair of trou lovers.

thin our various limitations of , time and vocabulary, it is ble only to suggest something e subtlety and art of the or ration, in varied and original onies, in effective use of d strings and harmonics, in g shape to the woman's plaint the man's ssurance, in bing passages momentarily ging to mind the frustrated sy of "Tristan und Isolde."

e first violin, played by R. Burgin, contributed to make a whole that seemed shorter than its measured 35 minutes.

SYMPATHETIC ARDOR

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted with that sympathetic understanding and ardor of re-creation which is the special gift of leaders worthy of their position, making use of an equally vivid and imaginative point of view for his reading of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite 'Scheherazade."

An effect of the familiar delights of this composition is not unlike a return to some well-beloved town, where each step brings some remembered charm, and, approaching every corner, one anticipates what is beyond, to find the scene no less lovely, yet differing perhaps in light and shadow, or revealing some detail of beauty unnoticed before.

Last night's was such an experience of panoramic pleasure.

OVATION FOR PIANIST

The concertino for piano and orchestra, by Edward Burlingame Hill, was given an excellent performance by the young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, technically impeccable, synchronizing splendidly with the orchestra, and he was recalled repeatedly.

The piece is, of course, a worthy and adult work, entirely deserving of respectful attention, but its lesser merits were so inevitably cast into the shade by its brilliant neighbors that we are desirous of another hearing for less biased judgment.

H. A. F. P.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

FEB 1 - 1934

oston Symphony Orchestra Catches Fancy of Music Lovers

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

at the Boston Symphony Orchestra has caught the fancy of the element of Baltimore's present music-loving public in a degree that ises to give it a vogue equal to that it enjoyed in the days of its aled supremacy prior to the World War is indicated by the attend- record of the current season.

e audience at its second Lyric concert last night was much larger at the first; it was a smart and beautifully dressed audience, too, here is this to be said of an orchestra that provides such rarely ful performances: It is by no s dependent exclusively upon onable approval. Rather, its l is to all, irrespective of class, appreciate lofty standards of al interpretation. The Boston hony is still a magnificent er of orchestral tradition.

its program last night was not tisfying as that of the first rt, Dr. Koussevitky is at least thanked for introducing to more a novelty whose first ng stimulated an eager desire loser acquaintance.* This was nberg's early "Verklaerte t" (Op. 4), an arrangement tring orchestra of a piece originally written for string sextet. It is of symphonic poem dimensions and has a program derived from a German poem of rather transcendental mysticism by Richard Dehmel.

The first impression was indeed deep and, I think, enduring. The composition reflects an expert, and, as was to be expected, even in such early Schoenberg, an arresting original touch. It is a thing of quite ravishing melodic loveliness, and, despite the fact that its content and instrumentation pay such slight regard to convention, its texture is closely enough woven, its ideas are carried out with sufficient coherence and clarity, to classify it as a work of art whose craftsmanship is above suspicion. Schoenberg was 25 when he wrote it; one realizes the inevitability of changing viewpoint and style caused by the impact of devastating world forces released during the ensuing 35 years. No genius as sensitive as this Viennese (who, ironically enough, is now living in New England) could possibly escape the effect of these forces. But what a pity that he lost the inspiring vision of beauty, the particular phase of spiritual ecstasy, of his "Verklaerte Nacht"!

The succeeding number was also a premiere, but not one that created an insistent demand for a quick repetition. It was a concertino for full orchestra and piano by E. B. Hill, chairman of the division of music at Harvard. While ably enough written, it struck me as being trivial in material and generally lacking in the requirements that make for endurance. The piano part introduced a young Spanish American, J. M. Sanroma, as a sort of obligato soloist. He played with crisp and facile technique and clear vibrant tone, though it was rather disconcerting to note how keenly he eyed the director for his cues.

The performance of the closing number, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," was sufficient in itself to proclaim the insight, the reserve and general technical command of Director Koussevitzky. It was a reading that actually made one forget, for the time, that this has become one of the most hackneyed works of the contemporary repertoire and that, for all its dazzling orchestration, its fascinating groupings and separate episodes, it nevertheless abounds in inescapable banalities.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

FEB 1 - 1934

Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra Under Guidance Of Serge Koussevitzky At Lyric

THOSE PASSAGES of exquisite beauty which occur from time to time in Arnold's Schönberg's "Verklárte Nacht" were for many persons the high spots of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky. Originally a string sextet, it was played in an arrangement for strings only. It is a musical interpretation of a strange poem by Richard Dehmel, called "Weib und die Welt," a poem wherein the ordinary materials, love and moonlight, are used in a very unusual way. Now and then, in his tone poetry. Schönberg catches exactly the moods of his model, and sometimes he transcends them, producing images of unearthly beauty or vivid, sensual impressions.

The composition has its duller moments, and is perhaps, in the opinion of some who heard it, a bit too long for the material employed. But, written at 25, as his first attempt outside the field of chamber music, it clearly foreshadows the ability of the composer in the orchestral domain and contains some love music not often rivaled by his contemporaries. The final tone picture, suggesting happiness and peace under a cold, radiant moon., s one which many will treasure in memory as one of the most beautiful in modern music. It must be heard; it cannot be described in words.

—o—

THE SECOND offering was a new concertino for piano and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, another contemporary composer, who has something to do with Harvard. This was a brief piece, lasting ten minutes or so, and it served to introduce Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, to Baltimore. The concertino is of the same American school which contains George Gershwin. It is haunted by the specter of jazz, although it is a restrained, polite specter fettered by that scholarly orchestration which might be expected of a Harvard man. On the other hand, the chief quality of the piece was liveliness, and the brisk central theme is developed with considerable ingenuity and some fetching fireworks. Mr. Sanroma played the piano portion of the score with assurance and a pleasant brightness, and the concertino as a whole added a vivid spot of color to the program.

—o—

THE "SCHEHERAZADE" symphonic suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, with which the program came to an end, has been performed so frequently of late that it has become almost too familiar. Its popularity, however, remains unchallenged, and its inclusion in last night's program was justified by the well-nigh flawless reading given by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men. The six solid pages of program notes, by the way, formed an exhaustive and enlightening exposition of the piece, and should have been an invaluable aid to those hearing the work for the first time. D. K.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

FEB 2 - 1934

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Orchestra at the Academy; A Season of Russian Opera Opens at the Casino; Toscanini and 'Tristan' and Harriet Cohen

Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for piano and orchestra, Op. 36, which will be heard in Manhattan on Saturday afternoon, was introduced in Brooklyn last night at the third of the Boston orchestra's Academy of Music concerts. One regrets the necessity of reporting it an unimportant piece—brief and qualitatively as well as quantitatively negligible. Mr. Hill has never produced anything entitling him to a place in the first rank even of Bostonian composers, but he has written a number of things which have merited the performances they have achieved. So much cannot be said of the Concertino. There is humor in the piece—its single merit aside from its neat construction—but of a sort to remind the listener that Mr. Hill is and has been these many years at home in academic precincts. Translated into an anecdote and related to one of the composer's classes it would produce only the most mirthless of polite smiles, for there is little less really funny than gentility in a skittish mood. Of the three sections of the Concertino, the first and least developed is the best; the last, the most extensive, the worst, because in it Mr. Hill employs—rather gingerly—an idiom of the psychological bases of which he has no faintest understanding—the idiom of jazz. That Mr. Koussewitsky and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist (to whom this score is dedicated), should pay the Concertino in Boston, where Mr. Hill has many friends and admirers, is understandable; that they should import it to New York is another matter.

The concertino was preceded by Schoenberg's string rhapsody, "Verklaerte Nacht," and followed, after the intermission, by Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony. It was good to hear "Verklaerte Nacht"—the piece is a strange and curiously impressive example of romantic art in decadence, about to pass into the phase of symbolism. One cannot intellectually approve it, yet one finds it eloquent and moving, the expression of an essentially neurotic but communicable emotionalism. My impression of the performance was that it might have been much better; the groups of players were not perfectly co-ordinated under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction; the conductor himself seemed less than secure in his grasp of the score. But the tone of the Boston strings was magical in its transparency and luster.

Comment on the symphony and its performance is scarcely required; Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra have played the Tschaikowsky fourth many times at the Academy, and never less than brilliantly.

NEW YORK MIRROR

FEB 3

MUSIC

A New Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.
Carnegie Hall, 8:40 p. m.

THE PROGRAM:

"Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses)....Stravinsky
Symphony: 1933..........Roy Harris
(First performance in New York)
Symphony No. 4 in E minor (Opus 98)..................Brahms

Mr. Koussevitzky brought a new symphony from Boston to embellish his program in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Harris, the composer, is familiar to us as a contriver of the more musical forms of modern chamber music, less so as a creator of the complex structure of a symphonic mood.

Hearing this symphony for the first time last night, I was impressed in the first movement by a gawky, somewhat undisciplined strength, an heroic urge which spanned by its very intensity the gaps and pitfalls of an inept technique.

There can be no doubt, I believe, of Mr. Harris' innate ability and the reality of his musical vision; there can be grave doubt, I also believe, that he has learned to carve out a rugged contour to express the sweep and immensities of his imageries. The andante and the final maestoso, for instance, are too prettily embroidered to merit the underlying sturdiness which is evident.

Much of the music is severe and sparse, a quality which, no doubt, is an individual expression of Mr. Harris himself.

The Stravinsky score is not one of the Russian's major efforts. Its insipid amiabilities would be more acceptable, probably, with the visual choreographic accompaniment devised by Mr. Balanchin. As music alone, its continued sweetness palls. The music calls for strings only and was first heard at the

OBSCURED TEXT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

AN 1934

Sir Henry Wood.

There was opportunity last Fri afternoon to hear the Boston S phony orchestra under the direc as guest-conductor of Sir He Wood, who for some 40 years directed the Promenade concert Queen's hall in London and of also the orchestra of the Natic Broadcasting Co. In appeara he is somewhat short and stoc suggesting perhaps the roast of Old England, or, as some has pointed out, the picture Brahms. But once in action th was nothing stodgy about his terpretation of the music in ha His own arrangement of a S from the theatre music of Pur was capitally done. The little R dino of early Beethoven and Andante of the young Mozart w heard at these concerts for the f time, one being expressively pla by a group of the wood-winds horns. Judging from comm heard during the intermission finer interpretation of Elgar's "En ma" Variations has ever b heard in Symphony hall. The co poser is the conductor's friend a fellow Britisher. Naturally brought to his reading of the sc more than ordinary sympathy knowledge. It was a vivid pres tation of the series of musical p traits, in which contrasts w sharply marked in which the ma nificent orchestra gave of its b under Sir Henry's leadership. If, is the report, the visiting cond tor was less successful with Strauss "Don Juan" than Dr. Ko sevitzky, to a listener who has happened to hear the Koussevitz version, Sir Henry infused it w no little tonal life and color. T Lalo Norwegian Rhapsody, for hi one imagines, was piece from routine repertory, pleasing, but especially distinctive. Let it be sa that, unless this observer is mista en, Sir Henry took the audien by surprise. Clearly he is pra ticed and resourceful conductor, a not by any means lacking in te perament. By the audience he w warmly received. And no less co dially by the members of the chestra who evidently has sens his merits. Half-way across t platform after acknowledging t plaudits, he would break into amusing little trot before he disa peared from view. At the close the program there was doubti that the general verdict was th the visiting conductor had ma good.

J.

---

5 1934

SCREEN
—and—
MUSIC

By DONALD KIRKLEY

YEARS or so this write

The Greatest Symphonist—

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, evide ly does not share the opinion of so Sibelius enthusiasts that Baltim can stand more than one of that co poser's symphonies in a season. A hearing the November concert h Philip S. Hensel, Jr., circulated a tition wherein Mr. Koussevitzky asked for more of the same. petition, with thirty-nine signatu was duly forwarded to Boston.

In reply, the conductor wrote part as follows: "Although I shall be able to include a symphony Sibelius in our program on Janu (having played the Second at st concert in Baltimore), I ha planned to give our Baltimore dience the beautiful and rarely pe rmed masterpiece, Verklarte Nacl y Arnold Schonberg." Elsewhere the letter Mr. Koussevitzky referr to Siekk Sibelius as "the great symphonist of our day."

—o—

Maria Olszewska—

CONSIDERED BY SOME as the greatest co tralto of the day, Maria Olszewska w make her first concert appearance Baltimore tomorrow at the 4 o'clo recital of the Peabody Conservatory Music. She attracted wide attentio last season when she sang Bragaene i "Tristan und Isolde" with the Metro politan Opera Company, and is no in her second season with that group.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 1 - 1934

oston Symphony Orchestra Delights In Lyric Concert

a purveyor of words and ideas are times when such com ties seem exasperatingly inade e, especially when attempting t down in cold type some sug on of the achievements of a r orchestra.

ch is the predictment confront s now, when desirous of mak ublic proclamation of the Bos Symphony Orchestra's distin ed performance at the Lyric evening.

r the evening's opening Dr. e Koussevitsky chose to con his men in Arnold Schonberg's klaerte Nacht," that notable g sextet which has been gthened in the orchestral score full orchestra of strings.

MODERN IN MOOD

ting from the last year of the teenth Century, it is complete today in mood and form, and pite of the highly emotional er of its program this is never ed to dominate the cool, clear of the moonlight illuminating night that forms the setting he passage of a pair of trou lovers.

thin our various limitations of e, time and vocabulary, it is ble only to suggest something e subtlety and art of the or ration, in varied and original onies, in effective use of d strings and harmonics, in g shape to the woman's plaint the man's assurance, in bing passages momentarily ging to mind the frustrated sy of "Tristan und Isolde."

e first violin, played by R. Burgin, contributed to make a whole that seemed shorter than its measured 35 minutes.

SYMPATHETIC ARDOR

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted with that sympathetic understanding and ardor of re-creation which is the special gift of leaders worthy of their position, making use of an equally vivid and imaginative point of view for his reading of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite 'Scheherazade."

An effect of the familiar delights of this composition is not unlike a return to some well-beloved town, where each step brings some remembered charm, and, approaching every corner, one anticipates what is beyond, to find the scene no less lovely, yet differing perhaps in light and shadow, or revealing some detail of beauty unnoticed before.

Last night's was such an experience of panoramic pleasure.

OVATION FOR PIANIST

The concertino for piano and orchestra, by Edward Burlingame Hill, was given an excellent performance by the young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, technically impeccable, synchronizing splendidly with the orchestra, and he was recalled repeatedly.

The piece is, of course, a worthy and adult work, entirely deserving of respectful attention, but its lesser merits were so inevitably cast into the shade by its brilliant neighbors that we are desirous of another hearing for less biased judgment.

H. A. F. P.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

FEB 1 - 1934

oston Symphony Orchestra Catches Fancy of Music Lovers

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

at the Boston Symphony Orchestra has caught the fancy of the element of Baltimore's present music-loving public in a degree that ises to give it a vogue equal to that it enjoyed in the days of its aled supremacy prior to the World War is indicated by the attend- record of the current season.

e audience at its second Lyric concert last night was much larger at the first; it was a smart and beautifully dressed audience, too, here is this to be said of an orchestra that provides such rarely ful performances: It is by no* s dependent exclusively upon onable approval. Rather, its l is to all, irrespective of class, appreciate lofty standards of al interpretation. The Boston hony is still a magnificent er of orchestral tradition.

its program last night was not atisfying as that of the first rt, Dr. Koussevitky is at least e thanked for introducing to more a novelty whose first ng stimulated an eager desire loser acquaintance. This was enberg's early "Verklaerte t" (Op. 4), an arrangement tring orchestra of a piece originally written for string sextet. It is of symphonic poem dimensions and has a program derived from a German poem of rather transcendental mysticism by Richard Dehmel.

The first impression was indeed deep and, I think, enduring. The composition reflects an expert, and, as was to be expected, even in such early Schoenberg, an arresting original touch. It is a thing of quite ravishing melodic loveliness, and, despite the fact that its content and instrumentation pay such slight regard to convention, its texture is closely enough woven, its ideas are carried out with sufficient coherence and clarity, to classify it as a work of art whose craftsmanship is above suspicion. Schoenberg was 25 when he wrote it; one realizes the inevitability of changing viewpoint and style caused by the impact of devastating world forces released during the ensuing 35 years. No genius as sensitive as this Viennese (who, ironically enough, is now living in New England) could possibly escape the effect of these forces. But what a pity that he lost the inspiring vision of beauty, the particular phase of spiritual ecstasy, of his "Verklaerte Nacht"!

The succeeding number was also a premiere, but not one that created an insistent demand for a quick repetition. It was a concertino for full orchestra and piano by E. B. Hill, chairman of the division of music at Harvard. While ably enough written, it struck me as being trivial in material and generally lacking in the requirements that make for endurance. The piano part introduced a young Spanish American, J. M. Sanroma, as a sort of obligato soloist. He played with crisp and facile technique and clear vibrant tone, though it was rather disconcerting to note how keenly he eyed the director for his cues.

The performance of the closing number, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," was sufficient in itself to proclaim the insight, the reserve and general technical command of Director Koussevitzky. It was a reading that actually made one forget, for the time, that this has become one of the most hackneyed works of the contemporary repertoire and that, for all its dazzling orchestration, its fascinating groupings and separate episodes, it nevertheless abounds in inescapable banalities.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

FEB 1 - 1934

Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra Under Guidance Of Serge Koussevitzky At Lyric

THOSE PASSAGES of exquisite beauty which occur from time to time in Arnold's Schönberg's "Verklárte Nacht" were for many persons the high spots of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky. Originally a string sextet, it was played in an arrangement for strings only. It is a musical interpretation of a strange poem by Richard Dehmel, called "Weib und die Welt," a poem wherein the ordinary materials, love and moonlight, are used in a very unusual way. Now and then, in his tone poetry, Schönberg catches exactly the moods of his model, and sometimes he transcends them, producing images of unearthly beauty or vivid, sensual impressions.

The composition has its duller moments, and is perhaps, in the opinion of some who heard it, a bit too long for the material employed. But, written at 25, as his first attempt outside the field of chamber music, it clearly foreshadows the ability of the composer in the orchestral domain and contains some love music not often rivaled by his contemporaries. The final tone picture, suggesting happiness and peace under a cold, radiant moon., s one which many will treasure in memory as one of the most beautiful in modern music. It must be heard; it cannot be described in words.

—o—

THE SECOND offering was a new concertino for piano and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, another contemporary composer, who has something to do with Harvard. This was a brief piece, lasting ten minutes or so, and it served to introduce Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, to Baltimore. The concertino is of the same American school which contains George Gershwin. It is haunted by the specter of jazz, although it is a restrained, polite specter fettered by that scholarly orchestration which might be expected of a Harvard man. On the other hand, the chief quality of the piece was liveliness, and the brisk central theme is developed with considerable ingenuity and some fetching fireworks. Mr. Sanroma played the piano portion of the score with assurance and a pleasant brightness, and the concertino as a whole added a vivid spot of color to the program.

—o—

THE "SCHEHERAZADE" symphonic suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, with which the program came to an end, has been performed so frequently of late that it has become almost too familiar. Its popularity, however, remains unchallenged, and its inclusion in last night's program was justified by the well-nigh flawless reading given by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men. The six solid pages of program notes, by the way, formed an exhaustive and enlightening exposition of the piece, and should have been an invaluable aid to those hearing the work for the first time. D. K.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

FEB 2 - 1934

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Orchestra at the Academy; A Season of Russian Opera Opens at the Casino; Toscanini and 'Tristan' and Harriet Cohen

Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for piano and orchestra, Op. 36, which will be heard in Manhattan on Saturday afternoon, was introduced in Brooklyn last night at the third of the Boston orchestra's Academy of Music concerts. One regrets the necessity of reporting it an unimportant piece—brief and qualitatively as well as quantitatively negligible. Mr. Hill has never produced anything entitling him to a place in the first rank even of Bostonian composers, but he has written a number of things which have merited the performances they have achieved. So much cannot be said of the Concertino. There is humor in the piece—its single merit aside from its neat construction—but of a sort to remind the listener that Mr. Hill is and has been these many years at home in academic precincts. Translated into an anecdote and related to one of the composer's classes it would produce only the most mirthless of polite smiles, for there is little less really funny than gentility in a skittish mood. Of the three sections of the Concertino, the first and least developed is the best; the last, the most extensive, the worst, because in it Mr. Hill employs—rather gingerly—an idiom of the psychological bases of which he has no faintest understanding—the idiom of jazz. That Mr. Koussewitsky and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist (to whom this score is dedicated), should pay the Concertino in Boston, where Mr. Hill has many friends and admirers, is understandable; that they should import it to New York is another matter.

The concertino was preceded by Schoenberg's string rhapsody, "Verklaerte Nacht," and followed, after the intermission, by Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony. It was good to hear "Verklaerte Nacht"—the piece is a strange and curiously impressive example of romantic art in decadence, about to pass into the phase of symbolism. One cannot intellectually approve it, yet one finds it eloquent and moving, the expression of an essentially neurotic but communicable emotionalism. My impression of the performance was that it might have been much better; the groups of players were not perfectly co-ordinated under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction; the conductor himself seemed less than secure in his grasp of the score. But the tone of the Boston strings was magical in its transparency and luster.

Comment on the symphony and its performance is scarcely required; Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra have played the Tschaikowsky fourth many times at the Academy, and never less than brilliantly.

NEW YORK MIRROR

FEB 3

MUSIC

A New Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.
Carnegie Hall, 8:40 p. m.

THE PROGRAM:
"Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses)....Stravinsky
Symphony: 1933..........Roy Harris
(First performance in New York)
Symphony No. 4 in E minor (Opus 98) ....Brahms

Mr. Koussevitzky brought a new symphony from Boston to embellish his program in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Harris, the composer, is familiar to us as a contriver of the more musical forms of modern chamber music, less so as a creator of the complex structure of a symphonic mood.

Hearing this symphony for the first time last night, I was impressed in the first movement by a gawky, somewhat undisciplined strength, an heroic urge which spanned by its very intensity the gaps and pitfalls of an inept technique.

There can be no doubt, I believe, of Mr. Harris' innate ability and the reality of his musical vision; there can be grave doubt, I also believe, that he has learned to carve out a rugged contour to express the sweep and immensities of his imageries. The andante and the final maestoso, for instance, are too prettily embroidered to merit the underlying sturdiness which is evident.

Much of the music is severe and sparse, a quality which, no doubt, is an individual expression of Mr. Harris himself.

The Stravinsky score is not one of the Russian's major efforts. Its insipid amiabilities would be more acceptable, probably, with the visual choreographic accompaniment devised by Mr. Balanchin. As music alone, its continued sweetness palls. The music calls for strings only and was first heard at the

INCORRECT PAGINATION

Jan 26

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY,

nd Players === Music

Today His Chance

Roy Harris

The Untried American Symphonist Whom Dr. Koussevitzky "Presents" This Afternoon

If an eminent composer was carelessly born out of the season for symphony concerts in America, he must take chances with the celebration of his anniversaries. Richard Strauss is already well advanced in his seventieth year; but not until June 11 comes the birthday. Either this season or next Dr. Koussevitzky would mark it. He has chosen the earlier part and will fill the Symphony Concerts of Feb. 9 and 10 with Strauss's music. The "Sinfonia Domestica" and the Suite from the incidental music to Molière's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" are the two numbers thus far chosen.

101

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

The Flow of Music.

Roy Harris, a young American composer whose symphony was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts this week, feels that what music needs at this time is first of all a greater discipline of technic; secondly, more interesting material, a richer and more vital and longer flowing melodic line.

To that we say Amen! It is natural enough that with the passage of time technical skill and resources should have been tremendously developed. In the field of performance intelligent students of music in our own city have developed it to a degree that was seldom seen in the old days, when the playing of "The Maiden's Prayer" was considered a fine amateur accomplishment.

Of professional artists we take marked technical facility for granted. Musical criticism today is concerned not so much with the musical means as with the interpretation. In the larger forms, at least, we expect similar technical skill of the composers. It has been forthcoming. But we are disposed to agree with Mr. Harris that this skill needs disciplining. In the arts restraint is a virtue.

His plea for a longer-flowing melodic line especially impresses us. It is the fragmentary character of much of the ultra-modern music that confuses and leaves us unsatisfied. A promising theme is scarcely announced before it is dropped and lost. The continuity, so to speak, is impaired. We get a series of musical snapshots rather than an impression of a picture conceived as a whole, into which the subordinate details fit naturally.

The effect of much of the modern music is jerky and nervous. But beauty in music, as well as in painting, depends much on the flowing line. How far the compositions of Mr. Harris conform to this ideal we do not happen to know. But his theory strikes a sympathetic chord.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY HIGH SPOT

Harris' New Work Receives Cordial Applause

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The event of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was not the return of Dr. Koussevitzky nor the world premiere of Mr. Roy Harris' "Symphony: 1933," but the superb performance of the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

A MARKED CONTRAST

Last year in its place in the cycle of Sibelius' symphonies the Fifth was for the moment overshadowed by its more picturesque, more highly colored, more strikingly individual predecessor. Yesterday, heard immediately after the not unpromising but somewhat vague and callow music of the young Californian, this Fifth Symphony seemed, as indeed it is, a masterpiece that sends one back to Beethoven for fitting comparison.

If Mr. Harris' music had appeared uncertain of its direction, diffuse in its thought, mixed and confusing in style, that of Sibelius moved to its mark inexorably. This is music singularly self-contained and well integrated. In it, moreover, is an elevation of mood, a preoccupation with the loftiest concerns, both spiritual and esthetic, that help to mark Sibelius as one of the giants of art.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Insight

That these qualities should have been made so strikingly manifest yesterday was due in no small measure to the insight and devotion of Dr. Koussevitzky who, each time he approaches one of the Sibelius symphonies, seems to draw more from it. And this uncompromising music aroused an enthusiasm that was heartening to observe. Great is Sibelius, and Dr. Koussevitzky is by no means the least among his prophets.

In a most stimulating "Portrait of Sibelius" drawn by Lucien Price and quoted in the programme book, we are told that Sibelius is loath to talk about his music because he feels that it comes from the subconscious.

Harris Cordially Received

The genius creates; the man of talent contrives. Mr. Harris, for example, is inclined over-much to theorize. His own exegesis of his symphony is almost painfully detailed. His insistence that Americans naturally accent in what most of us would consider an unnatural manner causes him to evolve a rhythmic scheme so purposely wayward that the final impression is of no rhythm at all.

His symphony is undoubtedly born of conviction and to judge from it, as well as from reports of his other music, Mr. Harris' melodic thought is copious. In this symphony it is too often undistinguished and even reminiscent. Thus the second movement, of long lyric flow, approaches banality, strange predicament for a modernist.

This much talked-of young man of 36 was present yesterday, and the cordial applause which followed his symphony brought him twice from his place in the audience to the foot of the stage to bow his acknowledgements. stage to bow his acknowledgments.

A fine performance of that most untions, the amiable, at times almost trivial music for strings from the ballet "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," began the concert.

STARTING TIMES OF MOVIE FEATURES

Starting times of feature pictures in motion picture houses listed below:

METROPOLITAN—"Search for Beauty": a. m., 11:30; p. m., 2:10, 4:50, 7:50, 10:25.

PARAMOUNT—"Hi, Nellie": a. m., 10:22; p. m., 1:14, 4:06, 6:59, 9:50.

FENWAY—"Hi, Nellie": p. m., 2:11, 4:48, 7:25, 10:02.

MODERN—"Enlighten Thy Daughter": a. m., 9:00, 11:25; p. m., 2:00, 4:35, 7:10, 9:40.

EXETER—"Jimmy and Sally": p. m., 2:10, 5:00, 7:50.

BEACON—"College Coach": a. m., 10:15; p. m., 12:55, 3:40, 6:20, 9:45.

MAJESTIC—"Queen Christina": p. m., 2:30, 8:30.

WASHINGTON STREET OLYMPIA—"My Lips Betray": a. m., 10:29; p. m., 1:16, 4:03, 6:50, 9:37.

RKO-KEITH'S—"Beloved": a. m., 10:00, 12:00; p. m., 2:00, 4:00, 6:00, 8:00, 10:00.

ORPHEUM—"Fugitive Lovers": a. m., 9:25; p. m., 12:30, 3:35, 6:40, 9:45.

STATE—"Eskimo": p. m., 1:35, 4:15, 6:55, 9:35.

KEITH-BOSTON—"As Husbands Go": a. m., 10; p. m., 1:07, 4:15, 7:29, 10:36.

SCOLLAY—"Enlighten Thy Daughter": p. m., 12:00, 3:15, 6:25, 9:30.

UPTOWN—"Counsellor-at-Law": p. m., 1:00, 4:00, 7:00, 10:00.

BOWDOIN SQUARE—"Little Women": a. m., 11:40; p. m., 4:15, 8:55.

HOWARD—"Central Park": p. m., 12:55, 6:40.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

FEB 2 - 1934

Society Attends Third Boston Symphony Society Concert at the Academy

Raymond Huntington Woodman was the host in the committee box last night at the third of the series of five concerts comprising the 46th annual Brooklyn concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees.

Guests in the committee box last night were Mrs. Woodman, the Rev. Dr. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Simmons Mr. and Mrs. Morris Watkins and Dr. and Mrs. Charles A. Goodrich.

The most recent work of the New England composer Edward Burlingame Hill, whose symphonic works have been presented by leading orchestras throughout the country, was a feature of the program last night. The new work, a concertino for piano and orchestra, was interpreted by the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. The designation, "New England composer" is one that especially applies to Mr. Hill as he is the grandson of a Harvard president, the son of a Harvard professor and is himself connected with Harvard University.

In addition to Tchaikovsky's No. 4 in F minor, which occupied the second part of the program last night, another interesting work "Verklarte Nacht" ("Radiant Night") by Arnold Schoenberg, originally written for six string instruments but amplified for performance by a full sized string orchestra was presented on last night's program. This latter work recently was performed with great success by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston with the composer as the guest conductor.

Other box parties included those of Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, the Aumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, the Packer Collegiate Institute, the Woodward School, and the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes.

Mrs. Draper's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Ingraham, Mr. and Mrs. Tracy Voorhees, Mrs. Herman DeWetter and Rudolph Reimer. The party occupying the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association box included Dr. and Mrs. Harry M. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Miss Alice Casamajor, Miss Maude Harrison, Miss Catherine Huber and Miss Helen Parker. In the Packer Collegiate Institute box were Miss Bertha M. Dow, Miss Marie L. Mongin, Miss Ruth Buvington and Mrs. Lorna Robertson-Lash.

Among the members of the sponsoring committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, who received were, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mr. and Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. John T. Underwood, Miss Florence Read, Mr. and Mrs. Sumner Ford and Mrs. Harold Irving Small.

By Julian Seaman

---

ibrary of Congress April 27, 928. As a ballet, it was first proaced in June, 1928, in Paris.

* * *

NEW YORK JOURNAL

FEB 3 - 1934

Music

Thomas Cheere

Dr. Koussevitzky selected an unusual program for this visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one to satisfy alike the modernist and the rankest conservative, beginning with a Stravinsky Ballet ad closig with the Brahms immortal Fourth Symphony.

In between came an important new work by Roy Harris, the most talked of American composer of the moment—"Symphony: 1933" which the Boston Orchestra brought out a week ago in Boston. It is still in manuscript, having been completed only last November.

Earlier this week New York heard one of Harris's String quartets. Now this composition in larger form continues strikingly the impression of freedom with power conveyed by the quartet. There is the elastic melodic line and the long stride of its fluctuations, the wistful theme with dramatic reiteration, the well-built climax, the original and colorful treatment of orchestral resources. There is much more to say of the Roy Harris music. This must come at another time.

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 3 - 1934

HARRIS SYMPHONY HAS PREMIERE HERE

Koussevitzky Presents New American Work With the Boston Orchestra.

APPLAUSE FOR COMPOSER

Ballet-Suite by Stravinsky and Fourth Symphony of Brahms Also Offered.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A recently completed symphony by Roy Harris, of the rising generation of American composers, was the novelty of the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. This symphony was prefaced by Stravinsky's ballet-suite, "Apollon Musagete" and was followed by the Fourth symphony of Brahms.

The score of the new symphony, which was played for the first time anywhere by the Boston orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week, was finished last November. Mr. Harris had made an earlier experiment with the symphonic form, but this he discarded as inconclusive. He considers the composition heard last night his first representative symphony, and he has added a descriptive figure to the title, so that it stands as "Symphony: 1933."

Following the pretty, artificial and effete music of Stravinsky, which was superbly played, the work of Harris carried with it the air of earnestness and determination with which it undoubtedly was composed. Its creator has told us of his expressive purpose in it. The first movement signifies "the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; the second the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; the third the mood of a positive will to power and action." A very full orchestra is used in this symphony. It has special rhythmic developments, and in economy of material and consistency in its treatment is certainly superior to earlier scores of Mr. Harris that have been seen.

Thanks to the courtesy of Mr. Harris, it has been possible, with his assistance, to make at least a cursory examination of the score of his symphony and to hear it thoroughly rehearsed before the public performance. Mr. Koussevitzky had seen to it that the work was produced in the most effective possible manner and that interested persons might be familiar with it not only in outline but detail. Much has been written in recent years about Mr. Harris. There are not lacking those who see in him a present white hope of American music.

It would be a pleasure to say that in vitality, color and expressive power this music betokened such a new figure among us; and some have said this. The structure of the piece, its map on paper, and some of its motives, have the creative seed and offer good opportunities for symphonic development. For this writer the promise of the symphony stops there. Its technical formulae are creditable enough, but the music is labored and the thematic material very sparse. An elaborate thematic scheme of a symphony may be put down on paper and the music entirely fail to come off in performance. There is little genuine organic development in this symphony. It sometimes repeats, but seldom progresses.

Or we have a living idea, such as the place in the first movement when the strings have a lyrical passage over a persistent horn figure. But this is quickly passed and we have much that is fussy, academic and essentially unproductive. There is also the plain fact of large slices of Stravinsky in the score. The rhythms and figures of the "Sacre" haunt pages of the first movement.

There is a great deal of hue and cry today in behalf of the supposedly neglected American composer. Of all the conductors of leading American orchestras Mr. Koussevitzky has shown the most curiosity and interest and courage in promoting their works. For this he is certainly to be commended. At the same time, it is worth while to remember that neither our composers nor we ourselves will be able to raise up a national school of composition by tugging at our bootstraps, and frankness compels the statement that it would have been just as well to give the Harris symphony a thorough hearing in Boston and choose something else for one of the concerts that are too rare in New York.

This is said with belief in Mr. Harris's sincerity and talent, and admiration of his aims. He has, however, a long distance to go before he produces a symphonic masterpiece, and it certainly appears that a larger amount of self-criticism on his part would have pruned many pages—most of the pages—from this labored and immature symphony. And, while we are about it, why the itch to play only virgin works by American composers on modern orchestral programs? One way of developing our national school would be to provide a little perspective of what has already been done by American composers, and set the former generation by the side of the present one. It would then develop that even from the despised conservatives or provincials of the past had come pages of good and living music that Mr. Harris might properly examine and profit by.

The new symphony was cordially applauded and the composer was called with Mr. Koussevitzky to the platform. The performance of the Brahms symphony brought substantial relief from a program which had begun with a European futility and ended with an American ineptitude.

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 3 - 1934

Roy Harris Work Played By Boston Symphony

The February Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which in the natural order would have been given Thursday night, took place last evening because the Philharmonic had the other date. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to this city ~~the new~~ symphony of Roy Harris, made known to the world Friday afternoon, January 26, in Boston. The symphony, being atonal, has no key signature, nor has it a title, except the date 1933. The three movements are marked allegro, andante and maestoso. The composer has said that in the first he tried to portray a mood of adventure and physical exuberance, in the second the pathos underlying all human existence, and in the third, the will to power and action.

A searching examination of the work is impossible in a crowded Saturday paper. Suffice it to say for the present that there is vigor in all of this score. Resolution and energy are found everywhere, manifestations of a young and independent talent, and in one movement at least—the second—there glows something of that imagination which creates life. Mr. Harris's animated movements revel in abrupt phraseology, insistently repeated short figures, rude instrumentation and changing rhythms. One feels that in these movements the composer is striving tremendously to make clear the ideas and purposes in his mind, but is not entirely at his ease in the handling of his materials. There is heroic effort, little spontaneity.

The slow movement reveals more promise. Here, indeed, the composer was blessed with a lovely musical thought, first published by his violas in an excellent piece of instrumental writing. A second theme is heard and later employed as counterpoint to the first with happy results. There is poetic mood in this movement. For the most part it sings lyrically and communicates its feeling with clarity and directness. Probably music lovers generally will be of the opinion that Mr. Harris is entitled to their respect, even if they do not become enthusiastic about his symphony.

His music was not commonplace. It was not cheap or vulgar. It was plainly the production of an aggressive mind. Its very crudeness was arresting because of the boldness of its utterance. Mr. Koussevitzky had evidently put honest study into his preparation of the score. The performance was one of those triumps of tonal magic with which the gentlemen from Boston frequently enrich our experience.

The concert began with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette" ballet, which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here in 1928, and ended with the fourth symphony of Brahms.

W. J. H.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 3 - 1934

Koussevitzky Presents '1933' By Roy Harris

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays a New American Work at Carnegie Hall

Obtains Warm Reception

Stravinsky's 'Apollon Musagete' Ballet Heard

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Stravinsky .....Ballet, "Apollon Musagete"
Roy Harris...............Symphony, 1933
First time in New York
Brahms ....Symphony No. 4, in E minor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing on a Friday instead of the customary Thursday, gave its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Serge Koussevitzky, who has proved to be one of the best friends of American orchestral music during the decade of service with this orchestra, introduced to New York a new symphony, subtitled "1933," by Roy Harris. Stravinsky's music for his ballet "Apollen Musagète," unheard here for five years, was the opening number, while the latter part of the evening was devoted to a familiar work of genius, the E minor symphony of Brahms.

Mr. Harris, who was born in Oklahoma, makes his home in California and is spending this season here, had his first hearing before a New York audience in July, 1926, when an andante for orchestra, originally planned as part of a symphony, was played in a Stadium concert under Willem van Hoogstraten. During the last few years, however, he has been better known in the field of chamber music; his works of this type have earned him a deservedly prominent rank among the younger generation of American composers.

The symphony heard last night is officially his first; it was completed last November, and first performed in Boston on January 26. In the first movement, notes the composer, he has "tried to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance," in the second, the mood "of the pathos which seems to underly all human existence; in the third "the mood of a positive will to power and action." The first movement is pervaded "by a rhythmic motive of 3 plus 2," the second is "a free use of the Rondo principle," while the last is a "variation development" of the theme stated in the opening. In the three purposes outlined above, he seemed most successful in achieving the first and the last, although the meditative second movement had the most pronounced melodic appeal.

The work arouses interest and a wish for a rehearing to sustain or revise first impressions; among these were the vigor of the work and its notable degree of originality. If the composer has not attained a completely fused personal style he is at least on the way toward doing so, and although he has studied in Paris, he has not let his music be Parisianized; it is refreshingly different from the skilfully constructed, extremely able and quite superficial music which various conductors have imported during the last few years. There is more mass in this music, if less finish. The composer has acknowledged a debt to the early contrapunists, Bach and Beethoven; one also might have found certain hints of Bruckner's music last night, especially in the plangent outbursts of the brass choir. There was rather too much of this in the first and third movements, especially the last, although the final climax and its preparation were highly effective; the work was sometimes too episodic and occasionally took devious paths in reaching its goal; the orchestration, now and then, tended to neglect intermediate hues in the instrumental palette.

Still, if the composers' thematic ideas and their treatment did not always live up to his evidently lofty intentions, and the symphony itself did not set a landmark in modern American music, it promised well for Mr. Harris's creative future; his second or third symphony should attain a high rank.

The symphony was warmly received, and Mr. Koussevitzky called the composer twice to the platform.

"Apollon Musagete," performed here by the same orchestra in November, 1928, is a work of quite opposite character—a polished, ably wrought reversion to classic styles, pleasing in its lyricism and its clarity of outline, but static and not particularly significant apart from its appropriateness to its scenario. The orchestra did notable work in both compositions.

N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 3 - 1934

Bostonians Play Harris Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last night gave the first New York performance of a new symphony by Roy Harris, an American composer who lives in California, but was in Carnegie Hall for this concert and came to the stage and bowed to an audience which did him the courtesy of applauding.

The work is entitled "Symphony: 1933" and if taken as a musical comment it is the meanest thing that has been said concerning the year so recently ended. We consider it grossly unfair. Confusing and dismal as the year was in some respects, 1933 was not that bad!

The dreariness and elongated boredom of the symphony were emphasized by its juxtaposition with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, a composer who died in Vienna in 1897, the year before Mr. Harris was born in Lincoln County, Okla., and it follows that the sustained and solacing development of Brahms seemed even more gratifying than usual.

However, our harsh words about the symphony of Mr. Harris are merely the words of one who frankly confesses to an ability to gain from most current music the satisfaction which its true devotees appear to find in it. The history of music and of contemporary appraisals of it indicate that frequently compositions of abiding worth are not appreciated until a generation has passed. We are willing to leave the Harris symphony to the next generation.

Mr. Harris says that the three movements signify "the mood of adventure and physical exuberance, the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence, the mood of a positive will to power and action." To us the symphony moved spasmodically and was sparse in ideas. but so far as the rhythmic character of the work is concerned, Mr. Harris himself has written words that are disarming.

He insists that "our rhythmic impulses are fundamentally different from the rhythmic impulses of Europeans," that "our sense of rhythm is less symmetrical," and that "European musicians are trained to think of rhythm in its largest denominator, while we are born with a feeling for its smallest uints."

As one who passed his boyhood in the great European State of Ohio, we may be unqualified to take issue with such statements. At any rate we agree that Mr. Harris, son of wide, open spaces where men are cowboys, may have "put that awkward melodic line of his" into his work, and that his allegro movements may be "grandiose, bare, naked and heroic," as has been said, but still we generously pass this symphony on to the next generation.

The orchestra played brilliantly, as usual, and the concert opened with a charming performance of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon Musagete." HENRY BECKETT.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

FEB 3 - 1934

Music

An American Symphony; John Charles Thomas' Debut at the Opera

At the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night Serge Koussewitsky conducted performances of Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," Roy Harris' Symphony: 1933, and the Brahms E minor. The Harris work, the composer's second essay in the form (his first remains unperformed), was on this occasion played for the first time in New York, following its recent premiere in Boston.

The three movements in which Mr. Harris has cast his material are orthodox in form and sequence: an allegro precedes a slow movement, which is followed by a maestoso finale. In the first movement the composer has tried "to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; in the second, the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; in the third, the mood of a positive will to power and action."

This quotation from Mr. Harris own description of his work indicates its most obvious virtues: its seriousness, its scope. When one has admitted these, however, not a great deal is left to praise. Mr. Harris' intention in this symphony is more admirable than his accomplishment—for reasons which have little to do, one suspects, with the value of his materials and their potentialities of development. The symphony is unconvincing ultimately, because it affirms not the faith and hope implicit in its program, but merely Mr. Harris' uneasy feeling that some such affirmation is in order today.

One may credit Mr. Harris with originality in the invention of his materials and in their employment; on the minus side of the score should be placed his obvious lack of a sense of form, of feeling for the orchestral idiom and of resource in employing it. At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Harris appeared on the stage to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 3 - 1934

Bostonians' Program Diversified.

For the evening's music this reporter betook himself to Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, set before its local patrons ~~two courses~~ of moderns and one of Brahms. The first modern drawn on was Igor Stravinsky, only exemplified in his ballet, scored for strings, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses."

As we all know, Stravinsky, in defiance of the Biblical warning, has devoted a good many years to pouring his new wine into old bottles. To one hearer there is precious little suggestion of Cimarosa, Rossini, or Bellini in this "Apollo," but at one point the ghost of "Andrea Chenier" shakes a leg, and of the Vienna of the waltzes there is more than a little. Of course the writing for strings is masterly, as was the playing of the Bostonians.

The second modern was Roy Harris, a native of Oklahoma, a resident of southern California, and present last night in Carnegie Hall, where he acknowledged applause by bowing from the platform.

Explains Pursuit of Moods.

The work of his selected for disclosure was the "Symphony: 1933." Mr. Harris himself furnished the program book with an extended description of the symphony, the opening sentence of which runs as follows:—

"In the first movement I have tried to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; in the second, of the pathos which seems to underly all human existence; in the third, the mood of a positive will to power and action."

Such being the composer's intention, the subject may rest there for the moment. The symphony is not the sort of thing that makes an immediate appeal to most hearers, nor is it anything to be either lauded to the skies or lightly dismissed after a single hearing. A familiarity that does not breed contempt should be accorded it.

These matters disposed of, the audience settled down to a renewed contemplation of the E minor symphony of Brahms.

104

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 3 - 1934

J. CHARLES THOMAS TRIUMPHS AT MET; HARRIS' '1933' HEARD

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Long known as a concert bari-

The world premiere of "Symphony, 1933," by Roy Harris, thirty-five-year-old American composer, born in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Serge Koussevitzky), conductor), in that city a week ago. The first New York hearing took place last evening at Carnegie Hall, presented by the same band and leader.

Brethren, make no mistake, this is important music by a writer with sound training, serious utterance and an individual mentality and temperament. He does not woo in sensual accents but conquers rather through tremendous earnestness and speech of authority and purpose. The voice is robust, almost harsh when it grows vehement; and zealously sober in its more quiet moments. Melody materializes of a sort, but unintoxicating, rational, grave. The whole structure rests on solid form, trestled and riveted with well-ordered, recognizable counterpoint. The harmonization varies between ancient and modern styles. At no time is the ear puzzled by the nature of the sound. "Dissonance" absents itself from this Harris symphony altogether.

Some commentators hear "western" influences in his music; others note a distinctly "American" character. I cannot conscientiously say that I found either. Nor do I care. It sufficed me to note an original approach, individual expression and expert workmanship. The entire composition engaged my fancy and held me in absorbed response.

Harris is not yet at his best and wholly free and eloquent utterance will come after he engages himself less with the purely scientific aspects of music. His published description of his own methods are proof of this preoccupation, as when he says of the last movement of his "Symphony, 1933."

"A detailed analysis of its forms would be too esoteric for program notes."

The first and final movements are bold and vigorous, sometimes brutal. The middle part is a lengthy, dirge-like preachment. Harris' use of rhythms and of brass instruments stands out in masterful strokes. The audience received the work with palpable respect. It was led compellingly by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The rest of the program can only be mentioned as consisting of Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" and the fourth symphony by Brahms.

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 4 - 193

At Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Serge Koussevitzky, conductor) did a matinee production of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" (Radiant Night) "Concertino," for piano and orchestra, by Edward Burlingame Hill, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Schoenberg has never exceeded his "Verklaerte Nacht" music in poetical implication and direct loveliness. Koussevitzky and his players gave fine fancy and luscious tone to their performance.

Hill's "Concertino," opus 36, composed in 1931, is in one continuous movement, although the customary three division are clearly enough indicated. The work has pleasant thematic ideas ingeniously developed and the orchestration shows resource and craft of a matured and tasteful musician. The following and frequently brilliant piano part was well handled by Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose brittle touch and unsensuous tone are well adapted to the modern manner of writing for the keyboard.

"Scheherazade" wound up the programe in a deluge of compelling rhythms and tunes.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 4 - 1934

Edward B. Hill Concertino Has N. Y. Premiere

Boston Symphony Gives Initial Hearing Here to Work Composed in 1931

Performed in 10 Minutes

Koussevitzky Calls Composer to Share Applause

By Francis D. Perkins

For its third afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another American work its first New York hearing yesterday, a concertino for piano and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, chairman of the Division of Music in Harvard University. This followed Schönberg's "Verkläste Nacht," while the latter part of the program was devoted to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." Jesus Marie Sanroma was the soloist in the concertino.

Mr. Hill's work, which is his Opus 36, was composed in the summer of 1931 and first played by the Boston Symphony in a Cambridge concert the following April. It is short, taking only about ten minutes, although within this compass it is able to present a tabloid version of the standard three-movement concerto. The development of the first theme is followed by the brief slow movement, which is linked by a cadenza to the finale; the original theme returns in a coda also of cadenza-like quality.

Excellently constructed from a formal point of view and ably orchestrated, the concertino makes a pleasing impression. Its tunefulness is unabashed; it has an ingratiating gayety and touch of whimsicality along with its well wrought orthodoxy, while the soloist is not denied opportunities for the display of virtuosity—and of these, in his clearcut, fluent and spirited performance, Mr. Sanroma took due advantage. This work can be well recommended to conductors who wish to present a short piano concerto without having to resort to the hard worked Liszt concerto in E flat. Mr. Hill was summoned to the platform by Mr. Koussevitzky to share the applause with the pianist.

Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht," an expression of Wagnerian romanticism dating from his twenty-fifth year, has been heard here in recent years both in its original form as a string sextet and in its revised form for full string orchestra. It would probably have frequent performances were it not for its attention-taxing length of thirty-five minutes. "Scheherazade" found both the conductor and his accomplished orchestra in their best form.

Like the Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony has a deficit to cope with, and yesterday's programs included an announcement that it has to raise $120,055.26 this season. The trustees, it was noted, realized that as a Boston institution it must depend primarily on home support, but some New York participation was also hoped for in aid of an institution that has long been popular here.

MIAMI, FLA. NEWS

FEB 4 1934

It is no longer a rarity to find symphonies by American composers listed on the programs of the most conservative orchestras. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra, appears to be especially generous in giving a hearing to the works of young native composers, frequently giving them his first important hearing.

Roy Harris of Oklahoma is the latest American to receive this honor. His "Symphony: 1933" was given its first hearing by the Boston orchestra.

Critics declared that the work, although not entirely original, had at times an authentic American flavor. He has actually captured in the first movement, something of the American "physical exuberance" which was stated as his aim.

Much of the burden of the themes is placed on the American negro spiritual "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen" and a phrase from "Song of the Volga Boatmen." He also borrowed from Beethoven the "Fate" theme. But some critics say these may be looked upon as common musical property anyway. That anybody should have been able to make a symphony out of the year 1933, seems in itself an achievement.

The Wednesday evening musical programs being given at the Hollywood Beach hotel when one of the light operas is presented in concert form, are attracting much interest among music lovers.

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 4 - 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS HILL WORK

First New York Hearing for Puckish Concertino for Piano and Orchestra.

SCHOENBERG ITEM GIVEN

'Verklaerte Nacht' Has Fine and Sensitive Reading—Rimsky-Korsakoff on Program.

At its second concert here this week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht," Edward Burlingame Hill's concertino for piano and orchestra and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Jesús María Sanromá was the soloist.

The "Verklärte Nacht," apart from its beauty and the measure of its achievement for so young a composer—Schönberg wrote it at 25—stirs wistful speculations as to what might have happened if its author had chosen to develop the melodic gift and ability to maintain and unfold a long lyric line which it discloses. Although the score is steeped in Wagner to the point of numerous unconscious quotations from the master of Baireuth, and although its major outlines were determined programmatically by Richard Dehmel's poem, its clarity, logic and sensitive proportioning are those of the artist sure of himself and his material and projecting them with a sense of inevitability and an intuitive flow of ideas which are not so conspicuous, to many at least, in the later cerebrations of Schönberg after he became the exponent of the famous "twelve-tone" system.

The orchestra gave the work a fine and sensitive reading as to dynamics, balance and phrasing, but unfortunately the string tone, particularly among the first violins, was often harsh and rough and the intonation of the solo violin far from impeccable.

Mr. Hill's concertino consists of three movements and a coda played without pause. It is gay and unpretentious music for the most part, innocent of contemporary dissonantal idioms and strewn with glittering and Puckish figures for piano and orchestra. In the always fallible judgment of a single hearing, it seemed to wander about a little; one felt that the material could have been better presented if it had been better ordered and the ideas, once stated, more clearly developed. But it is pleasant and effective, if not in the least profound, and Mr. Sanromá and the orchestra gave it the high color, the rhythmic verve and the meditative roguishness it seems to merit. It was well received, and the composer was led forth by Mr. Koussevitzky to receive the large audience's warm applause.

The concert closed with a sumptuous performance of "Schéhérazade."

TULSA, OKLA. WORLD

FEB4 1934

Roy Harris, American composer, was represented on the Boston Symphony orchestra program here last week with his new "Symphony, 1933." It is a vital, highly-significant contribution to our sparse native repertoire. The piece has ideas of distinction, fruitfully developed with sure and skillful craftsmanship. No recent work brought from Europe sounds a more eloquent message than these pages of Roy Harris . . . Will the composition be played in Europe? When? And how much may Mr. Harris expect to earn in foreign royalties? I pause for answers—and recall that not long ago the French publishers of Massenet's "Manon" demanded about $2,500 for a single performance of the Opus by the Chicago Grand Opera company.

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 5 - 1934

Boston Symphony Offers An American Novelty

That the subscribers to the afternoon series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall might, perhaps, not consider themselves slighted in the matter of American novelties, Serge Koussevitzky presented to them the first local performance of Edward Burlinghame Hill's "Concertino" on Saturday, which with his sponsorship of the Harris Symphony on the previous day, gives Mr. Koussevitzky a perfect average in native products for his recent visit.

An unpretentious piece, both in its extent and materials, the "Concertino" nevertheless is a very skillful solution of the problems to which the composer addressed himself. He has succeeded in writing a work for piano and orchestra in which the conventional three movements are compressed into a single one without suggesting that an arbitrary curtailment has sacrificed the efectiveness of his material or that a preconceived scheme has been insensitively adhered to. Unity has been achieved by a basic relationship of the themes in the three sections, with the starting motive actually reappearing as a coda. Although the mood is prevailingly light, it would be an error to regard the work as superficial, for the gayety impresses one as being thoroughly genuine. Mr. Hill is familiar with a harmonic idiom representative of the day's trends, but no single procedure obtrudes as dominating his clear judgment of what is easily listenable. The piece is shrewdly orchestrated, suggesting both brilliance and clarity; and the idiomatic solo part was highly effective in the hands of Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose regard for the composer's dedication was manifest in his performance.

A magnificent performance by the string choir of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nachte" sextet opened the program, offering a highly persuasive representation of the composer's early talents. The long and expressive contours of the work were of a striking beauty in this reading, which, it is interesting to recall, was prepared by the composer himself for a concert in Boston. The "Scheherezade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff brought the afternoon to a conclusion.

I. K.

N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 5 - 1934

On Saturday Koussevitzky led the Bostonians in a program consisting of Schoenberg's poignantly evocative "Verklaerte Nacht," Edward Burlingame Hill's concertino for piano and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist in the concertino, a piece distinctly captivating and frolicsome for a composer who is the son of a professor of chemistry and the grandson of a president of Harvard.

Although the pictorial and storybook Orientalism of Rimsky-Korsakoff is never more fascinating than when Koussevitzky conducts, Schoenberg's dreamlike tone poem concerning two lovers in a desolate grove under the winter moon led in interest for us. The orchestral texture was at times astonishingly delicate, subtly veiled and proper to the tale. Schonberg was only twenty-five when he composed this string sextet which has been arranged for string orchestra, yet he managed to translate into music a story especially mature in its acceptance of life and its expression of civilized understanding between man and woman.

Of late some persons have been complaining about Toscanini's program. Such persons make us very tired. Let Koussevitzky introduce new works. He does it splendidly and it is his natural function. Toscanini's is to reveal, incomparably, the recognized master works. The mood and rhythm and graciousness of his disclosure of Haydn yesterday were as the trusting affection of childhood, the patter of tender feet, and the smiles of the little people who greet us at close of day.

A half-hour later all of the furious majesty of the music of Bach united us in a mood of awe and exultant power. In between there were the beautiful melodies of Beethoven and Brahms's delightful and exquisite variations of the Haydn theme. We say let Toscanini give whatever he wishes. He will anyhow.

—HENRY BECKETT.

DENVER, COLO.
POST

FEB 6 - 1934

VICTOR HERBERT'S ANNIVERSARY FINDS SUCCESSOR ABSENT

Kern, Gershwin and Rogers Fail to Replace Him Exactly.

(By LEONARD LIEBLING.)
(Universal Service Music Critic.)

New York, Feb. 6.—Victor Herbert, were he living, would have been 75 years old last Thursday. Where is his successor? Kern, Gershwin, Rogers? Well—er—it isn't exactly the same thing, and you surely know what I mean.

* * *

Roy Harris, American composer, was represented on the Boston symphony orchestra program here recently with his new "Symphony, 1933." It is a vital, highly significant contribution to our sparse native repertory. The piece has ideas of distinction, fruitfully developed with sure and skillful craftsmanship. No recent work brought from Europe sounds a more eloquent message than these pages of Roy Harris. . . Will the composition be played in Europe? When? And how much may Mr. Harris expect to earn in foreign royalties? I pause for answers—and recall that not long ago the French publishers of Massenet's "Manon" demanded about $2,500 for a single performance of the opus by the Chicago Grand Opera company.

* * *

A new American opera, "Merry

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 5 - 1934

Roy Harris was called by John Tasker Howard "the white hope of American nationalists." Saliently American are both the music and the career of the tall, lean, rawboned Californian. In Los Angeles he drove his truck in the daytime and studied music at night. When the New York Philharmonic played his first composition in 1926 he had, up to that time, no formal education in music. He gained a Guggenheim fellowship in 1928, returning in 1931 with new work and vastly improved technic.

One might designate his new symphony as the orchestration of vast new national stirrings—the symphony of the new deal, in fact—considering Mr. Harris's own characterization of the work as expressing:

"The mood of adventure and physical exuberance; the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; the mood of positive will to power and action."

This from an earnest young truck driver who sublimated his mastery of mechanical power in fine, commanding artistry — the æsthetic equivalent of force.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

FEB 5 - 1934

Boston Symphony

The Arnold Schoenberg, who has become an American, furnished the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with the piece de resistance of its Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, his "Verklaerte Nacht," in string orchestra arrangement, opening the program, which continued with Edward Burlingame Hill's concertino for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YOR
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

FEB 6 - 1934

ROY HARRIS was called by John Tasker Howard "the white hope of the American nationalists." Saliently American are both the music and the career of the tall, lean, raw-boned Californian. In Los Angeles he drove his truck in the day time and studied music at night. When the New York Philharmonic played his first composition in 1926, he had, up to that time, no formal education in music. He gained a Guggenheim fellowship in 1928, returning in 1931 with new work and vastly improved technique.

One might designate his new symphony as the orchestration of vast new national stirrings—the symphony of the New Deal, in fact—considering Mr. Harris' own characterization of the work as expressing:

"The mood of adventure and physical exuberance; the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; the mood of positive will to power and action."

This from an earnest young truck driver who sublimated his mastery of mechanical power in fine, commanding artistry—the æsthetic equivalent of force.

Thomas

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 7 1934

New York Verdicts.

Of the work by Roy Harris, "Symphony 1933," played recently in Boston for the first time and presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in New York last week Olin Downes of the Times wrote as follows:

"It would be a pleasure to say that in vitality, color and expressive power this music betokened such a new figure among us; and some have said this. The structure of the piece, its map on paper, and some of its motives, have the creative seed and offer good opportunities for symphonic development. For this writer the promise of the symphony stops there. Its technical formulae are creditable enough, but the music is labored and the thematic material very sprase. An elaborate thematic scheme of a symphony may be put down on paper and the music entirely fail to come off in performance. There is little genuine organic development in this symphony. It sometimes repeats, but seldom progresses."

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

FEB 10

THE performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston musicians of Roy Harris's "Symphony: 1933" was preceded by so many monographs heralding Mr. Harris as a rodeo Stravinsky that I expected to hear something like a polytonal massacre of "The Last Round-Up." Mr. Harris's music, however, doesn't live down to its commentary. Instead of being stark and all that sort of thing, it's reasonably lyric, sensitive, and even occasionally sentimental. At its best, it has a finely restrained pathos, expressed in an idiom which Mr. Harris has developed for himself in the past ten years. Curiously enough, the weak spots are those that attempt to be rugged.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YOR
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

FEB 6 - 1934

ROY HARRIS was called by John Tasker Howard "the white hope of the American nationalists." Saliently American are both the music and the career of the tall, lean, raw-boned Californian. In Los Angeles he drove his truck in the day time and studied music at night. When the New York Philharmonic played his first composition in 1926, he had, up to that time, no formal education in music. He gained a Guggenheim fellowship in 1928, returning in 1931 with new work and vastly improved technique.

One might designate his new symphony as the orchestration of vast new national stirrings—the symphony of the New Deal, in fact—considering Mr. Harris' own characterization of the work as expressing:

"The mood of adventure and physical exuberance; the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; the mood of positive will to power and action."

This from an earnest young truck driver who sublimated his mastery of mechanical power in fine, commanding artistry—the æsthetic equivalent of force.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 7 1934

New York Verdicts.

Of the work by Roy Harris, "Symphony 1933," played recently in Boston for the first time and presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in New York last week Olin Downes of the Times wrote as follows:

"It would be a pleasure to say that in vitality, color and expressive power this music betokened such a new figure among us; and some have said this. The structure of the piece, its map on paper, and some of its motives, have the creative seed and offer good opportunities for symphonic development. For this writer the promise of the symphony stops there. Its technical formulae are creditable enough, but the music is labored and the thematic material very sprase. An elaborate thematic scheme of a symphony may be put down on paper and the music entirely fail to come off in performance. There is little genuine organic development in this symphony. It sometimes repeats, but seldom progresses."

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

71
FEB 10 193

THE performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston musicians of Roy Harris's "Symphony: 1933" was preceded by so many monographs heralding Mr. Harris as a rodeo Stravinsky that I expected to hear something like a polytonal massacre of "The Last Round-Up." Mr. Harris's music, however, doesn't live down to its commentary. Instead of being stark and all that sort of thing, it's reasonably lyric, sensitive, and even occasionally sentimental. At its best, it has a finely restrained pathos, expressed in an idiom which Mr. Harris has developed for himself in the past ten years. Curiously enough, the weak spots are those that attempt to be rugged.

106

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

JAN 27 1934

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidently does not share the opinion of some Sibelius enthusiasts that Baltimore can stand more than one of that composer's symphonies in a season. After hearing the November concert here, Philip S. Hensel, Jr., circulated a petition wherein Mr. Koussevitzky was asked for more of the same. The petition, with thirty-nine signatures, was duly forwarded to Boston.

In reply, the conductor wrote in part as follows: "Although I shall not be able to include a symphony by Sibelius in our program on January 31 (having played the Second at our last concert in Baltimore), I have planned to give our Baltimore audience the beautiful and rarely performed masterpiece, 'Verklarte Nacht,' by Arnold Schonberg." Elsewhere in the letter Mr. Koussevitzky referred to Siekk Sibelius as "the greatest symphonist of our day."
—Donald Kirkley in Baltimore Sun.

* * *

When the Philharmonic Orchestra broke away from Arturo Toscanini for a few measures last Sunday and made a mess of a passage in Ravel's "Bolero," the mishap was doubly unfortunate because the piece is so well known to even the least informed of muscial listeners.

The incident recalls a contretemps which Toscanini suffered with the same composition when he led it for the first time in Paris. Ravel, who is a poor hand at conducting but thinks himself a master of the baton, was present at the concert in question. Toscanini, taking some liberty or other in tempo or dynamics, annoyed the composer to such an extent that he made audible derogatory comments, hissed and almost brought about an open scandal, but was finally "shushed" into silence by the audience, whose members did not seem to agree at all with Ravel's view and rewarded Toscanini's interpretation with especially warm plaudits and prolonged cries of "bravo."—Leonard Liebling in York American.

The season's first performa "Faust" and "Romeo et Ju the return of Frida Leider a Norena, the debut of John

---

THIS CLIPPING
NEW YORK SUN

JAN 27 1934

A new symphony by Roy Harris will be introduced to New York at the next evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall to take place next Friday evening, February 2, instead of the usual Thursday. Mr. Harris completed this symphony last November. It had its first performance in Boston last night. Of his symphony, which is in three movements, the composer writes: "In the first movement I have tried to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; in the second, of the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence; in the third, the mood of a positive will to power and action."

Also on this program Dr. Koussevitzky will present Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon Musagete" for string orchestra, and the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor.

At the concert of Saturday afternoon, New York will first hear the piano concertino of Edward Burlingame Hill, written in 1931. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma. The program will also include Arnold Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht" ("Radiant Night"), performed by the entire string section. "Verklarte Nacht," a composition of Schonberg's twenty-fifth year, was recently performed by this orchestra at a concert in which Schonberg appeared as guest conductor of his own music. The concluding number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Sun Jan 25

The Greatest Symphonist—
Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidently does not share the opinion of some Sibelius enthusiasts that Baltimore can stand more than one of that composer's symphonies in a season. After hearing the November concert here, Philip S. Hensel, Jr., circulated a petition wherein Mr. Koussevitzky was asked for more of the same. The petition, with thirty-nine signatures, was duly forwarded to Boston.

In reply, the conductor wrote in part as follows: "Although I shall not be able to include a symphony by Sibelius in our program on January 31 (having played the Second at our last concert in Baltimore), I have planned to give our Baltimore audience the beautiful and rarely performed masterpiece, 'Verklarte Nacht,' by Arnold Schonberg." Elsewhere in the letter Mr. Koussevitzky referred to Siekk Sibelius as "the greatest symphonist of our day."

Y 27, 1934

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A "Symphony: 1933," by Roy Harris, was played for the first time at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday. Still in manuscript, the work is also the first by this young American composer to be included upon a program by this orchestra. It was completed only last November. The afternoon began decorously with Stravinsky's pseudo-18th century ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," a chaste conception of the young god as a model youth, behaving irreproachably in the presence of several maiden aunts. Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, in E-flat major, provided fitting climax and conclusion.

Mr Harris was born 26 years ago, in what is now the principality of "Alfalfa Bill" Murray, though he left Oklahoma early in childhood to go to California, where he makes his home. He is of the generation which has found oracular authority in the theoretical teachings of Nadia Boulanger, with whom he studied in Paris in 1926. Though his esthetic thought and technical procedures are, generally speaking, up-to-the-minute, Mr Harris has not—unlike certain contemporaries—confused music with geometry, nor modernity with anarchism. The common chord has not become to him, a symbol of a corrupt society.

For this reason his "Symphony: 1933" is lucid and easily grasped, though somewhat heavily orchestrated, and reminiscent a little too frequently of the European past. "In the first movement" he wrote for the program book, "I have tried to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; in the second, of the pathos which seems to underly all human existence; in the third, the mood of a positive will to power and action." This formidable postulate need not frighten any away, for the general mood—but not the style—of "Symphony: 1933" recalls that of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

The first of the three movements is a turbulent allegro of dramatic force; the second an andante whose slightly acidulous lyrical beauty is moving. Impressive for its clever manipulation of rhythm, and perhaps the best of all, is the finale, labeled Maestoso. Mr Harris has succeeded better than many another contemporary of more immediately salient ideas in making plain his alteration of themes and in giving his work an outline of compact form. Had he been able to "speak out" more personally, "Symphony: 1933" would have had few flaws.

Throughout the development of his symphonic style, Sibelius has become increasingly restrained in expression. The Tchaikovskyan fullness of speech which marks the First and Second Symphonies was gradually abandoned, and in the Seventh Symphony, perhaps the greatest of all, thus ar, Sibelius achieved an austerity and serenity that may best—if tritely—be compared to Attic tragedy. These qualities, in lesser degree, permeate the Fifth Symphony, though to them was added a songful gayety which intermittently illumines like sunlight breaking through a raincloud.

The last movement is not only exalted as few symphonic movements have been since Beethoven—Brahms always excepted—but reach a profundity of emotion that can only be characterized in the words of Sibelius as written down by Lucien Price in his sensitive "Portrait of Sibelius," printed this week in the program book. Speaking of the inspiration he found in ancient Latin and Greek literary classics, Sibelius said: "What I do find in the ancient classics is clearness of form, and in them I find depth of feeling without sentimentality." That, probably, is the last word upon the subject.

Not by any stretch of imagination can Sibelius be regarded in this symphony—nor in the others, for that matter—as a musical painter of Finnish landscapes. The qualities which inform all his symphonies are entirely personal, the overheard musings of a man with sensitive mind and expansive heart, but, of course, a man of the North. And with the word North, strength is practically synonymous. This Fifth Symphony also exhibits Sibelius as master of an intensely personal style of instrumentation. Lightness of touch, an aversion to the instrumental effulgence of Wagner and Richard Strauss are evident throughout, yet the score never becomes thin. Clear, though not simple in texture, it matches perfectly just what Sibelius had to say. All these are earmarks of a masterpiece.

At the next symphony concerts, a fortnight hence since the orchestra goes on tour this coming week, the program will be devoted to the suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann" and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, who this year will reach his 70th birthday. C. W. D.

AMUSEMENTS

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses) Ballet; Roy Harris, Symphony 1933; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5, E flat major.

An American composer had his great opportunity at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played the First Symphony by Roy Harris, for the first time anywhere. Our thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky for the fact that his preparation and performance of the symphony were no mere perfunctory gestures, but sincere and successful efforts to present the work in a most favorable light. No composer can ask more than that. On that his work must stand or fall.

We have watched the career of Roy Harris for several years. He has had to work against odds that, on one hand, would have him a genius, philosophically as well as musically, and on the other, would grant him no serious attention. He has faced these odds, and continued with an enthusiasm that has been so contagious that it has brought his works to many public performances. There is in his makeup a fresh, vigorous point of view, more individual, perhaps, than original. But individual and sincere he remains. Just now he stands at the parting of the ways. What he does from now on will decide his fate. Will his philosophy prove that of words or ideas?

A Friday afternoon audience gave the symphony a Friday afternoon reception, but individuals were much more positive in their reaction. As a matter of fact, we scarcely heard an opinion that actually favored the work. This is a more hopeful sing than a lukewarm attitude for or against. The work, no doubt has dull spots; it has its crudities, and a certain amount of the commonplace; but it has a rugged, driving sincerity that is extremely powerful. We believe it to be, potentially, as significant as anything that has recently come from the pen of our younger American composers. It is not for those who want pretty music, nor it is for this reason barren of ideas, fragmentary though many appear at a first hearing.

To our mind the American composer has a tendency to work too quickly. Symphonies of permanence are not necessarily born of laborious effort, but initial ideas need time to germinate and to prove whether they are adaptable to symphonic proportions. There is no way in which a composer can better take stock of himself, better see as he is seen, than by hearing his work publicly performed. Brahms is said to have kept every one of his orchestral works from his publisher until he heard it in public. Only a composer who is ready for the discard will hear the initial performance of one of his compositions without the desire to better many passages, if not whole movements.

Harris is not an inexperienced orchestral composer. There actually existed a symphony before his "First" played yesterday which failed to come up to his own critical estimate. This he discarded. Other works of his for full orchestra have been played by the New York Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and other orchestras.

The second movement of yesterday's symphony is the composer's desire to depict the underlying sadness which pervades human existence. It is the movement that is most likely to please, for it has reflective as well as dramatic beauty. The first movement has a mood of physical exuberance, of the power of youth, "savage but not brutal." The last movement's mood is that of concentrated power, a motion that cannot be arrested. Its other material is derived, in variation fashion, from its first main theme. Is the final unison, which ends the second movement, a conventional gesture? As it stands it seems to end abruptly and unconvincingly disturb the movement's atmosphere. Is the "underlying sadness" a normally solvable thing?

In this symphony we think Mr. Harris has found his stride. Where it will lead him we do not pretend to know. If his future progress is as consistent as his past it is likely to lead him towards the goal set by his friends.

Beautiful was the playing of the Fifth Sibelius Symphony, so recently heard as to need no discussion. The Stravinsky Ballet, scored for strings alone, was a distinct surprise to as many yesterday as to those who heard it for the first time in Washington in 1928. Throughout the program, orchestra and conductor gave of their best.

The next regular symphony concert will be Feb. 9, a program devoted to the works of Richard Strauss. Listed are an Orchestral Suite from Der Buerger als Edelmann and the Symphonia Domestica.

Intown
Screen Time Table

FLOOD GIVES

Roy Harris an American Composer and Unabashed

By Moses Smith

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S zeal on behalf of the American composer was most strikingly illustrated at last week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the program contained a symphony of Roy Harris. Not only here was Mr. Harris making his bow as a symphonic composer. Aside from a few occasional performances of two or three of his orchestral works in New York and Los Angeles, Mr. Harris has been heard only as composer in chamber music forms. The Boston performances of the symphony, incidentally, were the first anywhere.

Yet this comparatively young man out of the West has made his mark. Born in Oklahoma of pioneer parents in 1898, he was taken five years later to California, where he grew up as a farm-boy. On the land, and later in the cities, he was familiar with manual labor. He also cultivated a bowing acquaintance with the piano and clarinet. He "joined" the War, and on his return went to the University of California.

He did not begin to study music seriously until about ten years ago. Then he devoted himself to the art with a vengeance. Even his student compositions were highly praised by competent authority. He seems to have avoided the fledgling stage, and to have emerged full-grown after a short incubating process. He was helped—perhaps "mothered" is the better word—by Nadia Boulanger, Parisian teacher of composition to whom so many American composers are indebted.

During his four years in Paris, Harris mastered the old counterpoint and created a technic of his own, one which was more suitable to the expression of his particuler type of American exuberance. It was this exuberance, more than any striking radicalism, that quickly attracted the attention of American program-makers. Within a short time Roy Harris became known as a distinctive and powerful American composer.

The most meager outline of facts does not begin to suggest the man himself, or his music. He was in Boston not only during the preparation for the performance of his symphony, but also at the time when his Variations for String Quartet were played by the Pro Arte group in Cambridge earlier in the season. I have talked to him and watched him, both when he has been off guard and on.

On or off, he is militant in the cause of American music. He is, specifically, militant in the case of the music of Roy Harris, in which he believes, and which he is not ashamed to extol. More power to him. It is time that an American composer dropped his apologetic pose. Wagner shouted the fact of his genius from the housetops. I am not attempting to compare Mr. Harris with Wagner. But watch this vigorous, emotional, controversial, charming, moody American composer, none the less.

In a decade when almost every composer feels impelled to commit some new nuisance of dissonance for fear of being passed by as conservative, Mr. Harris has the courage to say that "idiom doesn't matter. Even the much maligned public is quick to recognize forceful ideas and the propulsive drive of a worthwhile creation."

He has the even greater courage not to be worried about apparent contradictions in his composing scheme. Side by side with the most unabashed triads are dissonances difficult to digest. Both have their place in Mr. Harris' scheme. He writes his own music and lets the critics worry about the contradictions.

FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JAN

107

Boston Orchestra on Tour to

Post Ja 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Once again the Boston Orchestra is making a trip to New York, and incidentally to Baltimore and Washington as well, so there will be no Symphony Concerts this week. Next week, on the orchestra's return, the programme will be devoted to the music of Richard Strauss, outstanding figure among living composers, whose 70th birthday will occur next June.

* * * *

The Symphonia Domestica, familiar masterpiece, and the suite from "Der Buerger als Edelmann" are the two numbers thus far announced for this programme. This suite received its first American performance at the hands of the Boston orchestra in 1921, under the direction of Mr. Monteux, but it has not been repeated. The suite is made up of the incidental music to Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," in which the opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" served as interlude. Today in Germany a portion of the first act of the play usually serves as introduction to the opera, a fantastic and charming creation that has for some reason never won general acclaim, but the remainder of the incidental music is seldom played. It is written, as the opera "Ariadne," for a small orchestra of some 36 players and each string instrument has a solo part. The score also calls for a piano.

* * * *

At the fourth concert of the Beethoven cycle, which will fall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 13, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be heard in the Triple Concerto for violin, 'cello and piano, never before played at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Toscanini conducted this work last season in New York with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of that city, but he called in three guest artists as soloists. Here in Boston the soloists will be drawn from the orchestra's own ranks: Mr. Burgin, violin; Mr. Bedetti, 'cello; Mr. Sanroma, pianist.

* * * *

Boston Symphony in Second Concert at Lyric Wednesday

Sun Jan 28

J. M. Sanroma, Young Spanish-American Virtuoso, to Make Debut Here With Koussevitzky; Musical Art Quartet in First of Three Concerts Thursday

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Heading this week's list of major musical events is the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season at the Lyric Wednesday night under Serge Koussevitzky's direction and with a pianist new to Baltimore, J. M. Sanroma, young Spanish-American virtuoso, as the soloist.

Other things in the current calendar to note especially are the first of three concerts by the Musical Art Quartet in the Baltimore Museum of Art, Thursday afternoon, and a piano recital by Ernest Hutcheson at the Peabody Friday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program contains two novelties: an early Schoenberg piece for string orchestra (Op. 4, originally for string sextet), called "Verklaerte Nacht" and a Concertino for piano and orchestra by E. B. Hill, chairman of Harvard's Division of Music.

Played First in 1915

Schoenberg was 25 when he wrote "Verklaerte Nacht" and it is considered his first important work. It was written in three weeks, the fall of 1899, when he was staying at Payerbach with Zemlinsky, the only master from whom he ever, it is said, sought instruction. It was played for the first time in Boston by the Kneisel Quartet in 1915 and was added to the Boston Symphony repertoire in 1921 by Monteux.

The composition is programmed after a poem by Richard Dehmel called "Weib und Die Welt." Arthur Fiedler's translation of the excerpt Schoenberg quoted in his score presents a scene of morose nature in its opening stanzas, but which ends on a note of mystical ecstasy. The music is in five sections descriptive of the shifting moods of the verse.

'Scheherazade' Returns

Mr. Hill's score was composed the summer of 1931 and is the twelfth of his works performed by the Boston Symphony. The Concertino is dedicated to Senor Sanroma.

The closing piece will be Rimsky's perennial "Scheherazade" which has already been heard here once this season—at the first National Symphony Orchestra concert directed by Hans Kindler. Whether or not repetitions in quick succession on orchestral programs are inevitable (and they seem to be), they must be faced along with other facts of life, though not necessarily with the same sigh of resignation. It would undoubtedly be better from the box-office angle if they could be avoided; if the conductors (just see them doing it!) got together at the beginning of each season and decided not to tread on each other's heels.

But all the same, one can scarcely gain too much familiarity with the masterpieces and the limitless variety of interpretation they invite; it has always seemed to be a mark of stupidity and defective appreciation to adopt such a viewpoint is rather essential, though catch the masterpieces

---

News Jan 21

), 1934

Sanroma Will Play At Lyric Wednesday

A program of notable interest is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening of this week.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time here the new concertino for piano and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, the New England composer. The soloist in this piece to be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist, who was the soloist with this orchestra in the first American performances of such important scores as the Concertos of Ravel and Ernst Toch, and the Capriccio of Stravinsky.

The opening number will be the tone poem, "Verkarte Nacht" ("Radiant Night") by Arnold Schonberg. The eminent Austrian composer, now making his first sojourn in America, composed this piece in his youth under the spell of the romantic era.

The closing number will be Rimsky - Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a masterpiece that utilizes the orchestral forces to their fullest extent.

........R. Strau

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Jan 24

Next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Baltimore—on Wednesday evening, January 31—when Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish-American pianist, will be the soloist. He will present for the first time here a new concertino for the piano and "Orchestra" by Edward Burlingame Hill, the New England composer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, will open the program with another work that has not before been heard in Baltimore, Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," which was recently given by this orchestra in Boston under the composer's direction. Schoenberg came to the United States early this winter and appeared with the Boston Symphony as guest conductor.

The other number selected for the Lyric concert is Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade."

News Jan 30

THE

PIANIST

JESUS MARIA SANROMA

Mr. Sanroma, young Spanish-American pianist, will make his Baltimore debut at the Boston Symphony Concert in the Lyric tomorrow night. He will play a new concertino for piano and orchestra by E. B. Hill, director of the music division at Harvard University.

........Grieg

Rose Weinstein, Soprano

* * *

Am Jan 21

A young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will make his first Baltimore appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on January 31. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the program, which will include "Verklaerte Nach," by Arnold Schoenberg and the Rimsky-Korsakoff tone poem, "Scheherazade."

Jan 14

The second of the series of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be given at the Lyric on January 31.

American Jan 28

6—SS

Bostonians ON BILLS To Introduce New Number

By CARROLL DULANEY

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish-American pianist, will make his Baltimore debut next Wednesday evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A new Concertino for piano and orchestra will be played for the first time in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday evening with Jesus Mariá Sanrome, young Spanish-American pianist, as the soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, and the other numbers on the program will be Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" for string orchestra and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade."

Mr. Hill is well known as a New England composer. His father was professor of chemistry at Harvard and his grandfather was president of the university. He has been chairman of the division of music at Harvard for several years and has written a number of symphonic works, twelve of which have been produced by the Boston Orchestra.

Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" was first written as a string sextet and is one of his earlier works. It was inspired by Richard Dehmel's poem, "Weib und die Welt."

"Scheherezade" is one of the best known works of Rimsky-Korsakoff and is immensely popular. It is brilliantly orchestrated and calls for virtuosic solo work in several plac

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK JOURNAL

1 3 0 1934

Music -:- By Henriet Weber

New Roy Harris Opus Playec

The second concert by the Roth String Quartet took plac at Steinway Hall last evening before an audience for the most part wise in the ways of modern music. The Roth Quartet is devoting itself to music of today in this series of concerts.

Last evening's program listed Milhaud, Roy Harris, and Dohnanyi.

Of these, the Harris composition "Variations in Three Movements," not yet published, had its first hearing in this city. Like a cool clean breeze it blew through the murky atmosphere induced by much self-conscious modern music. There was nothing artificial about it. It had no "manner." It was just itself.

Sincerity combined with distinguished originality is the reason why doors are opening everywhere to Roy Harris whose works are being played where worth while modern music can be distinguished from the vast amount of rubbish that is being produced. This is free music without being vague. It is wholesome and fresh and spontaneous—not a forced hot-house product of a calculated "newness."

The composer himself was present to enjoy the splendid performance by the Roth Quartet, and met informally many in the audience who wished to express their enthusiasm personally. Mr. Harris's "Symphony: 1933" is being featured at this week's visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky will play it at the Friday night concert at Carnegie Hall, which will be New York's first chance to hear it.

Roy Harris is only 36 now, but already a much-played composer of today. He is an Oklahoman, "an awkward, serious young plainsman" someone has written of him.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JAN 3 1 1934

BostonSymphony Gives Concert Recital

By RONALD THORNE

In honor of the President's birthday yesterday afternoon, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall with "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Then came a first half devoted to ballet music, practically new to Washington audiences, and for the concluding number the Fourth Symphony, in E minor, of Brahms. The concert was under the local management of the Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey Bureau.

Most interesting, and most enthusiastically received, was the second offering on the program, orchestral fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel. Koussevitzky is evidently a keen admirer of the genius of Ravel; he was first in Washington to present the famous Ravel Valse, almost as much discussed as his popular "Bolero."

The "Daphnis et Chloe" selections comprised "Daybreak," "Pantomine" and "Danse Generale" from the second suite. Written for Serge Diaghilev more than 20 years ago, it did not have an orchestral presentation in this country for several years, and apparently has never before been played in Washington.

It proved nothing less than a sensation. Its brilliant climax in the "Danse Generale" provided an experience to be enjoyed by any lover of music, and particularly for those who are swayed by mastery of rhythm. The audience was enthusiastic indeed, and Koussevitsky had the entire orchestra take a bow.

Earlier the orchestra played "Apollon Musagete." by Stravinsky, a work written for the string section and orginally played here at a chamber music festival in the Library of Congress. It is not typical Stravinsky by any means, but the program notes which compare it to the "Rosenkavalier" waltzes reveal more imagination than this critic possesses.

The Brahms Symphony, well known to Washington, and enjoying something of a vogue this season, though it has not hitherto been played here this year, was given the characteristically fine interpretation one expects from Koussevitsky and his famous ensemble, but the Ravel work was the high spot of the program.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 3 1 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS IMPRESSIVE IN ITS PROGRAM HERE

By DR. KURT HETZEL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presented yesterday in Constitution Hall a program of three world established masterpieces of symphonic literature. "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, the second suite "Daphnis and Chloe" by Ravel and the tremendous Symphony in E Minor by Brahms. A small but very distinguished audience enjoyed the offerings of this gorgeous orchestra and found Dr. Koussevitzky in much better form than at the first concert of the season.

The ballet music to "Apollon Musagete," which we knew from performances by chamber orchestras, gains by the use of a full string orchestra. Surprisingly precise in form and structure, this work of an ultramodern is very intriguing and depends upon handling with finesse by an understanding conductor and a highly responsive orchestra. Koussevitzky and his men gave a perfect rendition.

Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Brahms symphony have been played by the same orchestra under Koussevitzky here about two years ago. While Ravel's suite again was excellently given, we recall a much better reading of the Brahms symphony at that time. Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky did not emphasize as formerly some of the most beautiful contents of the second and fourth movements. Perhaps his tempi had something to do with that.

Neverth less, the concert as a whole, with its balanced program and the fine qualities of conductor and players, left a deep impression.

CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 3 1 1934

Boston Music Group Scores With Brahms

Koussevitzki's Rendition of Fourth Symphony Is Excellent.

By Ray C. B. Brown.

An extraordinary eloquent and impressive reading of Brahms' fourth symphony was the apex of the Boston Orchestra's second Washington concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall. Coming away in the glow of exaltation stimulated by Sergei Koussevitzki's interpretation, one was apt to put aside for the moment the impressions of the other works on the program, Stravinski's "Apollon Musagete" and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

Throughout the concert Dr. Koussevitzki was in an eminently persuasive vein. He almost convinced one that Stravinski is actually developing a second style instead of experimenting with simpler and subtler means than the coruscant instrumentation of "Petrushka" and "Le Rossignol." The clarity of yesterday's exposition was a strong plea for the composer's sincerity and for the significant content of the work.

By confining himself to strings alone for the delineation of a ballet on a classical subject, Stravinski certainly imposed severe conditions upon himself. It is not so easy to write a "program" piece with the limited tone colors of the four string choirs as the background for choreography. The effect of the more limpid palette in tone-painting, as compared to Stravinski's gorgeous iridescence of yesteryear, is like that received when turning from a Brangwyn mural to one by Puvis de Chavannes.

Perhaps that is the effect intended with due deliberation. In this ballet music, Apollo, Leader of the Muses, appears in a mystical light, his radiance subdued and his effulgence dimmed to a lambent aura. He seems almost disincarnate, no longer the physical manifestation but the spiritual entity. Yet to consider Stravinski as a mystic does not conform with our previous ideas of his artistic philosophy.

Ravel's palpitant score is, on the other hand, frankly of the earth in its paganism. The colors here are terrestrial and vivid, and the dancers tread solidly on springing turf.

Excellently as these ballets were played, they formed but a prelude to the rich stores of the E minor symphony in which Brahms expressed the maturity of his thought. The compression of this work made difficult its comprehension by its earlier exponents, and there are still conductors who are baffled by it, if one can judge from their muddled readings. Dr. Koussevitzki's vision is penetrant, and what he sees he discloses to others with a fine discrimination among values.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 3 1 1934

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., Jan. 30.—[Special.]—Mrs. Roosevelt this afternoon attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. She was accompanied by Mrs. Cordell Hull, wife of the secretary of state; Miss Marion Dickerman, and Miss Marguerite Le Hand.

Senator and Mrs. James Hamilton Lewis entertained at dinner for the following fellow Chicagoans now in the capital: Mrs. Jacob Baur, Mrs. Townsend McKeever, Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Chatfield-Taylor, Edward H. Bennett, Ambrose Cramer, and Mr. and Mrs. Adlai Stevenson. Washington guests included: Rear Admiral and Mrs. Mark Bristol, Lieut. Col. and Mrs. Emanuel Lombard of the French embassy; Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Henry Corbin, Señor Don Eduardo Vivot of the Argentinian embassy, and Lady Lister-Kaye, here from London.

Mrs. William Fitch Kelley of Aurora, Ill., and Washington entertained at luncheon today at the Mayflower and had as her ranking guests Mrs. Stone, wife of Justice Harlan Fiske Stone, and Mrs. William Howard Taft, widow of the chief justice and former President. Mrs. Kelley's thirty guests were seated at small tables in the Palm court.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

3 1 1934

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Roosevelt was honor guest at luncheon yesterday of Mrs. Daniel C. Roper, wife of the Secretary of Commerce. Others present were Mme. de Laboulaye, Representative Isabella Greenway, Mmes. William Phillips, James F. Byrnes, H. O. Chalkley, Woodrow Wilson, Charles S. Hamlin, Hugh C. Wallace, Oscar Underwood, Cary T. Grayson, Vance McCormick and Russell William Magna; Miss Sidney Burleson and Mrs. David Coker, daughter of the hostess.

Mrs. Roosevelt, accompanied by Mrs. Cordell Hull, attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 3 1 1934

The Boston Symphony orchestra is one of the beneficiaries in the will of the late Miss Abby Hunt of Boston and Beverly, who left to it a bequest of $100,000 and similar sums to Harvard and M. I. T. Needless to say all of these institutions can use this generous token to advantage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 3 1 1934

PRESIDENT'S WIFE IS LUNCHEON GUEST

Mme. de Laboulaye and Mrs. Wilson Also Entertained by Mrs. Roper in Capital.

JUSTICE STONE HONORED

Representative Treadway Gives Dinner for Him—Envoy to Netherlands a Guest.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—Mrs. Roosevelt was the honor guest today at a luncheon given by Mrs. Daniel C. Roper, wife of the Secretary of Commerce, who entertained in her home on Woodland Drive. Other guests included Mme. de Laboulaye, wife of the French Ambassador; Representative Isabella Greenway, Mrs. William Phillips and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson.

The other luncheon guests were Mrs. James F. Byrnes, Mrs. H. O. Chalkley, Mrs. Charles S. Hamlin, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mrs. Oscar Underwood, Mrs. Cary T. Grayson, Mrs. William Russell, Mrs. Vance McCormick, Miss Sidney Burleson and Mrs. David Coker, daughter of the hostess.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony concert in the afternoon, having as a guest in her box Mrs. Cordell Hull, wife of the Secretary of State.

The French Ambassador and Mme. de Laboulaye gave a dinner tonight at the embassy in honor of Henry T. Rainey, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Mrs. Rainey.

Justice Harlan F. Stone, associate justice of the Supreme Court, was honor guest at a dinner given by Representative Allen T. Treadway.

The Brazilian Ambassador and Señora de Lima e Silva entertained a luncheon party at the embassy.

The Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Van Haersma de With gave a luncheon for Grenville T. Emmet, American Minister to The Netherlands, who will sail for Europe Feb. 12. Mrs. Emmet accompanied her husband from New York to Washington, but was unable to attend the luncheon because of illness.

Mrs. Harlan F. Stone and Mrs. William Howard Taft were honor guests at a luncheon given by Mrs. William Fitch Kelley.

Mrs. Rainey was the ranking guest at a luncheon given by Mrs. Edward Campbell Shields, who entertained at the University Club for her house guest, Mrs. David H. Kincheloe, wife of Judge Kincheloe of New York, who formerly was a member of Congress from Kentucky.

Mrs. Kincheloe will motor back to New York tomorrow, accompanied by Mrs. Shields, who will be her guest, and Mrs. Charles W. Elliott, who is going to visit her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Blakely, in New York.

Boston Orchestra Gives Second of Concert Series

Brahms' Symphony Is Featured With an Interesting Interpretation, Unusual Depth and Unison of Tone.

BY ALICE EVERSMAN.

The second concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky was given yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall. The program was excellently balanced by the position of Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagere" and the orchestral fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" in the first part and Brahms' "Symphony No. 4 in E minor" after the intermission. In many respects yesterday's concert equaled some of the finest performances the Boston Symphony has given here and the audience gave ample proof of its appreciation.

Undoubtedly it was Brahms symphony that drew most of the audience, for the occasions to hear it interpreted by a man of Dr. Koussevitsky's rare musicianship are not many. In manner of thought, composer and conductor are alike and the nobility of Brahms was finely stressed in the reading of this last of his symphonies. Although complicated in form, especially in the last movement, there is a grandeur throughout which was robbed of any harshness by the magnificent control of the orchestra exercised by Dr. Koussevitsky. The tremendous spirit animating the symphony was clearly grasped and in the careful analysis which resulted in yesterday's performance the mere material content gained in warmth and beauty. No orchestral body has quite the depth and unison of tone as the Boston Orchestra and for works such as the Brahms it is an ideal medium of expression.

In the "Apollon Musagere," it is a new Stravinsky that was revealed, or perhaps the original Stravinsky in simple mood. Built for a ballet and played first at the Library of Congress in 1928, it is a prize composition of the Coolidge Foundation. Its scoring for strings alone give it delicacy of character and the proper pigment for depicting the subject. As Dr. Koussevitsky conducted it yesterday, it became crystal clear in outline and each picture resolved itself into the next with graceful consistency. It is characteristic of Dr. Koussevitsky that he should choose to acquaint the public with another faucet of the brilliant talent of this experimenting composer.

The sophisticated Ravel also showed another side of his art in the lovely suite. "Daphnis et Chloe." The three sections, "Lever du Jour," "Pantomine" and "Danse Generale," were concrete and concise in planning, with a bewildering flashing of color from the delicate moment of dawn to the full light of the final climax. The use of orchestral timbres and melodic figures is done with consummate finish and with fascinating results, presenting a bit of imagery of exquisite poetry. The Boston Orchestra is a supple interpreter of such numbers and Dr. Koussevitsky brought out all the intricate finesse of which Ravel is master and which requires a master musician to reproduce.

A patriotic gesture was the playing of the National Anthem as opening number in honor of President Roosevelt's birthday. Incidentally, it was a most noble rendition of the hymn, dignified and sonorous, and deserving the generous applause the audience accorded it.

Tel. CHelsea

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 31 1934

Conductor Appeals for Our American Composers

Serge ~~Koussevitsky,~~ Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Has a Definite Message for Washington's Music Lovers.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which played yesterday at Constitution Hall, has a definite message for the music public of Washington. It is this: If we are to grow musically, we must encourage and assist our national composers in what they are trying to do. We must be willing to give them a hearing with an open mind for the good they can offer us.

When interviewed yesterday before the concert, Dr. Koussevitsky began at once to speak of the future of American music as though it were a subject very close to his heart. And there is no one who has done more for that music than Dr. Koussevitsky. He has braved the censure of an unwilling public in order to bring it to their attention. He cites as an example of the ways of the public regarding American music, the great success of Copeland's "Music for the Theater," unanimously voted down at its first performance as of no value, yet today a favorite with the concert public. He waxed enthusiastic over a new symphony by Roy Harris, which he recently played in Boston, declaring it of real emotional depth of the kind to make lasting music. There are more and better composers in America today, he asserted, than in England.

As a conductor, Dr. Koussevitsky feels strongly his duty to hold ever in mind a progressive educational scheme in planning a program. Even when limited to three concerts, as is the case in his Washington series, this plan is carried out, his yesterday's program featuring the Brahm's "Fourth Symphony" as a logical sequence to Beethoven's "Eroica" of the concert of November 15 last. Then follows a gentle gradation up to the latest modernist—all in all, a program in which the educational principle is relieved by the pleasurable.

When asked if he believed it feasible to give but a portion of the great symphonic works at one time, he was emphatic in his opposition. There is a clear idea of the composer running through each composition, and to break the continuity is unthinkable. He recalled that the suggestion was once made to him by the Soviets when, before gaining permission to leave Russia in 1920, he took his splendid Moscow orchestra on a tour, playing for workers. He refused to consider the proposition for a moment. In reminiscent tone he said:

"I shall never forget the enthusiasm of those audiences. I have watched and waited, hoping for a new music to come forth from my native land, but so far there is nothing unusual. But great compositions can only be born when a people is at peace and there is time for them to think over their experiences. I have searched in history and can find no great compositions written in times of unrest."

Dr. Koussevitsky spoke of his pleasure in the musical festival he had conducted in Boston, each dedicated to the works of one master. There was an unforgettable series when all the orchestral works of Bach were given, three series of Beethoven, two of Brahms, one of Schubert. This Spring there will be a Tschaikowsky festival. Of all the great ones whose works pass under his baton, the greatest of all to him is Bach, then Mozart and, startling at first glance, Debussy. He calls him "the Mozart of the nineteenth century" and finds in him a fusion of the elements that make for immortality.

The Beethoven festival conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky in Washington in 1930 was recalled as a most satisfying experience, and he said "Even the politicians forgot their politics and came to enjoy Beethoven." And again, as a last reminder, Dr. Koussevitsky reiterated: "Be modern in music as you would be in other things. It is not enough to confine one's interest to the older composers, no matter how great they may be, but to really become rounded out musically one must keep abreast of the times and follow what the present tendency of music is and what is its aim. And, above all, encourage your national composers."

A. E.

Onward with the Beethoven Cycle

2-16-34

AT Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the orchestra proceeded to the fourth concert of its Beethoven cycle. A program had been announced consisting of the overture to "Coriolanus"; the Concerto for Piano, Violin, Violoncello and Orchestra; the "Pastoral Symphony." This gave way, however, to a more climactic succession of pieces—the overture, the "Pastoral Symphony," the Seventh Symphony. Surely the strenuously rhythmed "Seventh" is a more satisfactory piece with which to end the concert than the placid "Pastoral." So that by the change this program was the gainer and the next program—which is to contain the triple concerto—will not be the loser.

More and more Dr. Koussevitzky is leaning toward the purely musical in his readings of scores which may have programmatic content. His way with the Straussian tone poems is the outstanding example. Less obvious but equally true it is that his approach to Beethoven is in this respect of a piece with his approach to Strauss. A more "programmatic" list of pieces from Beethoven could hardly have been assembled than that of yesterday—the overture of the stern Coriolanus and the pleading women; the story of the happy peasants drowsing in the midst of placid and smiling nature, turning finally to their merry-making, interrupted by a cruel storm, going in the end on their way rejoicing; the symphony which has so aptly been christened the "apotheosis of the dance."

But scarcely an iota of "realism" did the conductor allow himself to draw out of these scores. As a succession of moods (and what music worthy of the name is not a succession of moods?) these several movements and periods came and went. Nothing more. As a music of moods, sincerely felt, masterfully planned, he would have this Beethoven prevail. Thus "Coriolanus" would have lost not a scintilla of its effect had it merely been labelled "Overture." Thus the placidity, the drowsiness, the pastoral happiness, the obvious humor, the frank and blunt dance measures, the final contentment, would have made themselves abundantly felt even if Beethoven had not seen fit to add his superscription to this pleasant music. And sheer music it is to Dr. Koussevitzky in spite of the thunderstorm (which is less than a tempest in a teapot to our modern ears) and in spite of the amusing little seven-measure bird symphony at the end of the second movement. Thus again the "Seventh" would have been the magnificent onward march of successively more and more exhilarating rhythms, even had Wagner never thought of his apt dance explanation.

And how finely molded, how perfectly modelled, on the other hand how vitally projected came all this music yesterday afternoon! Not the most artful singer in the world could sing more exquisitely the song of the pleading women in "Coriolanus"; nor round more perfectly the measures of the trio in the scherzo of the "Seventh." Nor could one imagine a more forceful energy than that of the rhythms as they came from each item on the program, but especially from the three rapid movements of the "Seventh."—Thus through four concerts the Beethoven cycle has not lagged at a single point. If Beethoven cycles there must be, let Dr. Koussevitzky rule over them.

A. H. M.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 13 1934

COUGHERS' CONCERT

Symphony Program Waxed Direct From Carnegie Hall

Columbia phonograph took an actual recording of Serge Kouzevitzky's Boston Symphony ~~at~~ Carnegie hall, and will market it in four disks of seven sides, which comprise the actual 'Symphony 1933' by Roy Harris, young American composer from New England, and will devote the eighth 'side' to some explanatory matter pertaining to Harris' work.

Being recorded from the platform, the gravest problem was the audience coughing which could not be blocked out of the original matrix, and the disk will be merchandized as a faithful reproduction of the Carnegie concert, including the audience noises.

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 11 1934

AN AMERICAN WORK

To the Music Editor:

(1) In his review, in THE TIMES of Feb. 3, of the first New York performance of Roy Harris's symphony, Mr. Olin Downes has chosen to show himself not merely as a severe critic of Harris's music but as an opponent of its performance. By thus assuming a partisan stand he has invited a reply which I hope I, as a partisan on the other side, may be permitted to make in your columns. I should make it clear that I am not in any sense the composer's spokesman.

(2) Mr. Downes's first specific objection is that "the music is labored and the material very sparse."

I am not alone in wishing I knew how Mr. Downes can tell after a "cursory examination of the score," after hearing it "thoroughly rehearsed" and once played in concert, that this music is labored. The difficulties of expressing any opinion after one hearing are doubtless inherent in the job of concert reviewing.

(3) However that may be, the right to call an unfamiliar work "labored" comes only through closer acquaintance with the previous aims and methods of the composer than Mr. Downes has with those of Roy Harris.

As for the thematic materials being "sparse"—that is a charge which by processes no more complicated than addition and division can be refuted. Mr. Downes may not like the thematic material, may think it is ugly, awkward, or unoriginal, or vulgar. But when he says it is sparse he has clearly either not listened or not heard. If there is one salient characteristic of Harris's music it is abundance (I do not need for the moment to claim distinction or individuality) of invention. When Mr. Downes says the music is labored he is a rash critic. When he says its material is sparse he is an inaccurate reporter.

When he says the symphony seldom progresses he expresses a tenable opinion. But when he says it sometimes repeats, we have a right to ask where. I dare promise that Roy Harris will cut without hesitation any repetition Mr. Downes can point out.

(4) Mr. Downes says that there are "large slices of Stravinsky in the score." If it were true, what of it? Are there not "large slices" of Mozart and Haydn in Beethoven, of Beethoven in Schumann and Weber, of Weber and Liszt in Wagner, of Wagner in Strauss and even Debussy, of Bach, Handel, Tchaikovsky and Meyerbeer in Stravinsky? Unless or until Mr. Downes wishes to state just where he found "large slices of Stravinsky" I deny that there are any—a denial which I think no one who has a moderate acquaintance with Roy Harris's music will hesitate to make. A larger amount of self-criticism is Mr. Downes's prescription for the composer—homeopathy, indeed, in prescribing for Roy Harris. For if there is one thing more remarkable than the pace at which he is turning out major works (a string sextet, a string quartet and a symphony during the last year and a half), it is the self-critical attitude which has made him rewrite and work over and often discard individual movements or whole works months or years after they were well received in public performance. Finally, Mr. Downes goes to the unusual length of suggesting that Mr. Koussevitzky should have been content to play the work in Boston and choose something else for New York.

(5) From Mr. Downes of all people, and in reference to this program of all programs, this is a singularly inappropriate suggestion. Mr. Koussevitzky played on the same program the Fourth symphony of Brahms, a work which not only has been overplayed in New York in recent years but was played by Mr. Toscanini only two weeks earlier. If there was something that the "too rare" programs of the Boston Orchestra did not have room for, it was certainly the Brahms symphony.

(6) Mr. Downes plainly feels that an attempt has been made to force Roy Harris on him as the white hope of American music. He resents what he looks on as an attempt to stampede him. But he should not allow his resentment to warp his judgment, which, coming from the critic of THE TIMES, has a wide influence. He did not suggest except by indirection that Stravinsky's "European futility" should have been omitted from the program. "Apollon Musagète" at best is not news; Roy Harris's symphony at worst is. When Philharmonic conductors or Mr. Gatti-Casazza present endless European futilities, Mr. Downes manages to keep his temper. To lose it, then, when Mr. Koussevitzky plays Harris is the merest inversion of chauvinism. As such it is a too familiar "American ineptitude."

ARTHUR MENDEL.

New York, Feb. 6, 1934.

(1) "Opponent of its performance." Mr. Mendel is misleading. The review in question praised Mr. Koussevitzky for his "curiosity, interest and courage" in promoting the works of American composers. "For this," it continued, "he is certainly to be commended. At the same time, it is worth while to remember that neither our composers nor we ourselves will be able to raise up a national school of composition by tugging at our bootstraps, and frankness compels the statement that it would have been just as well to give the Harris symphony a thorough hearing in Boston and choose something else for one of the concerts that are too rare in New York." In Boston this symphony was given a long and detailed rehearsal attended by members of the press, the writer among them, and two public performances. Mr. Downes persists in the belief that in this way ample justice was done the symphony, and opportunity extended Mr. Harris to repeatedly hear his work, and profit by the experience.

(2) The quotation is correct. So is the word "sparse" applied to the material, which is sparse of ideas, and so is the word "labored" applied to the whole character of the symphony.

(3) Previous to his rehearsals Mr. Harris, with his score at the piano, had explained to Mr. Downes with admirable clarity and comprehensiveness his aims and methods in the symphony. If Mr. Mendel, with his inferentially profound knowledge of Mr. Harris's aims and methods, cannot discover where the symphony repeats instead of progresses, it seems to Mr. Downes that he must either not have listened or not have heard.

(4) The same thing applies to the "slice" of Stravinsky. Mr. Downes's review told where he found it—in the first movement. But critics notoriously disagree in these matters, and it is true that America has her supply of rash critics.

(5) If Mr. Mendel thinks that Brahms's Fourth symphony and Harris's "Symphony: 1933" are works equally worthy of repetition, Mr. Downes sees no occasion to pursue that argument.

(6) Mr. Downes, whose criticism expressed his belief in Mr. Harris's talent, and his admiration for his purposes, so thoroughly agrees with Mr. Mendel's estimate of the news value of the Harris symphony that he gave this work about five-sixths of a fairly long article, bestowing upon the Stravinsky music three lines and upon the Brahms symphony five. If this proportion does not satisfy the proponents of Mr. Harris, it is difficult to conceive of anything that would do so.—[Music Editor of THE TIMES.]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Beethoven program: Overture to Collins Tragedy, "Coriolanus"; Symphony No. 6 in F major, "Pastorale"; Symphony No. 7, in A major.

This season's Beethoven cycle reached its fourth program yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are adding to their glory by the way these programs are being interpreted. A remarkable symmetry is noticeable in the presentation of each work. This is no mere outward proportioning, but a showing forth in the most persuasive manner of the work's inner musical sense.

The "Pastorale" Symphony had a bad start, as far as discussion goes, by Schindler, who has been called "a solemn Boswell without the genius," Schindler was vain enough to have "Amide Beethoven" inscribed on his visiting card, and dull enough to bore Beethoven to the utmost limit with questions of little import and less understanding. Undoubtedly Beethoven answered in kind, with the result that what Schindler heard, or thought he heard, came down as true Beethoven tradition. Since then the music has had plenty of opportunity to explain itself. Yesterday's performance took one away from everyday cares and wintry weather to the environs of a Vienna less torn with strife than it is today, and to feelings of satisfaction, beauty and good-natured vitality. Beethoven described his own idea of this Symphony by saying it is 'more the expression of feeling than painting."

What a wondrous beginning for a work of such importance! Where in all literature is there such a spontaneous, unpretentious opening? And never once in all its moods, from the "awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country," to the "gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm," does this spontaneous music lose its spin.

The first notes of the overture to Collin's "Coriolanus," made it apparent that yesterday's concert was to be a worthy successor of the third Beethoven program, which included a memorable reading of the C minor Symphony. The listener could not resist the conviction, throughout the program, that every tempo was as it should be. There was no attempt to make the second movement of the "Pastorale" impressive; it was allowed the unfettered utterance which begets true eloquence.

The Seventh Symphony completed the program in a manner that gave the audience extraordinary satisfaction.

The next Beethoven concert will take place March 27 with the following program: Incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" (with soloist); concerto for Piano, Violin and Violincello (soloists Messrs. Sanroma, Burgin, Bedetti); Symphony No. 8, in F major.

SYMPHONY IN 4TH TUESDAY

Beethoven's Sixth and Seventh Played

The fourth of the six Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven took place yesterday before the usual large and applausive audience. The programme listed the Six and Seventh Symphonies and, as opening number, the Overture to Collins' tragedy "Coriolanus."

Familiar music all of this and often heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. The dramatic qualities in the "Coriolanus" Overture appeal strongly to Dr. Koussevitzky's temperament, as they do to that of many another conductor. The performance yesterday was characterized by great intensity and spiritual force. In this overture restraint can be more telling than excess.

Again Dr. Koussevitzky's sense of the poetic and the picturesque helps him to make alive today the unquestionably waning and fading music of the "Pastoral" Symphony. One may find it the least admirable of the nine and yet derive nothing but pleasure from a performance of it such as that of yesterday. At one time Dr. Koussevitzky was prone to over-play the Seventh Symphony. Yesterday he let the music speak more completely for itself, and the performance, while by no means lacking in vitality, may be described as satisfying rather than exciting.

M. Bauer

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled an uncommonly promising program for the Symphony Concerts of next week. For beginning he has drawn an orchestral fragment, "Entrance of the Queen of Sheba," from Sir T. Beecham's version of Handel's little-known oratorio, "Solomon." Next comes Hugo Wolf's setting, new to Boston and seldom heard anywhere, of Goethe's "Prometheus." A baritone voice, Mr. McClosky's, will sing the verse to orchestral accompaniment. Then "Evocation," the master-work of Mr. Loeffler's present years, deservedly repeated after two seasons. To round the concerts, Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E minor.

Feb 15 Trans

Incidents and Prospects

At the recent performance in New York of Roy Harris's Symphony by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, the Columbia Company made a record of it. Soon it will be published. It fills seven sides of four discs. The eighth will give some account of Harris as composer.

Feb

Y 14, 1934 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Sixth and Seventh Symphonies and the "Coriolanus" overture were conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven cycle in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience seemed the largest to attend a Tuesday concert thus far this season.

When comparison of Beethoven's overtures is attempted, the invariable criterion is the "Leonore" No. 3, judged by many to be the finest example of a dramatic overture. Indeed it is one of the finest, jammed with distinctive thematic material, worked up at length to a most thrilling climax. But so is the "Coriolanus" overture exceptional music. Its mood is more immediate, but less varied. Its "bite" is felt with the first staccato chord after the unison C. Unfortunately, the "Coriolanus" is perhaps more compact, it is much more repetitious and less salient in material than that which sums up the melodrama of the opera "Fidelio." Dr Koussevitzky played it excellently.

Perhaps it is sheer blasphemy for a lowly mortal to qualify his admiration for the "Pastoral" Symphony—a marvelously written and descriptive piece—as being representative of the external, lesser Beethoven. It is "prettier" than Beethoven usually permitted his music to be, delightfully naive; not characteristic of the mighty symphonist and visionary who roared triumphantly through the finale of the "Eroica," nor of the master, who transferred his own periodic gusty humor and exuberance to the buoyant pages of the Seventh Symphony. Wagner called the Seventh Symphony the "apotheosis of the dance." Such grandiose references are not made nowadays (the 20th century is more "sophisticated"), but the capricious melodic flights, the unexpected turns of rhythm will probably remain forever a delight, something at which to marvel, and perhaps never to be surpassed in "absolute" music. Dr Koussevitzky's readings of these two symphonies were stimulating. He now plays the Seventh more moderately, with less theatrical contrasts of tonal volume, though it is true that his furious pace near the end resulted in some badly produced notes, especially from the brass.

At the next concert of this series, on March 27, the Eighth Symphony, the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont," and the Triple Concerto for piano, violin, and 'cello—deferred from yesterday's program—will be heard. A slip inserted in yesterday's program book announced, for the Boston Symphony's performance of the B minor Mass of Bach, at a Pension Fund concert on March 18, the following soloists: Olga Averino, soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, and David Blair McClosky, baritone. The choruses will be the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct.

C. W. D.

Orchestral Salaries

Timely Reminder to Those That Demur Over An Item in Current Deficits

UNDER present standards of living in this country, orchestral musicians are not paid too much for their services, especially when it is considered that they must spend years in acquiring sufficient proficiency on an instrument to be able to qualify for orchestras such as the Philadelphia, the Boston, or the Philharmonic. Then, too, their years of active work are considerably shorter than those of men in other callings.

For these reasons and the additional one that the time of employment for the orchestral musician runs less than half of the year, during the remainder of which it is very difficult to obtain employment which will meet even living expenses, the members of a great orchestra are none too highly paid. [Samuel Laciar in the Philadelphia Public Ledger

---

FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR-TELEGRAM

FEB 15 1934

WHO'S NEWS TO

Roy Harris was called by John Tasker Howard "the white hope of the American nationalists." Saliently American are both the music and the career of the tall, lean, raw-boned Californian. In Los Angeles he drove his truck in the daytime and studied music at night. When the New York Philharmonic played his first composition in 1926, he had, up to that time, no formal education in music. He gained a Guggenheim fellowship in 1928, returning in 1931 with new work and vastly improved technique.

One might designate his new symphony as the orchestration of vast new national stirrings—the symphony of the new deal, in fact—considering Harris' own characterization of the work as expressing:

"The mood of adventure and physical exuberance: the pathos which seems to underlie all human existence: the mood of positive will to power and action."

This from an earnest young truck driver who sublimated his mastery of mechanical power in fine, commanding artistry—the esthetic equivalent of force.

Ente

BOSTON
ORC

SIR HEN
CO

FROM A BO

In January e phony Orchestr guests to condu night, while its Koussevitzky,
tomed post.
vited to conduc own works; a three programm self has chose concerts take theatre at Cam phony Hall, B ductor also di
third concert, dence, more t
years the guest as Respighi, R and Holst am
Signor Casell
Arbos, and Si
the conducto
American-bor
During the been some m
this plan; e visiting or re have been d management minded that more tolerab American-bo special effor earlier stan favoured by Schönberg teacher, and an opera w
Sir Henry York (from a holiday) broadcasting Boston inv tunately, wa from giving that at Cam contained, t his earliest transcriptio give an id singular dev
The compo affection f
"Pelleas a more theor
In these was the chi visited Bo English op was a st hough no
Bostonia
at the Sym elsewhere
ners in E
and the Queen's
Sir He friendship orchestra initial test what he planation Complem to his ne cedure, h means of ing them off at a reading."
The da tra parte liking.
quick an days and ability o Providen concerts for Sir H

London Times,
Friday. Feb. 16, 1934

Entertainments

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SIR HENRY WOOD AS CONDUCTOR

FROM A BOSTON CORRESPONDENT

In January each year the Boston Symphony Orchestra invites two distinguished guests to conduct its concerts for a fortnight, while its regular conductor, M. Koussevitsky, is absent from his accustomed post. A famous composer is invited to conduct three performances of his own works; a famous conductor to direct three programmes of works which he himself has chosen. The composer's three concerts take place, one in the University theatre at Cambridge and two in the Symphony Hall, Boston, where the guest conductor also directs two performances. His third concert, however, is held in Providence, more than 40 miles away. In past years the guests have included such names as Respighi, Ravel, Honegger, Glazounov, and Holst among the composers; and Signor Casella, Mr. Goossens, Señor Arbos, and Sir Thomas Beecham among the conductors, together with several American-born conductors.

During the past year or so there have been some murmurs over the working of this plan; eminent composers, whether visiting or resident in the United States, have been difficult to engage; and the management of the orchestra has been reminded that mediocre conductors are not more tolerable because they chance to be American-born. There was therefore a special effort this winter to regain the earlier standard, and this effort was favoured by fortune.

Schönberg was settled in Boston as a teacher, and as a composer at work upon an opera which has long engaged him. Sir Henry Wood was expected in New York (from Bermuda, where he was taking a holiday) to conduct for one of the broadcasting stations. Each accepted the Boston invitation. Schönberg, unfortunately, was prevented by sudden illness from giving more than a single concert, that at Cambridge. The one programme contained, to the general surprise, two of his earliest symphonic works and a later transcription from Bach, which do not give an idea of the recent and more singular developments of his composition. The composer, one was told, keeps an affection for "Verklärte Nacht" and "Pelleas and Melisande," into which his more theorized pieces fail to warm him.

In these circumstances Sir Henry Wood was the chief guest. When a youth he had visited Boston as the conductor of an English operetta company. Otherwise he was a stranger to Boston personally, though not by reputation. Many of the "Bostonians" who made up his audiences at the Symphony Hall and who met him elsewhere are fond of spending their summers in England. Sooner or later they find their way to the "Proms" at the Queen's Hall, and find it again and again.

Sir Henry came at once into terms of friendship with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He stood the time-honoured initial test, that a conductor should know what he wants—and get it without explanations or superfluous repetitions. Complementary qualities commended him to his new players: his methodical procedure, his clear indication of will, his means of gaining his ends and not exacting them. He neither plodded nor went off at a tangent into a "very personal reading."

The day's work over, he and the orchestra parted on equal terms of respect and liking. The three rehearsals yielded quick and certain results—which in these days and conditions marks the crowning ability of a conductor. In the concert at Providence, and still more perhaps in the concerts at Boston, the orchestra played for Sir Henry Wood as well as with him.

At first sight Sir Henry Wood's programmes may have caused a little surprise to his American audiences; they are accustomed to one large work at every symphony concert, and do not rebel against two. But more and more often the three-piece, or at most four-piece, programme prevails. Sir Henry Wood had six numbers, while his largest works were Elgar's "Enigma Variations" and Strauss's "Don Juan." The performances, however, brought a better understanding of his plan, and more than the pleasure which had been anticipated. Only one piece, and that an old one, Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody," failed to make its mark. Beethoven's Rondino for an octet of wind instruments and an Andante for strings from Mozart's first Cassation gave to the audience a touch of the youth of the classical composers, though it is probable that the modern conductor of a virtuoso orchestra gives to such works a tonal texture of which their composers did not even dream.

It must have been a satisfaction to the conductor to realize that the English works fared best. First of these stood his own arrangement of a Purcell suite, rescored from the composer's theatre music and the sonatas of 1683. Only once in the whole 53 years of the Boston Orchestra's existence has a work by Henry Purcell been performed before; and then it was but the "Trumpet Voluntary." The Purcell suite revealed the composer here for the first time in his true quality. In a sense Elgar's Variations were also understood for the first time. Both Koussevitsky and Toscanini have performed them here, but neither revealed in them the mingled strength and sweetness which the English conductor disclosed. Sir Henry Wood held fast to the English (and Elgarian) reticence, yet he brought out in the more lyrical variations that depth and tenderness of sentiment which is also their peculiarly English characteristic, while giving due weight to the national sturdiness of the more robust variations. In short, the Variations had been heard before according to the musical letter; they were heard now enriched according to the spirit.

Feb 17

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATU

tinction to

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Bach, Brandenburg concerto No 3, in G major for string orchestra; Berezowsky, Symphony No. 2, op. 18 (first performance); Sibelius, Concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 47; Ravel, "La Valse," choreographic poem. Soloist, Richard Burgin.

Interest in yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra centred around Richard Burgin's performance of the Sibelius violin concerto and in the first performance of Nicolai Berezowsky's Second Symphony. The concert began with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and closed with Ravel's "La Valse."

Mr. Burgin has probably never appeared to better advantage in Boston than he did yesterday. Except for the fact that the Sibelius Concerto bristles with difficulties, there is ample ground for wonder at the fact that it is so seldom played. The work itself is without doubt one of the important compositions of Sibelius and is much better than most of the violin concertos that have been written in the last 40 years. Mr. Burgin played it con amore and with excellent effect. His colleagues in the orchestra united with the audience in giving him applause that bordered on an ovation. All this was justly deserved.

Dr. Koussevitzky has a penchant for first performances. Yesterday he brought us a new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky. It will be instructive, in seasons to come, to look back and trace the works that have been eagerly sought for further performances. We imagine the number will be small. On yesterday's performance of the new symphony Dr. Koussevitzky had expended careful and zealous preparation. The composer was fortunate indeed, to have the piece so auspiciously presented.

Mr. Berezowsky's new symphony is not likely to start serious controversies. It is, however, the product of a fine and sensitive musical nature. The composer makes no pretentious intellectual claims for the work; he rightly lets the music speak for itself. He is a musician with a well-ordered orchestral technique; not afraid of dissonant sounds, but by no means enslaved to them.

The symphony is of the conventional four-movement type. The first movement opens with much promise, both in tone coloring and emotional content. This promise is fulfilled to a considerable degree. The scherzo and finale left us least convinced. In the scherzo Mr. Berezowsky seemed to make more effort to be different, and he seemed not to be too convinced in accomplishing it. If our memory is not at fault, it is the climax at the end of this movement that vitalizes it.

There is a goodly amount of cleverness in the symphony and, except in the scherzo, it seems spontaneous. The slow movement is of a beauty that rises to heights of real eloquence. The final movement left us with no great impressions. There are passages that sound rather dry, alternating with others of very agreeable sonorities. We do not cherish the task of making hasty estimates of new works. Mr. Berezowsky's latest work may or may not be "just another modern symphony." Its composer is innately musical, thoroughly competent and modest enough to give one hope for his future.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto is really a concerto grosso. The contrasting elements of which the concerto style is made, are distinctly shown in the grouping of the instruments. Bach used the first movement, after he had brought out the Brandenburg Concertos, as the introduction to one of his church cantatas, "Ich liebe den Hoechstein," turning the nine parts of the orchestra into 14, by the addition of two horns, two oboes and a taille, or alto oboe. There is every evidence that Bach's own performance of the work included an improvised slow movement or instrumental recitative between the two movements heard yesterday. This most recent performance was more routined than remarkable. The close of the first movement was given the usual ending of artificial dignity by resort to the time-worn tradition that any lively movement by Bach shall become, in its last bar or bars, at least an adagio. This is a pedantic formula that in no way reflects a scholarship built on esthetic perception.

On the other hand, we have never heard a better presentation of Ravel's "La Valse."

Next week's program includes Loeffler's "Evocation," the Fourth Symphony by Brahms, Wolf's "Prometheus," for baritone with orchestra, and the "Entrance of the Queen of Sheba," from Handel's "Solomon."

Feb 17 - Post

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SIBELIUS

Violin Concerto Chief Highlight With Burgin Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the magnificent performances of the seven symphonies of Sibelius achieved here during the past two seasons by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was added yesterday an equally impressive version of the Finnish composer's Violin Concerto, with Mr. Burgin as soloist.

CONCERTO THE CLIMAX

This Concerto was the central part of the concert. What came before was prelude; what followed was aftermath. Specifically the Concerto had been preceded by the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, played in virile style by a reduced string orchestra, and a brand new Symphony No. 2 of Nicolai Berezowsky, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. Ravel's "La Valse" brought the end.

Twice before had Mr. Burgin played Sibelius' Concerto at the Symphony Concerts, in 1929 and in 1930, and played it authoritatively, with technical mastery and depth of feeling, with fine grasp of the composer's intention: for had he not played it in Sweden and in Norway under Sibelius himself? And in all respects he had on these occasions the aid and support of Dr. Koussevitzky and of his colleagues.

Masterly Interpretation

But the performance of yesterday seemed to go beyond those that had preceded it. There was a more penetrating intensity, a freer rhapsodizing in the improvisational first movement, an even more fervent expression in the slow division, an increased wildness in the last. Here was no mere virtuoso fiddling; here was interpretation in the truest sense, and a stirred audience responded with prolonged applause.

Like those of Beethoven and of Brahms, of Mendelssohn and of Tchaikovsky, the Concerto of Sibelius is a work of symphonic calibre, an extra symphony if you choose, in which the solo violin plays a commanding part. And better even than any of his predecessors does Sibelius keep his orchestra from over-weighting the solo instrument.

Berezowsky's Symphony

Of the new Symphony of Mr. Berezowsky there is not a great deal that need be said. Like the other Symphony and the Violin Concerto of this Americanized Russian that had been heard here, the piece proves his competence but denies him an individual voice. The most noticeable influences in the Symphony of yesterday were those of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, particularly the latter. For that reason the tricksy Scherzo was the most successful of the our movements. Mr. Berezowsky, who was present, was called to the stage to acknowledge the audience's cordial applause. Conductor and orchestra had played his difficult music with the devotion that they bring even to fieldgling composers.

The performance of Ravel's Waltz was an arresting one, but marred by an over-anxiety on Dr. Koussevitzky's part to achieve the utmost in color and accentuation, with the result that the music seemed strangely contrived and constrained. There emerged not so much the waltz intoxicating as the waltz ironical, and the audience responded in kind.

Y 17, 1934 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

An exceptionally fine performance of the Violin Concerto of Sibelius by Richard Burgin, Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday overshadowed the remainder of an uncommonly interesting program. The concert began with the Third Brandenburg Concerto, for strings, of J. S. Bach; continued with a first performance of a new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, and ended with a gorgeous reading of Ravel's equally gorgeous choreographic poem "La Valse."

Sibelius' lofty concerto in D minor is probably the most greatly to be treasured work in this form since the violin concerto of Brahms was set to paper. Again like that of Brahms, this masterpiece is less a concerto in the conventional sense than a large-proportioned symphonic dialogue between orchestra and solo violin. Like each of the seven symphonies of Sibelius, his concerto shuns rhetorical fireworks but communicates most modestly and directly that genuine nobility of thought and feeling, characteristic of Sibelius at his best. None but a true musical poet could have felt so deeply and written so eloquently; only an artist of highest principles would have denied as consistently as Sibelius here denied, all claims upon the concerto form of display for its own sake.

Though the first two movements, especially in the matter of harmony, are not externally typical of Sibelius, this concerto does possess those individual qualities—independence of thought and idiom, concision and completeness of speech—which pervade all the best music of the Finnish master. It should not be thought that a violinist has no opportunity to display his skill, on the contrary he is required throughout to cope with formidable technical difficulties. These are, however, incidental to what the composer has to say.

Mr Burgin's performance of this concerto is perhaps now a standard hereabouts. He had the benefit of counsel in the matter of its interpretation from Sibelius himself. The concertmaster of the Boston Symphony is, needless to say, one of the best-equipped musicians of Boston. Save for occasional discrepancies in pitch, one could not imagine a better performance of the work than Mr Burgin achieved yesterday. He neither sentimentalized nor understressed Sibelius' emotional discourse, nor did he neglect the slightest nuance of phrase or accent.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted the orchestral portion felicitously, exhibiting perfect grasp of the relation of orchestra to soloist. He and Mr Burgin, are highly imaginative, musically speaking, and imagination is vital where the laconic Sibelius is concerned. Like Brahms and Beethoven, Sibelius can be played perfunctorily and thus be made to lose some of his potency; again and again one singled out passages that might have suffered at the hands of less gifted interpreters.

Mr Berezowsky's Symphony, cast more or less in conventional symphonic form, according to the composer, was finished last April. Boston concert-goers became cognizant of Mr Berezowsky's talents, when his violin concerto and his earlier symphony were played here. The present work reveals both this ability and a tendency to dally with trivial thematic substance and with showy juggling of rhythms. The slow movement is the best of the three, though sporadic flights of inspiration are present elsewhere.

The instrumentation is superb, at all times fine-textured and frequently ingenious in its choice of unusual combinations of instruments. Suggestions of jazz are continually lurking in the background, even to "blues" in the slow movement. Had Mr Berezowsky not been prone to the restlessness, so common to much contemporary music, that does not exhilarate but only irritates most listeners, his symphony would have been much more effective. He obviously has a sense of formal proportion and knows how to work up exciting climaxes. Mr Berezowsky was present, and appeared several times upon the stage after his music had been played.

The setting for orchestra and baritone which Hugo Wolf wrote for Goethe's poem "Prometheus" will next week stand upon a Boston Symphony program for the first time. David Blair McClosky will be soloist. "The Entrance of the Queen of Sheba" from Handel's oratorio "Solomon"; "Evocation," by Charles Martin Loeffler, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in E minor, are also scheduled.

C. W. D.

Second Occasions At Symphony Hall

Trans Feb 19

At the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening there were two incidents to record. First the general, warm and long applause for Mr. Burgin at the end of Sibelius's Violin-Concerto, in which he again played the solo-part. Six times, unless the count slipped, he was recalled in plaudits that needed no urging. Within recollection that stretches back over his fourteen years as concert-master, on no similar occasion has he played with such free command of every means, such warmth of tone, such diversified and stirring musical speech. For the first times on Friday and Saturday, he stood before a familiar audience matured and released. By the same tokens Sibelius's Concerto is now as firmly established in the repertory and with the audiences of the Symphony Concerts as are his major symphonies. Most who resented it when it was first heard, thanks to Maud Powell, in 1907, who quite forgot it in the long interval between 1912 and 1929, have either vanished from the symphonic scene or now stand by to cheer.

In the second place there were frank opinions to be heard of Mr. Berezovsky's new symphony and of the unusual opportunity he has enjoyed these three years at the Symphony Concerts. To every conductor his protégés. A Toscanini, a Koussevitzky, a Stokowski, would not be himself in other essential qualities, did he not find and cultivate them. Once upon a time at Symphony Hall, there was Mr. Tansman, the Parisian Pole, who came, returned, and finally went. Now there is Mr. Berezovsky with a suspicion abroad and expressed that he also is drawing near to end. Not the least of Dr. Koussevitzky's distinctions is his tireless zeal for young composers from whatever quarter they may come. It is a glory of the Symphony Concerts in his time that they make room for oncoming talents; that most such are heard sympathetically and encouragingly. But in three years, three occasions for Mr. Berezovsky—and three unmistakably minor works out of the common stock of modernity.

H. T. P.

Rivalry and Routine

Narrow Range of Current Orchestral Programs

Wms feb 19

We used to hear a wider variety of music than we do now, when the public centers its mind upon conductors, who vie with one another in "interpretations" of the four symphonies of Brahms and the major scores of Beethoven. Without doubt we have outgrown some of the early works, but are there not others which would bear at least one repetition?

The concert-going public has been badly trained. It has lost its appetite for homelier delights. It must be fed each day on stimulating food. Its mental processes are too much concerned with conductors and their "readings" and not sufficiently directed toward the music itself. If this were not the case audiences would not sit season after season listening to the same things.

Personally, we should like to hear the "Melpomene" Overture of George Chadwick. And we should not shy at a repetition of his jovial "Tam O'Shanter." Mr. Chadwick is dead, and there is nothing deader than a dead American composer. Except perhaps some of those yet living. [W. J. Henderson, in the New York Sun

---

MONDAY SERIES BY SYMPHONY

Strauss' Great Domestica Warmly Received

Post Feb 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two of the numbers that made the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert, the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, were repeated from recent programmes of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Between these two came Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

Of the performances of the music of Bach and of Strauss and of the pieces themselves, so lately discussed in these columns, little need be said at this time. With each repetition the performance of the "Domestica" becomes freer, more spontaneous, more plastic. For Dr. Koussevitzky and his men the "Domestica" today is seemingly child's play. Yet that it is not, and never can be. The more remarkable then, is the feat that sets these complexities and difficulties so naturally before us. And again mention should be made of Dr. Koussevitzky's preoccupation with beauty of line, tone and texture in his reading of this astounding work. Last evening's audience, of which a considerable part was no doubt hearing this music for the first time, received it warmly.

With that Pierian spring of melody which is Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky, as it seemed, strove less and succeeded more completely than in days gone by. There was no attempt to dramatize or inflate. The music was played with straightforwardness and simplicity, with due allowance for its romantic content, but as has just been said, with no forcing of that particular note. Like the Concerto before it and the tone-poem after it, this Symphony last evening aroused the audience to warm applause.

Trav. Feb 20

Concerto Is Repeated by Symphony

Orchestra Also Gives "Unfinished" Work Not Heard This Season

For the fourth program of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky selected Bach's Bradenburg Concerto No. 3 in G minor for string orchestra, played at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts last week; Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B minor, the "Unfinished" symphony not heard this season; and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," performed during the all-Strauss programs on Feb. 9 and 10. An audience of good size assembled and gave every evidence of enthusiastic appreciation.

There are many so called music lovers today who find the "Domestic Symphony" of Strauss the least distinguished of his tone poems. They point out it is too long, requiring some 50 or more minutes and a huge orchestra for its performance, and too cluttered with the composer's errors.

These unfortunates obviously have not heard Dr. Koussevitzky's way with the "Domestica." And last evening he and the orchestra were in excellent form. His is the ability, his the means to take a Straussian score, readjust and refine it, pass lightly over the lesser pages, intensify the greater measures, and bring a warm and imaginative understanding to the whole in a manner not to be surpassed by any living conductor. In addition the men under him have well learned to follow his every gesture to the heights and the depths of a work. No wonder then the applause that drew a standing orchestra and a modestly bowing leader!

Earlier in the evening had come the familiarly sweet "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert and the Bach Bradenburg Concerto No. 3, remembered oftimes for its lack of a slow movement. Both were exceptionally interpreted, both obviously enjoyed by all present.

W. T. C., JR.

Evening of Strauss, Schubert and Bach

The fourth Monday Symphony program brought to Symphony Hall last evening the two movements of Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto, in G major, for string orchestra; the two movements of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony"; Strauss's "Domestic Symphony." Once again the orchestra played at full bent. Once again Dr. Koussevitzky wrought miracles, especially with Bach and with Strauss.

Where is there a music that for sheer strength equals this concerto of Bach? Without employing instruments of heavy tone, without the percussive means for achieving thrilling accentuation, Bach here with the simple use of strings arrives at a vitality which most of the moderns would theoretically have held impossible with those means, were not the example before their very eyes and ears. The simple motives whip and lash about, the repeated notes hammer their way into the consciousness with tremendous force, the whole spells strength, exuberant, limitless strength. It goes without saying that except through supreme interpretation such as Dr. Koussevitzky gave it last evening, such strength is not fully revealed—perhaps not even suspected.

Next the Schubert of the divine melodies. Often one has heard these melodies sing. As often they have warmed the heart. But seldom have they been so happily placed as on last evening's program—foil for the obstreperous insistences of Bach. Here then was program making of genius. Even as Strauss in the symphony which was to follow wrought his masculine and his feminine element, so Koussevitzky in this first half of the program had already introduced the highest type of masculinity with Bach, the loveliest femininity with Schubert. In loveliness these melodies sang their way, without sentimentality, without overdrawn effects, but also without undue restraints—just in the full naturalness of their complete expression.

Many times has Dr. Koussevitzky played Strauss's Domestic Symphony. Each repetition has brought fresh clarification or fresh intensification. Great as have been the interpretations of other years, not previously has one been able to trace with an equal clearness the several lines and motives and divisions of the symphony—the interplay of the man and wife themes (which are but reverse and obverse of each other), the expressive outlines of the child's theme (which is the true "second theme" of the symphony), the transitions separating, and yet fusing first theme section, second theme section, scherzo, slow division, fugue and coda. Each came and went in the fullness of its own individuality, each found its place in the ensemble of the whole. And as for the realisms? They are but trifles, the passing joke of the moment, neither more nor less. May not the good Viennese Bürger who is Richard Strauss have his occasional little joke if he will?

A. H. M.

MUSIC

Globe Feb 20

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

In assembling his program for the fourth concert of the Monday evening series, Dr Koussevitzky deviated from the usual custom of presenting favored gleanings from the Friday-Saturday concerts, and played Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—which, unless memory utterly fails, has not been heard this season.

On the contrary, having played the Bach G Major Brandenberg Concerto but last week, both performers and conductors found it still fresh beneath their finger-tips. The bluff good humor of the first movement, in particular, caused the orchestra to precipitate effects which were heavy and thick, where doubtless they intended rousing sonority. But it is music, like so much of Bach, that "plays itself"—a flaw must be very grave and very patent to do much harm: and, last night, there were no such. It was again grateful to note the skill Dr Koussevitzky brought to the direction of the last few measures of each of the two movements—the orchestra playing in unison (or octaves) after elaborate flights of polyphony might fall into an anti-climax, were it not for the tremendous emphasis the conductor bestows on these measures, keeping them at the same, or greater, intensity than that which has gone before.

The Schubert Symphony—which seems hardly ever to be heard dispassionately, but always accompanied by sentimental overtones induced by the popularly bestowed title—was a performance above reproach. But in short retrospect, one feels it was not quite felicitously placed between two works, both of which, in one way or another, are very complex. True, the Schubert may be a refreshing contrast both to the austerity of Bach and the emotional as well as technical maelstrom of Strauss, but at the same time it bears out the acknowledged fact that, in matters orchestral, Schubert's attainments were comparatively modest.

It was in the "Symphonia Domestica" that Dr Koussevitzky was at the top of his bent. Unlike Bach, Strauss is most definitely not music which rolls along under its own momentum. It needs a conductor like last night's—one who can instantly launch it into living motion, clarify and mold into comprehensible form long passages which verge on the wandering and obscure, give just the right touch of tender bravado to Strauss' proud, passionate themes, goad the orchestra through the long, tortuously built climaxes to the last towering pinnacles of sound.

113

The Classical Afternoon of Koussevitzky

ck to Greece with Gluck, Loeffler, Wolf, Goethe, For End, Brahms

WHAT with Gluck's overture to his opera of Agamemnon's daughter, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; with Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation" imagined out of Greek Myth and Greek minor poetry; with Hugo Wolf's setting for voice and orchestra of Goethe's monologue, "Prometheus," the first half of the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon presented a classical surface. In form and substance, however, Goethe's poem of man's rebellion against the worship and the rule of the high gods is romantic poetry conceived in a romantic time; while Wolf's musical vesture is no less romantical. Gluck's opera, in turn, was departure from and protest against the model for music-drama that had descended from classic tragedy.

It happened, then, that the newest piece of the three—Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," dated 1931—diffused more of the antique beauty and the antique measure than either the opera or the poem of the seventeen-seventies; much more than Wolf's Wagnerian music. Yet Mr. Loeffler's free form and manifold means, were intrinsically modern—of himself in this twentieth century. As preachy school-books used to say, so do we learn that, though classic themes may come down the ages, each whom they kindle proceeds according to his own impulses within the manner of his time. Perhaps for that reason ancient myth, legend, poetry have so far kept vitality century into century, period into period. In music only our deepest-dyed modernists have yet dispensed with them. Stravinsky himself turned back to the fate of Oedipus.

All of which is thought-spinning and word-spinning which give their pleasures, but which is not exactly report of the seventeenth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony on Feb. 23, 1934. To begin with, the substitution of Gluck's overture for the announced "Sinfonia" out of Handel's oratorio, "Solomon," need distress no one. Whether under rehearsal Dr. Koussevitzky found this preluding for the Queen of Sheba unsuited to present ears or out of accord with his program did not appear. Enough that the replacement deserves performance oftener than it receives it. In ten years, for example, this overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" had not been heard in Symphony Hall. True, pages here and pages there defer to the operatic conventions of the time. Since Gluck intended his piece for public performance in the theater, for exalted patronage and for subsistence, he could not altogether waive them. Far more, however, still contain a music pleasurable and stirring to hear, whether we listen to it as such or turn our imaginations backward to the sacrifice of Iphigenia to Diana by the black-browed kings windbound in Aulis. (Note again the persistent, potent Greek legend.)

Gluck's overture, moreover; has a curious kinship with the music of our own time. It is spare, direct and economical of means. Beside it Wagner sounds thick-bodied; Strauss is mammoth; Debussy too minutely wrought. Yet it engages our ears and touches our hearts. When we are stripping superfluous flesh from our music and bidding it speak a plain penetrating speech, we do but return to ancient models. More eighteenth-century, and less nineteenth-century, music is sympathetic to this decade of the twentieth. Besides our conductors and orchestras play them; in the playing release the grace or the poignance of which black notes on white paper are only symbols against devouring time.

On the other hand Wolf's musical vesture for Goethe's "Prometheus" was not a little disappointing. By common consent he was genius incarnate as composer of songs. As some assert, he was genius superlative in many of the piano-parts. There, rather than in the voice-parts, he declared and revealed himself. His symphonic pieces—the overture to the Amazons play of "Penthesilea" or the orchestral version of the "Italian Serenade" are not remarkable. Only in his opera, "Der Corregidor," is he using orchestral speech with something of his mastery and resource with the speech of the piano. And there again is the stimulating jointure to voices and to words.

The orchestral version of "Prometheus" seems thick and opaque—Wagnerian formulas and fashions, as the 'nineties absorb them, applied to the Wolfian purpose by none too expert or resourceful hand. Only a practised operatic conductor—and hardly he—could find openings through this integument for the singing voice. Often instruments or choir sounded blunt and turgid; whereas the piano in the original song pierces deep and instant. The Promethean fire, which was the young Wolf's as well as the young Goethe's, touches it. Within its limits, it is as alight with the superbities of defiant imagination as the poem itself. From voice and piano in their degree Wolf may also draw power and splendor. More than once the new medium proclaims and intensifies the word. The orchestral medium seemed rather to smother it. Nor should the singer, however inadequate, bear overmuch of the blame. To deliver "Prometheus" with the piano, and still more with the orchestra, requires the insight and sonorities of a Schorr. But it were unfair to reproach Mr. McClosky with failure at a task beyond his powers at which he labored earnestly.

For residue from the concert there remained, then, the beauty of Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation"—for it is nothing less—and the power outspringing from Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony of Brahms in E minor. . . . Few pieces, newly come from the composer's hand, better deserved the speedy repetition that "Evocation" now enjoyed. Mr. Loeffler has reached the age at which men who have given their life to an art or a profession cast about to see what creditable baggage they may leave behind them. When his eye lights upon "Pagan Poem," St. Francis's Canticle of the Sun and this "Evocation," he need have no repinings. Heard, moreover, with lively anticipation, it fell not a jot short of the first impression; as a second hearing should, corrected, enlarged and enriched it. There were moments, a year ago, when the listener questioned the addition of a chorus to Mr. Loeffler's means. Was not the orchestra better accomplishing his purpose? On Friday came solution to these doubts. The chorus, who are nymphs calling to Pan, should be heard as disembodied voices. The choir from The Cecilia—and it was in the vein—should be invisible. Then would its measures seem to fill the air above the orchestra; from distance calling; so have desirable and essential place in the scheme and facture of the tone-poem.

As it was, there was only to renew admiration for the range of Mr. Loeffler's expressive means; for the sensibility with which he chooses them; for the fine hand and the distinctive imagination with which he adapts them to his ends. Here "Evocation" is a music in which to the listening ear there is neither technical shortcoming nor technical flaw; to which the veriest pedant for structure and progress may not raise valid objection. For the form, the subject-matter and the course, the invention and the emotion, are of one body and one impression. From them, once the ferment of the beginning is stilled and the dark has brightened, emerges the antique beauty clear and serene, measured and chiselled, unalloyed, unlabored, touching every receiving sense, flowing deep into mind and spirit. And at the end there are calm and illumination and the passing of a vision. The whole is work of rarified imagination through a controlling mind. For the while such purpose and such accomplishment come seldom into music or any other of the expressive arts. It lays spell upon us who are privileged to know it. So far the end has crowned Mr. Loeffler's work.

Mr. Loeffler would leave behind him in "Evocation" a treasury of beauty. In his Fourth Symphony Brahms left behind him a monument of austerity, concision and power. Outside Sibelius there is not a familiar symphony in which so few notes are wasted. Labor as expansive conductors have been known to do, this Brahmsian compression resists them. At his briefest, and often at his gravest, he has spoken. Outside Sibelius again, there are few barer symphonies. Of purpose Brahms has stripped away harmonic richness and instrumental glamour. More than once the harmonies are deliberately archaic; the instrumental voices curt and dry. All this, as it seemed on Friday, not merely as self-expression, but as ways and means to power.

For as Dr. Koussevitzky would recreate the symphony in Brahms's image, the finale, variation into variation, is music of rugged and overwhelming strength. Only the unrelaxing stride saves the hearer from sense of oppression. Onward Brahms marches and we after him. . . . The scherzo wears a deceiving label, "Allegro giocoso." Yet in it there is neither fancy nor humor, only a wild, hard excitement which Dr. Koussevitzky rightly stresses. . . . For the slow movement tradition ordains discourse about ballad-form and ballad-nature; while in it, according to the new gospelling about Brahms we are to find "lyric quality." We are listening, rather, to a bare, acrid, desolate music—the old age of Brahms—that yet strikes home. Even the song of the violoncellos is wan. . . . And what is the first movement but a restless striving and grasping toward the power that is to come? There is room enough for the lyric and the romantic Brahms in the first, second and third symphonies; next to none in the fourth. Dr. Koussevitzky does well to project it unsparingly. H. T. P.

24, 1934 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in E minor, given a puissant reading by Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved the summit of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. This was true both of the work itself and of its performance, though every other item on the program was, for one reason or another, distinguished, and all were excellently played.

At the last minute Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was substituted for the announced Sinfonia from Handel's oratorio "Solomon." The "Prometheus" of Hugo Wolf, a setting for orchestra and baritone of verses by Goethe, received a first performance in Symphony Hall, with David Blair McClosky as soloist. The remaining number was Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation," based upon a text in T. W. Mackaill's "Epigrams of the Greek Anthology," in which the measures for women's voices were taken by the chorus of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Mr McClosky intoned the fascinating lines of the Singing Stone.

How there can be any remaining vestige of the once fashionable complaint that Brahms' music is "harsh," "dull" and "labored" is beyond understanding, especially after one of Dr Koussevitzkys moving interpretations. The chances are, however, that Johannes may rest untroubled, now that the passing of 40 years has vitiated the novelty and the strangeness which engendered these complaints.

While yesterday's performance was emotionally overwhelming, there were certain fluctuations of tempo in the mighty fourth movement which those disposed to be purists might reasonably question. But in this sadly imperfect world, what does it matter so long as the composer's utterance is not distorted out of style and taste?

Hugo Wolf wrote his setting of "Prometheus" in 1889, barely two months before he passed his 29th birthday. A year later he transcribed this setting for the orchestra. Above a tumultuous orchestra the solo voice lifts Prometheus' fearless reproach to Zeus and the gods. Wolf mirrored in his music the febrile emotion revealed in Goethe's poetic account of Prometheus' defiance, which led to the Titan's bondage upon the mountain. The style is not only reminiscent but strongly suggestive of Richard Wagner. Yet not a superfluous measure is present; at the very beginning Wolf, with his genius for succinct expression, set the general mood, and following Prometheus' final words of scorn, concluded the work simply with but two marvelously apt staccato chords. Mr McClosky was favorably received. His voice, however, is insufficient in strength to cope successfully with the taxing solo part.

Mr Loeffler appeared on the stage and received what amounted to phenomenal applause for a Friday afternoon audience, at the conclusion of his exquisitely scored "Evocation." This composer of an elder generation has long been justly admired for the aristocratic dignity and taste of his music, and for his polished craftsmanship. Yet repetition of "Evocation" almost a year after its first performance in Boston helped to clarify an impression that he is, as well, uncommonly adventurous in utilizing instruments alien to the conventional symphonic orchestra, and in devising new orchestral "effects." The beauty of instrumentation, of melody and harmony in "Evocation," together with its creation of delicate, "other-worldly" moods, compensates for the depth it lacks.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. On March 9 and 10, the Second Symphony of Gliere; Mozart's E-flat major Symphony, and Prof E. B. Hill's Concertino for Piano will be heard. C. W. D.

TURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1934 Herald

an Film Debut in 'Nan

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Gluck, Overture to "Iphegenia in Aulis"; Loeffler, "Evocation," for Orchestra with Chorus of Women's Voices and a Speaking Voice; Hugo Wolf, "Prometheus" (poem by Goethe) for Baritone and Orchestra (first time at these concerts); Brahms Symphony in E minor, No. 4. Soloist, David Blair McClosky; Chorus from Cecilia Society Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

Tragic finales are extremely rare in classical symphonies. In the realm of drama, a tragedy with a happy ending would weaken and would tend to falsify. This is not the case in music of the sonata forms, for here the first movement can explain its tragedy from beginning to end and allow the following movements to give refreshing reactions from it. Brahms's own critics who failed to penetrate beneath the surface, saw in the finale to his E minor symphony—eloquently played at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony—nothing more than scholastic display. The last movement is a passacaglia, a set of variations on a theme consisting of a single 8-bar phrase. The means chosen results in no lessening of dramatic activity. In fact, the tragic aspect of this symphony seems to increase, from the first movement, with a placid beginning of underlying passion, through the ballad qualities (almost hidden under a pastorale setting) of the second movement, then through the third with its great energy and combination of features of sonata-form and rondo style. The variations of the final movement, with their great contrasts, bring the end to an almost catastrophic climax. The Koussevitzky reading stresses the lyric element, but it is this emphasizing of lyric beauty which brings, except in the finale, the more dramatic qualities into stronger relief.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" was described in full in these columns by a pen much more subtle than ours on the occasion of its first performance in Boston last year. We shall endeavor to give no more than our impressions on hearing it a second time, after an interval of ten months. Last year it was heard to less advantage than yesterday, for it was then followed by Walton's effective "Belshazzar's Feast," which is the antithesis of Loeffler's latest work. We think it would be best heard before the intermission, with nothing immediate to destroy the impression of its own peculiar loveliness.

Loeffler's "Evocation" is by no means the work of an ageing composer. It is a remarkable example of subtle and sensitive writing; an example of the power of quality, as opposed to the commonplace results obtained by so many composers today on a quantity basis. And is the Loeffler work lacking in vitality? Not a bit of it! Here is new proof that it is the treatment of material—vocal or instrumental—that wins the day. In Loeffler's handling of his resources, no detail is lost. From the beginning of the fugue, a fine example of a contrapuntal device used for non-academic purposes, there is an evocation of rare beauty, justly befitting the building of a temple to the Muses visualized by the composer. Mr. McClosky's voice, as the vocal identity of the Singing Stone, came through clearly on every syllable.

"Evocation" was written by Mr. Loeffler for the dedication of Severance Hall, the home of the Cleveland orchestra. He has given us of his best and spoken at times in a new manner. The piece bears throughout the mark of great distinction. Yesterday's audience gave Mr. Loeffler warm and hearty evidence of its admiration and affection for him. Orchestra and chorus expressed the Loeffler music in a way to make one grateful for the sympathy and insight of the presentation.

It is a good thing that Hugo Wolf's reputation had not to be made yesterday. His orchestral setting of his "Prometheus," for baritone and orchestra, fell rather flat. One cannot say that his treatment of the orchestra is as feeble as Chopin's few attempts, yet in his "Prometheus" he shows himself the victim of a misunderstanding of Wagner's orchestral ideals. He has apparently gathered to himself all the mis-applications of that master's style. The orchestra part is incredibly thick and noisy and, being noisy, it is not strong. It is unfair to expect a single voice to pierce such texture. Mr. McClosky sang to a decided disadvantage. Despite valiant effort there was almost no effect gained. Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniments are of rare quality. He was right in considering Wolf's orchestral speech more than a characterless background for the voice, but not to the extent of giving Mr. McClosky so little consideration. Too often he simply could not be heard. This "Prometheus" is no tribute to the unique genius of Hugo Wolf. Yesterday's performance was the first of these concerts. The composer's admirers can only hope to leave this version unperformed.

Gluck's overture to "Iphegenia in Aulis" opened the program.

There has been much comment on the supremely beautiful performance of Schubert's "Unfinished" under Dr. Koussevitzky at last Monday's concert. Would it not be welcome at one of the regular concerts? And are the audiences that attend the Beethoven Cycle to be the only ones to hear the Ninth Symphony?

The next regular program will be given March 9 and will include Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, and Gliere's Second Symphony. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist.

-24

ON POST, SATURDA

SYMPHONY ASSISTED BY VOICES

Loeffler's "Evocation" With Women's Chorus Heard

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A high seriousness pervaded the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, which began with Gluck's Overture to his opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," ended with Brahms' Fourth Symphony, and included also Wolf's "Prometheus" for baritone and orchestra.

LOEFFLER'S "EVOCATION"

The relief from this prevailing severity of mood came in the Allegro giocoso from Brahms' otherwise uncompromising Symphony in E minor and in Loeffler's "Evocation." The last named piece, for orchestra, women's chorus and a speaking voice, written for the dedication three years ago of Severance Hall, home of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, was heard here for the first time last season. The Greek background of this music made it quite in place yesterday between the Overture to "Iphigenia," substituted at the 11th hour for an excerpt from Handel's "Solomon," and Wolf's setting of Goethe's poem.

Also was this "Evocation" good to hear again on its own account. This music has both warmth and serenity; its melodies have a gracious contour. The instrumentation, with its striking use of vibraphone and saxophones, is uncommonly rich and lustrous. As are the pigments on his palette to a painter, so are the timbres of the orchestra to Mr. Loeffler, who assorts and blends them with an exceeding fastidiousness. And Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra yesterday yielded him each last refinement of tone.

Chorus and Soloist

The women's chorus yesterday came, as before, from the Cecilia Society and had been trained by Arthur Fiedler. David Blair McClosky, who was the soloist in the song of Wolf, was here the speaker. After the performance Mr. Loeffler was escorted to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, and was several times returned there by an applauding audience.

Wolf's "Prometheus" has not previously been heard here with the orchestral accompaniment that the composer added as an afterthought. The voice part in this musical monologue is declamatory rather than songful, the instrumental background vehement and protesting. It is easy to prefer Wolf in more lyric vein, nor was Mr. McClosky's portion an altogether grateful one. At the outset composer, conductor and poet seemed to conspire against him and his voice pierced the orchestral tone only with difficulty.

Received Cordially

In certain later and gentler measures his task was more rewarding, but in no depreciation it may be said that this excellent baritone has often appeared here to better advantage. Yesterday's audience received him cordially.

The performance of Gluck's Overture and of Brahms' Symphony was wholly in keeping with the heightened and exalted speech of both composers. The applause at the end of the Symphony testified to the present popularity of even the austerer Brahms.

34 Trav Feb 24

ew Play

4th Symphony by Brahms Is Played

The fourth symphony of Johannes Brahms, as interpreted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, dominated the 17th regular program of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon although works of three other composers, including one living and present, shared place with in in the concert.

Fully assembled, the program comprised the symphony, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," replacing the originally scheduled Sinfonia from Handel's Oratorio "Solomon," Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra with chorus of women's voices and a speaking voice, and the first performance at these concerts of Wolf's "Prometheus," for baritone with orchestra. The soloist was David Blair McClosky. The chorus was from the Cecilia Society and had been trained by Arthur Fiedler.

For these many years Bostonians have learned to know Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Brahms fourth symphony in E minor until now no other fashioning will suit them. In this, the last of the composer's symphonies, there is to be found both mastery of structure and emotional intenseness. With the melodious andante, the conductor brings out lights and shadows and colorings that pass unnoticed when other orchestras and other leaders have the work to hand; with the finale, the allegro movement, he builds swiftly, sharply, until he achieves a musical summit. There is reason enough, therefore, for the enthusiasm with which this work is always greeted, an appreciation that was in no wav lacking yesterday.

Earlier in the afternoon came Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation," first performed by the Boston symphony slightly less than a year ago with the same chorus and soloist taking vocal part. Another hearing brought forth new evidence of the grace and loveliness, the exquisite taste and subtle instrumentation of this work, composed for the dedication of Severance Hall, home of the Cleveland Symphony orchestra. The vibra-harp's sounding of the "Singing Stone" theme again gave great pleasure.

It might indeed be well for some of the so-called modernists to take time off from their labors and spend a few moments in consideration of this Loeffler comwposition. In it there is beauty and the expression of clear musical thought. In it also a full modern orchestra is used. Yet originality is obtained without the use of fantastic instrumentation, polyphony, or atonality. To not a few of the "advanced" schools that would be considered nearly an impossibility.

The venerable Mr. Loeffler was in the audience yesterday and went out upon the stage many times in acknowledgement of prolonged applause alike received from audience, orchestra, conductor and chorus.

The first playing at the symphony concerts, of Wolf's setting for voice and orchestra of Gothe's poem "Prometheus," though excellently accomplished by the orchestra, received little enough applause. The singer, whose part was generally an unrewarding one, did the best he could.

The first number on the program, Gluck's overture to his opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," or if you prefer "Iphigenie en Aulide," had not been hear din Symphony hall for some ten years. It was delightful music and was especially interesting because it was the overture to one of Gluck's five or more operas that virtually changed the then customary style in opera. The opera was first given in Paris in 1774, when the composer was 60, and almost immediately led to the hotly waged and now well-known contest between operatic reformers, headde by Gluck, and those who favored the existing form. Gluck was victorious.

There will be no regular pair of concerts next week for the orchestra will be in Northampton, New Haven, New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair will be given March 9 and 10.

W. T. C., Jr.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

FEB 25 1934

Roy Harris, Oklahoman, Is Composer

His Orchestral Work Was Played by Boston Symphony

WHEN the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the fourteenth program of its fifty-third season late in January one of its programmed symphonies was "Symphony: 1933" by Roy Harris of Oklahoma. With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, this was the first performance of the Harris work.

Harris, according to the program notes, now lives in Los Angeles, Cal., but was born, in 1898, in Lincoln county, Oklahoma. He left Oklahoma at the age of 5, so can hardly be called an Oklahoman except by nativity. He has written several orchestral works but is most interested in chamber music and his compositions in that field have had more frequent performances.

The critics who wrote the program notes say that his music is of "unmistakable directness," and, speaking of Harris' habit of explaining himself and his aims as related to his music, they believe that his compositions will survive their verbal defenses. They say also:

"A certain independence, an earnest, arresting quality in the music of Roy Harris has made him one of the most performed of American composers in the last few years, and the additional fact that he is an Oklahoman, of 'Cimarron' origin has made him one of the most described."

The symphony of his performed by the Boston orchestra was divided into three movements: Allegro, Andante, Maestoso.

Brooklyn Times Union

FEB 25 1934

Boston Symphony Concert At Academy of Music Next Friday Evening

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a work beloved of all symphony concert audiences in the fourth of the series of five concerts of this the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The symphony scheduled for performance next Friday night is Schubert's famous Symphony in B minor, better known as the "Unfinished Symphony."

Boxes will be occupied by members of the Brooklyn Junior League and their escorts, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes, the Woodward School and the Packer Collegiate Institute. Through the Junior League Committee, of which Mrs. Charles Franklin is chairman, the Junior League of Brooklyn is taking a special interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this year. Serving on the Junior League Committee, organized for the first time this year, are: Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

Committee of members of the sponsoring committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, will receive in the foyer of the opera house preceding the performance.

The program for the performance on Friday night includes works by Bach, Schubert, Debussy and Scriabin as follows: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, Bach; Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"), Schubert; Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes, Debussy; "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Scriabin.

Among the members of the Sponsoring Committee who will receive on Friday evening are: Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Lay, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Director Charles D. Atkins of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences; Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Dr. and Mrs. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. John D. H. Schulz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott and Mrs. Harris M. Crist.

* * *

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

B 25 1934

Boston Symphony Concert News

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a work beloved of all symphony audiences in the fourth of a series of five concerts of this, the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening. The symphony scheduled for performance next Friday night is Schubert's famous Symphony in B minor, better known as the "Unfinished Symphony."

Boxes will be occupied by members of the Brooklyn Junior League and their escorts, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith; Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes, the Woodward School and the Packer Collegiate Institute. Through the Junior League Committee, of which Mrs. Charles Franklin is chairman, the Junior League of Brooklyn is taking a special interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this year. Serving on the Junior League Committee, organized for the first time this year, are Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, will receive in the foyer of the opera house preceding the performance.

The program for the performance on Friday night includes works by Bach, Schubert, Debussy and Scriabin.

Among the members of the sponsoring committee, who will receive on Friday evening, are Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Lay, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Director Charles D. Atkins of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts ond Sciences, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Dr. and Mrs. Joshua M. VanCott, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. John D. H. Schulz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott and Mrs. Harris M. Crist.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 25 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will pay its fourth New York visit of the season this week, when, in addition to the regular subscription performances Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, there will be an extra Brooklyn program Wednesday night in Olin Downes's "Enjoyment of Music" series.

On Thursday night Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance here of the second symphony, Op. 18, by the Russian-American composer Nicolai Berezowsky, which was first played in Boston February 16 and 17. Completed last April, it is still in manuscript; the score is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer submitted the following note for the orchestra's program books:

"The Symphony No. 2 is not descriptive music in the literary sense. It is written in orthodox symphonic form with some modifications. The work consists of four movements and has no designation of key.

"The first movement—Allegro, ma non tanto—is marked 5-8 at the opening and changes in the process of the development of the first and second themes. The second theme is not repeated in conventional manner but reappears in the coda. The general mood of the first movement is lyric.

"The second movement—Scherzo-Allegro giocoso—is marked 2-4. It starts in lively fashion and retains the same character throughout with rhythmical variations. The trio of the scherzo is scored for woodwinds and brass only and is marked 3-8, 2-8.

"The third movement—Largo assai—begins in a very plaintive and tranquil manner and gradually rises to a more passionate mood and then ends quietly. In this movement the main theme from the first movement appears for a brief moment.

"The fourth movement—Allegro con brio (a la breve)—opens with a canon in four voices in a somewhat gay folk manner which is made a foundation for the whole movement. Fragmentary themes appear and reappear in lively fashion. The main theme from the first movement appears, but quickly fades away and gives place to a new theme in the long crescendo of the finale."

(Continued from page eight)

According to Mr. John N. Burke's program note, Mr. Berezowsky, who was born in Leningrad in 1900, showed a striking talent as a child, and entered the Imperial Chapel at Leningrad to study with M. G. Klimov when eight years old. In 1918 he became a professor at the conservatory and concertmaster of the opera at Saratoff. He joined the Moscow Opera Orchestra in 1921, went to Vienna for further study under Robert Pollack, and came here in 1922. At the Juilliard School he studied the [redacted] the late Paul Kochanski and composition with Rubin Goldmark. In 1923 he joined the Philharmonic as leading violin, retiring from orchestral work a few years later to devote himself to composition.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist in the Sibelius violin concerto; Bach's third Brandenburg concerto and Ravel's "La Valse" complete the program.

Leonard Shure, a young pianist who has won warm encomiums from Boston critics, will be the soloist Saturday afternoon in the D minor concerto of Brahms. The other major number is Strauss's Domestic Symphony.

The Brooklyn program for Wednesday, in Mr. Downes's series, includes the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" suite and Sibelius's second symphony. On Friday Mr. Koussevitzky will offer the Brandenburg concerto, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 25 1934

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is [redacted] itself indelibly in New Haven's history of music by the notable program announced for the second concert on Tuesday evening. Dr. Koussevitsky is noted for his abilities as programmaker; however, this time he has not only assembled a notable group of works, but selected those which should find especial welcome in this city. The Symphony No. 1 is generally considered Brahms' greatest; it certainly affords a moving experience for the listener. Only an orchestra of the highset rank, and a conductor with a fine interpretative sense dares to perform it.

Dr. Koussevitsky will be henceforth appreciated for his particular zeal in the championship of the works of Sibelius. His missionary labors are continuous; but last season he played the composer's eight symphonies in Boston, favored us with the melodic Second as an opening wedge at the previous concert here. Now he comes with the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, another early work, to show us more in the hope that we will become interested enough to invite succeeding works from his baton and encourage repetitions from our own orchestra. Mr. Richard Burgin is especially able as soloist having played the work twice under the direction of the composer, and in three series in Boston. Through the introduction of a new work we are given to hear an able violinist, retaining youth, yet possessing respectable maturity; with interpretative fire, tempered by a keen judgment.

As pointed out in these columns last Autumn, Jan Sibelius visited New Haven several years ago and received an honorary degree from Yale University; he also conducted certain of his works at the Litchfield Festival.

The Stravinsky is already a contemporary classic; more sincere than his later works, we may welcome the "Petrouchka" Suite as a pageant of color, accompaniment to the most successful of modern ballets.

* * *

The casual announcement "first concert" must be put away for another year; this week will mark the last event in two of the season's most important series. The Boston Symphony Orchestra visits us but twice, yet remains a memorable part of the Winter's music. The other "last concert" will be that of Mr. Bruce Simonds, who completes the cycle of 32 Beethoven piano sonatas in eight recitals. His success has been beyond the fondest expectations of even his most ardent admirers, and the lack of ostentation with which he has fulfilled every engagement has won him an host of new friends. Mr. Simonds has but sought his own in another's good; the consciousness with which audiences have prepared themselves for the performance of each of the works is adequate testimony of the respect which they have for his art, as well as a compliment to the interpretative abilities which have placed him in the front rank of American pianists.

One might well write volumes of appreciation, setting down the salient points of each sonata as it impressed the listener, but it is better to leave the indivadual to reflect on his own increased understanding of these, the greatest works in the literature of the piano, and on the enlarged musical culture which is our reward for intelligent following of Mr. Simond's sensitive leadership. To the academic world of which he is a part, this opportunity has been an unsurpassed privilege; no university in the country can call from its professorial roll a musician of solid scholarship combined with such practical abilities. The fingers of the mind point to far-flung centers of the country where the seed of a higher musical culture will be henceforth planted. Withal, the whole effort has been carried through without the numbing effect of the academic; a definite sense of pleasantness has resulted from every sonata, even the usually trying Opus 106.

The lavish attentions of the audience, sincere as they may be, will be insufficient to express the very real gratitude which this generation of music lovers will feel when they review the cultural history of New Haven and read that "in the season 1933-34 Bruce Simonds played eight recitals of the Beethoven Piano Sonatas."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

28 1934

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" At Fourth Borough Concert Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the fourth in a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening at 8:15. The program will include Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony."

Boxes will be occupied by members of the Brooklyn Junior League and their escorts, the Adelphi Alumni Association, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes, the Woodward School and the Packer Collegiate Institute.

Mrs. Charles Franklin is chairman of the Junior League's committee for the Boston Symphony concerts here. Also serving on the committee, organized for the first time this year, are: Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, will receive in the foyer of the opera house preceding the program. In the group will be: Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Lay, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Charles D. Atkins, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Dr. and Mrs. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. John D. H. Schulz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Charles T. McDermott, Mrs. Harris M. Crist.

En Voyage Again

Weather to the contrary notwithstanding, the Symphony Orchestra departs this afternoon on a six days' journey to other cities. This evening it will be heard at Smith College in Northampton; tomorrow evening at Yale College in New Haven; on Wednesday at an extra concert in Brooklyn, on Friday in the regular concert there; on Thursday and Saturday in usual course in New York. In Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky's first program assembles Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto; Mr. Berezovsky's new symphony; Sibelius's violin-concerto with Mr. Burgin; Ravel's "The Waltz." The second traverses the overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding." Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Brahms's piano-concerto in D minor, with Mr. Shure. In New Haven as well as in New York, Sibelius's violin-concerto has place. Both the college towns will hear a symphony of Brahms—Northampton the fourth; New Haven the first.

Incidents and Prospects

At the Symphony Concerts of March 16 and 17, Mr. Menuhin, playing with the orchestra for the first times, will be heard in Beethoven's concerto and in the lately published concerto that Mozart in very young years wrote for a French princess, Hindemith, it seems, has contributed two cadenzas.

Doubtless so zealous a conductor for anniversaries as Dr. Koussevitzky has remembered the centenary of the birth of Borodin which falls next May. For some years the Tartar dances in his opera, "Prince Igor," have dropped out of the active repertory at Symphony Hall. Next spring or next fall revival might be in order.

By report of the New York Times, Sibelius, listening at Helsingfors to a performance of his Fourth Symphony by the resident orchestra under the American, Werner Janssen, then and there declared him the "most gifted interpreter, probably" of his music.

H. T. P.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

FEB 27 1934

BOSTON ARTISTS APPEAR WITHOUT KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor Absent Because of Illness; Richard Burgin Proves Ability with Spirited Performance.

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 26 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its annual visit to Northampton tonight, arriving on time and in full force in spite of the record breaking snowstorm. Its illustrious conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, however, was unable to appear on account of illness. It was announced from the stage that in the 10 years during which Mr. Koussevitsky has been director of the orchestra he has conducted about 1000 concerts and that this was only the second occasion on which he has not appeared as scheduled.

Dr. Koussevitsky's absence was no doubt a big disappointment for most of those in the good-sized audience which had gathered in John M. Greene Hall, but there still remained the fact of the orchestra itself and an unusually interesting and well contrasted program. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, substituted for Dr. Koussevitsky and proved his ability to conduct with no little authority so that the orchestra was able to give a spirited and at times eloquent performance.

The program opened with the Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Scene by Thomas Tallis" which is scored for strings alone. This is a composition of austere beauty and depressive sonority in which the fine string section of the orchestra gave a splendid account of itself. In violent contrast to the ecclesiastical atmosphere of this piece was the hectic emotionalism of Scriabin's "Poeme de L'Extase" which came next on the program. While this is in many ways a remarkable and significant work, its weaknesses become glaringly apparent in the hands of anyone but an interpretative virtuoso. Dr. Koussevitsky is apparently very fond of it, judging by the number of performances he has given it, and it was in this number more than anything on the program. that Koussevitsky's absence was felt.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony which formed the second half of the program is music which will speak for itself, if given a chance, and it may be said that Mr. Burgin gave it a very good chance. Possibly the performance gained also by coming after the inarticulate emotionalism of Scriabin. In any event the audience seemed to relish it greatly and Mr. Burgin and the orchestra were applauded with real enthusiasm at its close.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 27 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN INTERESTING CONCERT

Richard Burgin, Concertmaster, Conducts, Due to Illness of Koussevitsky

Yesterday many patrons of the Smith College Concert Course were no doubt wondering whether the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra could possibly take place or whether they could get there to hear it if it did. But, as events proved, the almost unprecedented snowfall was not able to keep this famous group of musicians and a large proportion of their local admirers from getting together. The audience, however, did have a big disappointment to sustain due to the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and his subsequent inability to appear as conductor. But, in view of Mr. Koussevitsky's unusual record in the matter of keeping his engagements, it was not difficult for the audience to forgive him. It was announced from the stage that only once before during his ten years' association with the orchestra had he failed to appear as scheduled.

The audience was therefore reconciled to what proved to be a quite satisfactory performance of a very interesting program under the direction of Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin has a sure and energetic beat which enabled the orchestra to give a good account of itself in music with which it has no doubt long been familiar.

The opening number was the "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" by Vaughan Williams! We know of no piece scored for string orchestra alone which makes more brilliant and ear-satisfying use of the string quality than this one. One found oneself listening to the sound in itself as one sometimes listens to the great mass of sound produced by a cathedral organ. Only this was an idealized organ with an undreamed of perfection of sound. The alternation of the full mass of the orchestral body with smaller groups and with solo instruments gives the piece of welcome variety of tonal color.

From the church-like mood of this Fantasia to the frenetic yearnings and orgiastic exstasies of Scriabin is almost too great a jump. One listener at least could not help feeling that the "Poeme de l'Extase" suffered by too close proximity to the stately and reserved measures of the Vaughan Williams piece. The two compositions are interesting as examples of two modern attitudes toward religion as well as toward the evolution of art. The first is an attempt to recapture the past by using old ideas and making them attractive for contemporary ears and minds by clothing them in modern dress. The second is the attempt to make a religion of art—to reach an "ultimate emotion" which will take the place of a religious ritual. As events are proving, both attempts are bound ultimately to fail because in neither case does the material with which the artist is working have any vital connection with our real, every-day selves, and therefore a truly contemporary music has yet to appear in any clear and unmistakable form.

The second half of the program was devoted to the monumental Fourth Symphony of Brahms. While this will probably never be so popular as the composer's first or second symphonies, audiences are beginning to see the significance of its granitic structure and to delight in the moments of pure lyric beauty which are scattered through it, such as the flute solo in the last movement. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra gave a lively performance of this work and were the recipients of lavish and spirited applause at its conclusion.

J. D.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

FEB 28 1934

Musical Moments

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Since obstacles long ago became a mere bagatelle in its noted career, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, made its second scheduled appearance in Woolsey hall last night, in spite of our old-fashioned winter weather. There were not many gaps in the usually crowded house, though doubtless many in the audience could give interesting accounts of their adventures in arriving on time. Their efforts were more than rewarded with a great performance by the orchestra.

In many respects, the concert was excellent. The program was particularly attractive in presenting three composers of major importance. The music was of special significance since the works performed were the Petrouchka Ballet suite of Stravinsky, the Sibelius violin concerto, and the Brahms First Sym phony. Finally, the quality of the orchestra's performance was of that first magnitude one expects from such an organization as the Boston Symphony.

It was a cleverly arranged program with the Stravinsky placed first. One progressed from this music which to many is still novel, to the more easily comprehended Sibelius, and finally to the substantial music of Brahms. Anything after the Brahms would have been in the nature of an anti-climax. Yet, on first glance, it appeared somewhat strange to see Petrouchka at the head of the list.

If one ever wanted to create the effect of an orchestra as an automaton then Stravinsky did exceedingly well. It was natural for him to do so because of his mastery of orchestration. But the ballet is more than just artificial and mechanized music, it is a canvas of many gorgeous, bright colors daubed on generously with striking rhythmical flourishes. All these glittered in the resplendent performance of the orchestra.

One might write at length of the beauties lurking in the Sibelius concerto, were there time, for there is more in the music than the rhapsodic character of the first movement, the contemplative appeal of the second, and the aggressively rhythmic vitality of the last. Such music as that of Sibelius is not readily grasped on a first or even several hearings. It is music that gains stature and approval on long acquaintance. One senses its universal appeal, its impersonal emotion, but does not perhaps appreciate its greatness. The concerto is especially interesting for its long solo part, replete with "impossible" difficulties. Richard Burgin, concert-master of the Boston Symphony, knows this concerto well, both technically and musically. He gave a remarkable performance of it—one that revealed a true understanding behind his virtuosity.

The performance of the Brahms literally swept the audience off its feet in the surge of power and sense of triumph that Dr. Koussevitsky brought out in so stirring a fashion. Rightly has this symphony been called the Tenth, after Beethoven's Ninth, and in spite of a shift of allegiance, on the part of many, to Brahm's Fourth, this work still towers above them all. It created a lasting impression with last night's audience.

As it has on numerous occasions, this concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to a close the Woolsey Hall Concert Series for the season. To summarize the series briefly is to state that in the five years of Mr. Lee's management, this series stands out as the best. It deserves this classification both for its success as a series of six well-balanced musical events, and for the general high level of the performance realized in each concert. One may say with little hesitation that the outstanding recitals were those of Kreisler and Lotte Lehmann, and that the two appearances of the Boston Smyphony Orchestra contributed much to the character of the series. It will be difficult to surpass this record.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 28 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS WOOLSEY SERIES TO CLOSE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came again last evening in the final concert of the Woolsey Hall Series. It was the sort of concert which fosters the musical understanding of the individual by affording a hearing of three numbers of markedly differing qualities.

The "Petrouchka" Suite can hardly be called music of the future, but it does mark the entering wedge to modernism for many who are not especial followers of contemporary movements. Dr. Koussevitsky directed a performance which pointed up the mild dissonances and exploited the narrative passages such as "The Rear and the Peasant Playing a Hand Organ" and "The Dance of the Coachman and Grooms." This is early Stravinsky, composed in 1911, and is tame enough when compared with the succeeding "Rite of the Spring." Here the composer shows his derivation of certain effects from Richard Strauss; the figure in the second section being strongly suggestive of "Til Eulenspiegel." Those in the know, seem to be of the opinion that the early Stravinsky is the best; at least those numbers persist in the repertory of every major orchestra.

There were but six years between the time of the "Petrouchka" and the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Jan Sibelius, composed in 1905, and since revised. Yet in spite of the dissimlarity of form, the styles are of different generations. Sibelius belongs to the era of Brahms; his roots are firm in the school of the late romanticists, although without a suggestion of the less complimentary associations of that word. The breezes of the north country keep his music from drooping; there is directness of approach, and entire economy of statement. The mellowness of a rich culture gives his music a depth of purpose worthy of inclusion among the great compositins of the world.

Mr. Richard Burgin, known to us as able concertmaster, gave an adequate performance of the work. To say that he fulfilled all the possibilities of the score would not be quite the case. His tone is very beautiful, but it is not large, and he did not force it. The intonation was at several important moments only approximate. However, Mr. Burgin's accomplished musicianship was at all times evident; the work is extremely difficult and the requirements in other respects considerable. The Sidelius was undoubtedly a success and that was probably foremost in Mr. Burgin's mind.

Most enlightening to the listener was the care with which Mr. Koussevitsky accompanied the concerto. The finest of pianissimo pasages served as background, such delicate shadings as only this orchestra can discover.

After the modern ballet, and the unfamiliar concerto, one settled down in the consciousness of having done the intelligent thing to enjoy the beloved First Symphony of Brahms. Dr. Koussevitsky treated it as a work of the utmost grandeur and sought devotedly to set forth each inner voice as it became particularly expressive. The carefully tuned phrases in each part were matched with beauty of tone, Mr. Gillet having the greatest opportunities with the oboe. This symphony has been jokingly called the "Beethoven Tenth" on account of the similarity in form to the last movement of the Ninth. The first section was played with deliberation; Dr. Koussevitsky did not mistake the movement for the "Ride of the Valkyries"; it was no vehicle for him to operate on the road to great applause. The first section is a gradual accumulation of strength and substance for the chorale which enters firmly with a sweep ever mounting upward; it is like a confession of faith, an exposition of the substance of things hoped for.

In contradistinction to the interpretation of many other conductors each component part was set forth to shine on its own account, not sacrificed to the building up of certain great effects here and there; inner voices never heard before rose and fell in its progress.

The capacity audience recalled the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitsky with a generosity which seems to be new born in our midst. And so another satisfying and successful concert series has passed into New Haven history. Two thousand subscribers hope they may see its like again.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

MAR 1 - 1934

Music

Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a memorable concert at the Academy of Music. The event, outside the regular subscription series, was the 11th in the course of 15 lecture-recitals on "The Enjoyment of Music" conducted by Olin Downes under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The program last night was devoted to familiar works of contemporaneous composers, though it was by no means confined to any one style of writing, modernistic of otherwise. There was indeed almost as much variety as though the list had ranged through the symphonic literature of three centuries. The first item was the familiar but ever-welcome Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for double-stringed orchestra, by the English composer, Vaughan Williams. Based on one of eight liturgical airs written by Tallis in 1756, the work, as a result of a skillful utilization of the original material, has retained to an astonishing degree the archaic, mysterious and medieval quality characteristic of pre-Elizabethan church music. The orchestra played it with ravishing beauty and sensitivity.

In piquant contrast was the piece which came next on the list, the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka." The bizarre music, with its wit, irony, satire and, as Mr. Downes pointed out, its occasional evocation of pity for the grotesque hero of the tale, was completely realized, to the enchantment of the big audience, which thundered its applause.

Mr. Downes discoursed with special sympathy and enthusiasm on the final work performed, the Second Symphony in D major of Sibelius. What he termed its Nordic sternness, virility and majesty reminiscent of the Northern sagas of old were proclaimed with thrilling effect by the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is said to be waiting with impatience for the Eighth Symphony of Sibelius now in process of composition. In the meantime he gives us superlatively fine repetitions of those which at last are becoming universally recognized as works of unique power and individuality.

R. E. B.

Orchestral Funding Transcript

These are the days in which the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra are seeking the annual subscriptions to the fund that meets the annual deficit. Timely from a correspondent, who is one of those faithful subscribers, comes a suggestion for increasing the endowment of the orchestra as source of yearly income. "The orchestra," says his letter, "now has an endowment fund totalling roughly $360,000. Three other memorial funds of like nature stand at approximately $85,000. A handsome and serviceable beginning. But why could not the orchestra enlarge these figures, as it already does its pension fund, by the relatively simple expedient of giving a concert?

"I realize that neither human strength nor complicated existing schedules are endlessly elastic. The idea of a single concert for the benefit of the endowment fund, however, is appealing. Suppose it were given each year in mid-season. Suppose that by design it were made an outstanding event both musically and socially. If it became a truly community enterprise in which one and all sought to cooperate to full extent, there might conceivably be little difficulty in clearing, say, $5000 a season. If such a sum were invested annually and the interest compounded for only ten years, the orchestra would be in possession of an addition to the general fund amounting to nearly $75,000. At ordinary rates of interest the annual income would approximate $4000 a year.

"But this tidy sum—scarcely large enough in itself to lower materially the usual deficit—might easily serve as a starting point. Many persons of large or moderate means might, perhaps, become more interested than is now the case. Numerous trust funds dedicated to the orchestra's needs might follow in the steps of the existing three standing to its credit. Under such circumstances it would not be too much to hope that in time the annual deficit would be considerably lessened; even that the orchestra at some future date might become self-supporting. The great university across the Charles is a case in point, and surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra is as educative a force in the community.

"Best of all whatever progress was made, would entail two desirable results. First, the annual 'dividend' of pleasure gained from the concert, would cancel to some extent the pains of organizing it. Again, in times of stress the growing fund would be not only a monument to Yankee thrift, but possibly also a source of courage to the rising generation."

Programs to Hand Transcript

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, next week, it will play for the first time anywhere a new Concerto for Orchestra, composed by Mr Walter Piston of the Division of Music at Harvard, his first symphonic piece since the Suite of 1930. It runs in three movements that use the form freely I. Allegro moderate, ma energico; II. Allegro vivace; III. Adagio; Allegro moderato. For further incident, Dr. Koussevitzky will revive Beethoven's First Concerto for piano and orchestra, in C major, opus 15, with Miss Shirley Bagley to take the solo-part. The longest memory may hardly recall a performance in or around Boston. Last January Mr. Dalles Frantz revived the piece, which is more interesting than the books represent it, at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at home and in New York. At both it was notably well received. In full this Cambridge program stands:

Concerto for Orchestra................Piston
(First Performance)
Concerto, No. 1, in C major for Piano and Orchestra ....Beethoven
(Pianist: Miss Bagley)
Symphony, No. 2, in D major..........Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky has revised the program for the Symphony Concerts of next week and, as usual, bettered it. He has dropped for the time the announced symphony of Glière. Instead, one of Debussy's masterpieces, "The Sea," will be played. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat will begin the concerts. Mr. Hill's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra also keeps place, with Mr. Sanromá as pianist. To mark the recent death of Elgar, the prelude and the closing pages of his oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," will be heard as memorial piece—appropriately since the composer was a religious man. In detail the program stands:

Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543)......Mozart
Concertino for Piano and Orchestra........Hill
(Pianist: Mr. Sanromá)
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius"....Elgar Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"......Debussy

Memo.

N. Y. EVENING POST

MAR 2 - 1934

BOSTONIANS PLAY BEREZOWSKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the first New York performance of Symphony No. 2, by Nicolai T. Berezowsky, a work not only interesting in its relation to the current trend, but at first hearing enjoyable because of its engaging thematic and rhythmic inventiveness.

It is a pleasure to point out that Berezowsky, who at eight entered the Imperial Chapel at Leningrad, now lives here and that he has studied in the Juilliard Graduate School, has led the second violins of the Philharmonic Orchestra and is first violinist of the League of Composers String Quartet and assistant conductor in the Columbia Broadcasting System.

In this symphony, somewhat fragmentary in character because the composer puts his ideas concisely and then moves on abruptly to others, there is a mingling of the conservative and the adventurous. The third movement, a meditation which begins with slow dignity, is oddly in contrast with the preceding one, which offers a rakishly witty treatment of ingenious notions. Toward the close the symphony grows strongly agitated and ends with that abruptness which our contemporary composers like. Berezowsky came on stage to bow to enthusiastic applause.

Equally in favor with this audience was the concertmaster, Richard Burgin, soloist in an exciting performance of the D minor concerto of Sibelius, which Maud Powell introduced here at a Philharmonic concert in 1906.

Burgin is exceptionally equipped, by experience, for this particular concerto. At Helsingfors he was a concertmaster under Sibelius himself and under the composer's supervision he played the concerto at Gothenburg, Stockholm and Christiania. He and Koussevitzky and the orchestra did their utmost last night for this distinctive music.

It is difficult work for the soloist, and its broad, powerful development is considerably orchestral, but in much of the adagio the violinist's tone had a beauty so intense that it suggested the cry of a wounded spirit and the mournfully rhapsodic combination of instruments was extremely impressive.

The program included Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto and Ravel's "Valse." These are compositions of high merit, certainly, and Koussevitzky and his orchestra made them live, throb and glow. The entire concert was on the upper orchestral level.

HENRY BECKETT.

NEW YORK SUN

MAR 2 - 1934

NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

Berezowsky Work Is Played by Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra held the interest of a large audience in Carnegie Hall last evening. The news of the evening was the second symphony of Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian musician, for several years a resident of this city. He is at present the first violinist of the League of Composers Quartet and an assistant conductor in the Columbia Broadcasting system. His second symphony was lately produced in Boston and had its first local hearing last night. The composition was received with manifest interest by most of the audience and the composer accepted the customary applause in person from the stage.

The symphony is one of that species which is a characteristic product of this period. We dismiss at once the advanced harmonies, the juxaposition of conflicting keys, the use of odd rhythms, such as five-eighths, and the employment of instruments borrowed from the jazz band. None of these have longer any novelty or special significance. But the domination of the score by fundamental thematic ideas of intellectual rather than imaginative or emotional nature is the hall mark of its modernity. We must not any more wear hearts upon sleeves or invite the world to feel with us. We must say, "Come, let us reason together."

In spite of this attitude toward the art of music Mr. Berezowsky has produced a slow movement, arrestingly begun in the low register of the flute, which has mood and a confession of the forbidden romanticism. If the composer put no feeling into this movement, he none the less suggested pensive reflection and a tender yielding to his auditor. It is something to have accomplished this much in a day of abnegation. It is something more to have reached it with the lyric idiom of the contemporary school which is inclined to be acrid and pungent rather than gentle and wooing.

Mr. Berezowsky's first movement did not attain its apparent object. It lost itself in its own ingenuity. It is clever, indeed, and presents a fine front, but its melos is of shattered fragments and its structure a piecing together rather than a development. The scherzo, the second movement of the symphony, is animated and sharply outlined rhythmically, but its material is of no great moment. The trio, scored for wood and brass, is the most engaging part of it.

The finale is for the most part a sound of many instruments wrestling with problems of polytonality. The Boston artists gave the work a superb performance and Mr. Koussevitzky, who seems to rest the musical salvation of the world on this kind of music, conducted it with splendid enthusiasm.

After the intermission Richard Burgin, the excellent concert master of the organization, was heard as the soloist in the Sibelius violin concerto. The work was introduced here by Maud Powell in 1906, but is infrequently performed. It is not popular and probably will not be until the general public becomes more accustomed to sombre and acidulous music. The violinist of last evening is an admirable artist and earned his applause. The concert began with the third Brandenburg concerto (G major) of Bach for string orchestra and closed with Ravel's "La Valse."

W. J. H.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 2 - 1934

BEREZOWSKY WORK HAS PREMIERE HERE

Second Symphony Presented at Carnegie Hall by Boston Orchestra and Koussevitzky.

COMPOSER WINS OVATION

Bach and Sibelius Concertos and Valse by Ravel Conclude Varied Program.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The program given by the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall, and very brilliantly presented, was rich in contrast and contained a novelty that had interest and showed talent. This was the Symphony 2, opus 18, by Nicolai Berezowsky, performed for the first time in New York.

This symphony impresses at a first hearing as a work in which the composer has only partly developed his own speech, being still strongly under the influence, for example, of Prokofieff. The first two movements have little or no thematic originality, though they do show logic and continuity of development, and at times, in the course of this development, arrive at interesting manifestations. But these movements are distinguished more by grasp of orchestration and clarity of purpose than by really originated ideas.

It is above all in the slow movement of the work that the presence of a composer of invention and of warm, romantic feeling is demonstrated. This movement may be less modern in its material, and more on the model of earlier Russian compositions than it is reflective of ultra-modern tendencies. That does not in the least invalidate its beauty and genuinely creative vein.

Methods that in earlier movements come perilously near formulas are here largely cast aside. The orchestra sings; the sound soars over rich tone-coloring. The listener feels here a real lyric expansion which has eloquence and promise. The finale is imbued with gay spirit and a joyous energy. The orchestration tends to be noisy in this movement and in other parts of the symphony. As the work progresses, it improves. It indicates that Mr. Berezowsky has something to say, and is gradually finding his own way of saying it. After the symphony the composer was called to the stage and there applauded by conductor and audience.

The remainder of the program, consisted of Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto for three violins, three violas and 'cellos and cembalo bass; the Sibelius violin concerto, played by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Ravel's "Valse," a work which invariably and most effectively represents the dazzling virtuosity of Ravel, the composer, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor.

The Sibelius violin concerto has a way of keeping and strengthening its position in the orchestra repertory. It is indeed an ungrateful work from the soloist's standpoint, since, in spite of many special opportunities it offers the performer, it is heavily orchestrated, unconventionally constructed, and occasionally falls below the most distinguished level of invention. It is practically a tone-poem, in the first movement, with a leading violin part. The writing has the directness and the complete absence of the conventional that invariably distinguish Sibelius's creative attitude. The poetical beginning, against the shimmering fifths of the strings; the wonderful dark colors of the orchestral accompaniment; the rhapsodic nature of the violin part, with the cadenzas that only give more continuity and variety to the progress of the musical thought, and the élan of the closing measures, give the work a unique character.

Mr. Burgin plays this concerto with a convincing simplicity and directness that befit its style and connote his understanding of the music. But last night every one, conductor and orchestra, was a virtuoso.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAR 2 - 1934

New Symphony Presented by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Plays Berezowsky's Composition at Carnegie Hall

Applauded by Audience

Russian-American Author Receives Long Ovation

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, given under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was the first performance here of a new symphony by a young Russian-American composer now living in New York. The composer in question is Nicolai Berezowsky, who came here from Russia twelve years ago, took lessons at the Juilliard Graduate School under Rubin Goldmark and the late Paul Kochanski, and joined the Philharmonic Orchestra as leader of the second violins. He is now first violinist of the League of Composers' String Quartet. Several of his scores have been played here—by the Philharmonic under Mengelberg, by the National Orchestra Association and at a Stadium concert under Leon Barzin.

Mr. Berezowsky composed his new symphony last April. As he pointed out in the program notes, the music is not descriptive in the literary sense. It follows orthodox symphonic form, is in four movements, and does not bother to confess a key.

Mr. Berezowsky, being youthful and a product of his time, writes in the prevailing mode. His harmonic tissue is pleasurably astringent; he avoids sentimentality as if it were the Flu; he is prevailingly concise, direct and vivid. Best of all, he knows how to derive a significant and fine-grained expressiveness from these methods; and he has accomplished the unusual feat of writing a symphonic slow movement that has quality and mood and poetry. His first Allegro, too, is an excellent piece of writing. The Scherzo and Finale are less striking.

Mr. Koussevitzky directed the novelty with unflagging devotion, as if he felt that he had discovered something worth while; and his orchestra played it brilliantly. The audience bestowed much applause upon the work, and summoned Mr. Berezowsky repeatedly to the stage.

Mr. Koussevitzky had selected as his opening number the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for the orchestral strings. For the concluding half of the concert his program offered the Sibelius Violin Concerto, which Maud Powell introduced to America at a Philharmonic concert in 1906. The solo part was played last night by the accomplished concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin—a musician of skill and feeling.

For end-piece, Mr. Koussevitzky chose Ravel's "La Valse"—still an exciting and brilliant example of orchestral virtuosity.

NEW YORK MIRROR

MAR 2 1934

MUSIC

Mr. Berezowsky's Symphony.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presenting the first of the season's fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall last night, displayed a symphony new to the immediate horizon, by Mr. Nicolai T. Berezowsky, an engaging young man who bowed politely to the resultant applause.

This symphony, the second of the Berezowsky roster, was complete last April. It reveals the usual mastery of orchestral color so apparent in contemporary scores; the usual derivative dependence upon other styles; the usual remote and intellectual consideration of music as a medium of articulation. There is also a definitely individual idiom, an ingenuousness and a rhythmic intensity which lift it from mere banality. It is worth hearing.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted Bach's third "Brandenberg" concerto, in G, for string orchestra; the Sibelius violin concerto (Opus 47,-D minor), played very beautifully by the concert master, Mr. Arthur Bergin and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse." The strings of the Boston band are still miraculous.

* * *

N. Y. World-Telegram

MAR 2 - 1934

Berezowsky Symphony Novelty of Boston Orchestra's Concert

BACH and three living moderns, of various tendencies and schools, supplied the program offered by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening. The novelty of the occasion was the second symphony of Nicolai Berezowsky, whose musical allegiances, to judge by his work, are many.

Before Mr. Koussevitzky turned to the new symphony he evoked the mighty voice of the Leipzig All-Father in the third "Brandenburg" concerto in G major, scored for strings. The reading was authoritative, forceful, and of a firm rhythmic progression. Good use was made of this opportunity to exhibit the strings in their uncompanioned splendor.

Interrelation Lacking.

Although still a young man, Mr. Berezowsky has already become known through a long list of compositions in various forms. His second symphony shows a wide acquaintance with symphonic tradition and an ability to give substance to ideas on a grand scale. The impression gained, however, was of a long, wandering chain of thematic material, showing little unity or interrelation.

Some of the best pages occur in the second movement, with its flattering tribute to the Ferde Grofe brand of elevated jazz, and in the concluding allegro, which boasts a logically cumulative crescendo. Mr. Berezowsky came to the stage to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

Ovation Tendered to Burgin.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, appeared as soloist in the Sibelius violin concerto, which was offered next. His deft and commanding account of the difficult solo passages fully deserved the ovation which followed. The orchestra supported him with vigor and unanimity.

A sparkling and vibrant performance of Ravel's "La Valse" brought the concert to a rousing close.

L. B.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

MAR 2 - 1934

The usual large and appreciative audience gathered at Carnegie Hall last night to hear the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky presented, as he did the last time, an entire new symphony. This time it was the Second Symphony, by Nicolai Berezowsky, which was played for the first time in America in Boston last week.

During the past four years one or more of Berezowsky's works have been played by the Boston Orchestra, so this symphony of his was given what was presumably an authoritative, and certainly, a sympathetic reading. The composer, born in Russia, came to America while still a lad, and held a double scholarship at the Juilliard Graduate School for four years. He is a natural exponent of modernism.

Coming after the noble "Brandenburg" string concerto of Bach, it sounded like "present day" with a vengeance. And afterward, the beautiful Sibelius violin concerto sounded positively old-fashioned. This last number was played by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. He displayed a most vibrant and appealing tone, and presented the concerto in brilliant fashion. The Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn tonight, and will play again at Carnegie Saturday afternoon.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

AR 2 - 1934

Boston sent its crack orchestra here again last evening, and at Carnegie Hall the visiting symphonists, led by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a program consisting of Bach's G major, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, Nikolai Berezowsky's second symphony, opus 18 (first time in New York), Sibelius' violin concerto, with concert master Richard Burgin as soloist, and Ravel's "La Valse."

Aside from Mr. Burgin's musically and technically sure playing of the turgid and ineloquent Sibelus concerto, the present review should give passing mention of invigorating orchestral response in the Bach number and a sweeping Koussevitzky version of the Ravel exhibit. More extended consideration is due the new Berezowsky opus, premiered in Boston last week, when I heard it here over the radio.

Upon renewed listening last evening I liked the opus better than at its broadcast performance, for the second experience gave me familiarity with the material and ability to follow it in development.

The symphony has themes of recognizable contours, some merely rhythmical, others of lyric flow in spite of the prevailing modern idiom in writing and orchestration. Mr. Berezowsky follows conservative form in his four movements, but there is the unmistakable touch of the young modern in his harmonic and color treatment. He creates in this opus with more confidence, clarity, and distinction than heretofore. Also the effects seem not superimposed but brought about by the nature of the music as such. The scherzo is propulsive and grimly ebullient. The slow movement lacks poignant grip. The finale, mounting in interes, climaxes graphically. Altogether a symphony that says something and says it exceedingly well.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

MAR 2 - 1934

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Boston Symphony Concert—'Linda di Chamonix' Revived by the Metropolitan Company, With Lily Pons

Applied to Nicolai Berezowsky, born in Russia in 1900 and resident there until 1921, the designation American composer is purely honorary, yet its magic has worked as well for him as for any native son. Orchestras and conductors—the Boston, the Philharmonic, the National Orchestral Association; Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Van Hoogstraten, Mr. Barzin—vie for the privilege of presenting his works, thus to acquire a reputation for patriotic partiality to local talent.

Last evening it was Mr. Berezowsky's second symphony to which one listened in Carnegie Hall, where the Bostonians and Mr. Koussewitsky were again holding forth. The experience was not over-rewarding, though the symphony contains a slow movement that, though too long and structurally unsatisfactory, suggests that the composer has something to say that may one of these days be worth hearing. The substance of the other movements is not sustaining, though Mr. Berezowsky makes it as palatable as he can with every device of decoration at the command of the modern instrumentor. The symphony is securely built in a form closely approximating the classical, but this structural design does not seem inherent in the materials; the symphonic character is approached only in the largo. The more experienced readers will only need to be told that Mr. Berezowsky's orchestra includes triangle, cymbal, bass drum, side drum, wood blocks, temple blocks, xylophone, small bells and celeste, in order to make a fairly accurate guess as to the general style of the music. The symphony was received with the meaningless cordiality which is habitually assumed by an audience faced with a novelty by an "American composer."

The program proceeded from the symphony to Sibelius' violin concerto, in which the solo part was played by Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin has played the work before and with a greater degree of success in the disposal of the difficulties with which the composer tests his interpreter. Many passages were last evening blunderingly negotiated, but Mr. Burgin's efforts were heroically well-intentioned and the ovation accorded them was their just reward. Under the circumstances, however, the concerto did not quite come off as a piece of music—and a superb piece of music, we must remember, it is.

Mr. Koussewitsky opened the evening with the third of Bach's Brandenburg concertos—a rhythmically vigorous and tonally brilliant performance—and closed it with Ravel's "La Valse."

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

MAR 3 - 1934

Boston Symphony Society Gives Fourth Concert in the Season's Series at the Academy of Music

Mrs. Charles J. McDermott was the hostess in the committee box last night at the fourth of the series of five concerts of the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of directors.

Guests in the committee box were Mr. and Mrs. Hector C. Adam, Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Turner, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Deems and Miss Anne McGlue.

Mr. and Mrs. William Pitman Earle Jr. entertained a box party last night and had as their guests Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lounsbury, Mr. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Sturgis.

Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer, Mrs. Frank Stafford, Mrs. Ray E. Gillman, Miss Caroline Camp, Miss Augusta Uhlich and Miss Catherine Huber occupied the box of the Adelphi Alumnae Association. Members of the faculty of the Woodward School also occupied a box.

Miss Geneva Caldwell, Mrs. Hanna Paul Krebs and Miss Janice McEntee occupied the box of the Packer Collegiate Institute.

The three boxes held by members of the Junior League of Brooklyn were occupied by the following parties: The Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Althea McCammon, and Phyllis Barnes; the Misses Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee; the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott and Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch and Gregory Price.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, received in the foyer preceding the performance. Among the members on the reception committee were: Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Lay, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Director Charles D. Atkins of the institute's department of education, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood, Dr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Dr. and Mrs. Joshua Van Cott, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. John D. H. Schulz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott and Mrs. Harris M. Crist.

Brooklyn Times Union

MAR 3 - 1934

Boston Symphony Concert Enjoyed by Society At Academy of Music

Mrs. Charles J. McDermott was the hostess in the committee box last night at the fourth of the series of five concerts of the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Directors.

Guests in the committee box were Mr. and Mrs. Hector Adam, Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Turner, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Deems and Miss Anne McGlue.

Mr. and Mrs. William Pitman Earle, jr., entertained a box party last night and had as their guests Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lounsbury, Mr. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Sturgis.

Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer, Mrs. Frank Stafford, Mrs. Ray E. Gillman, Miss Caroline Camp, Miss Augusta Uhlich and Miss Catherine Huber occupied the box of the Adelphi Alumnae Association. Members of the faculty of the Woodward School also occupied a box.

Miss Geneva Caldwell, Mrs. Hanna Paul Krebs and Miss Janice McEntee, occupied the box of the Packer Collegiate Institute.

The three boxes held by members of the Junior League of Brooklyn were occupied by the following parties: The Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes—the Misses Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and their escorts, Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee—the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott and their escorts, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch, Gregory Price.

With a capacity audience attending, a brilliant program was presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as follows: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, Bach; Symphony in B minor ("Unfinshed"), Schubert; Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes, Debusey; "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Scriabin.

A committee of members of the Sponsoring Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, received in the foyer of the opera house last night, preceding the performance. Among the members of the Sponsoring Committee on the Reception Committee last night were: Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Lay, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Director Charles Atkins, of the Institute Education Department; Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood, Dr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Mrs. Glenworth Reeve Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Dr. and Mrs. Joshua Van Cott, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. John D. H. Schulz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Charles J. McDermitt and Mrs. Harris M. Crist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 3 - 1934

SERIES IS CONTINUED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Conducts in Fourth Concert of Brooklyn Season at Academy of Music.

The fourth of five concerts in the forty-sixth annual Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music. There was a capacity audience and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, hostess in the committee box, had as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Hector Adam, Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Turner, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Deems and Miss Anne McGlue.

Mr. and Mrs. William P. Earle Jr. had in their box party Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lounsbury, Mr. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Sturgis.

Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer, Mrs. Frank Stafford, Mrs. Ray E. Gillman, Miss Caroline Camp, Miss Augusta Uhlich and Miss Catherine Huber occupied the box of the Adelphi Alumnae Association.

In the Packer Collegiate Institute box were Miss Geneva Caldwell, Mrs. Hanna Paul Krebs and Miss Janice McEntee.

The three boxes held by members of the Junior League of Brooklyn were occupied by the Misses Dorothy R. Johnson, Althea McCammon, Phyllis Barnes, Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and their escorts, Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbe.

Others in the boxes were the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott and Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch and Gregory Price.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman received in the foyer preceding the performance. Among these were Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William Kennedy Jr., Mr. and Mrs. D. Lay, Charles D. Atkins, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. Harris M. Crist, Mrs. McDermott, Mrs. Donald Ross, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Winslow. Dr. John D. H. Schultz, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Duval, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Dr. and Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr. and Mr. and Mrs. John T. Underwood.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

MAR 3 - 193

Music of

By EDWARD

The Boston Symphony

Mr. Koussewitsky conducted the fourth of the Boston Orchestra's five Brooklyn subscription concerts at the Academy of Music last night. His program included the third of Bach's Brandenburg concertos, Schubert's B minor symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'extase." All of this music had been heard before at the Academy, played by the Bostonians and conducted by Mr. Koussewitsky. The performance of the two movements of the Bach concerto was vital and propulsive; that of the Schubert symphony consistent in theme, though rather too deliberately "effective," vulgarizing the music. Romantic is, one suspects, synonymous with sentimental in Mr. Koussewitsky's lexicon.

But the Debussy Nocturnes could not have been bettered. In this music Mr. Koussewitsky excels; line and color were handled here by conductor and orchestra with exquisite sensitivity; the last page of "Nuages," the first muted intimations of the approaching procession in "Fetes"—these were the high spots of the concert. The Scriabin brought the evening to a brilliant close.

Brooklyn Times Union

MAR 3 - 1934

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays

The fourth concert of the series of five presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience at the Academy of Music last night.

D. Koussevitzky opened his program in the classic austerity of "Brandenberg Concerto," paused for a short time with Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and then launched his musicians in the delicate mysticism of two of Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festival." The program was finished in exultant fashion with Scriabin's emotional pean, "Poem of Ecstasy."

The magnificent mastery of Dr. Koussevitzky was clearly evidenced in the almost hushed notes in the Debussy music. There the least pressure would have destroyed the pale blue fragility the French master wove into the score. It was handled in irreproachable fashion.

E. A.

NEW YORK TIMES

'AR 4 - 1934

SHURE IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTONIANS

California Pianist Heard in a Brilliant Performance of the Brahms Concerto.

AUDIENCE IS ENTHUSIASTIC

Strauss's 'Domestica' Is Climax of Koussevitzky's Program at Carnegie Hall Matinee.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A young American pianist, Leonard Shure, played the Brahms First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, when that remarkable body of instrumentalists gave its second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The purely orchestral compositions were Mozart's overture to the "Marriage of Figaro" and the Strauss "Symphonia Domestica."

Mr. Shure was born in Los Angeles. He is 24 years old. Twenty years ago, as a precociously gifted child, he began his studies with Karl Reckzeh in Chicago. In his fifteenth year he became a pupil of Artur Schnabel, with whom he studied from 1925 to 1928. Recently Mr. Shure played the work that he interpreted yesterday with the Boston Symphony in Boston, his first appearance in America since his departure for Germany nine years ago.

He is a pianist with exceptional gifts, which were shown to the greatest advantage in the first movement of the concerto. Then it was a pleasure and something of a thrill, too, to realize the presence of a talent of scope and virility; not an intellectualist only; not a miniaturist or harpsichordist of the twentieth century; but a young musician with the virility, the enthusiasm and fire appropriate to his years, and a young artist in love with his task.

In this opening movement of the concerto Mr. Shure did not show the perfect sense of ensemble that he probably will acquire later. An arpeggiated passage of accompaniment, for instance, stuck out; nor was this the only instance of imperfect proportion. His performance had its compelling virtues, and struck fire, when he took command at the keyboard, with authority, audacity; when, in a word, he could lead and pontifically declaim the superb and powerful music. In these places he had a splendid fist, yet not a wiry or metallic tone. He kept, as a rule, within the limitations of a full and sonorous quality.

So that the first movement gave strong indications of a new pianistic talent, distinctly to be reckoned with in the years immediately before us.

The other movements of the concerto, well played, were not, however, more than conventionally effective. It is with the performer as with the composer: the slow movement is the true test of his capacity —seldom the fast one. The fast movement carries performer and listener along by sheer rhythm, accent, excitement to which it is easy to respond, and which often can create the illusion of deeper qualities than actually showed in the performance.

This principle, of course, does not hold true of the first movement of the Brahms concerto, except in relation to the demands of the second part. Neither in this part nor in the finale could Mr. Shure sustain the interest he had created at the beginning. There was not the sense of conviction, or enchained thinking. Various passages were beautifully played, but the atmosphere was not completely present, and the sensation of the arch of Brahms's great form was lost. Mr. Shure has an unusual talent. He would probably be the first to agree that he could still learn much from his teacher's interpretation of the concerto that he essayed yesterday.

The mercurial music of Mozart, which opened the program, was delightfully played by the orchestra. The pièce de résistance, from the bravura standpoint, was of course the Strauss "Domestica," which the orchestra played, despite fatigue at the end of a long tour, with compelling virtuosity.

That the composition is twice too long is unfortunate, since, despite the rather painful exhibitionism of the father of the Strauss household, there is splendid music in the piece.

It starts with commonplace material, material principally conspicuous for its adaptability for development. The false start is repeated at the beginning of the night-music, which Mr. Koussevitzky does his best to give distinction by emphasizing an inner voice, to set off the mediocrity of the Mendelssohn-like refrain. But after these bald spots are past, and between large amounts of notes written with regrettable industry and lack of taste, there is remarkable music. The love music soars considerably higher than most of Strauss's pages of erotism, if so it is to be called. The fugue with its good-natured hubbub and gemütlichkeit, is rich to overflowing with ideas. But the man seems never to have enough. The last ten minutes of the piece, because of other ten minutes of redundancy, make the listener restless in his seat, anxious to call it an afternoon.

Nevertheless, there was long and deserved applause at the end of the concert. There had been a good half dozen recalls for Mr. Shure. There were many recalls, of course, for Mr. Koussevitzky.

It may be added, to join a moral to this tale, that conductor and orchestra had acquitted themselves of these feats at the end of a six-day tour, during which six different symphonies, plus the Scriabin "Poème de l'extase," the Sibelius violin concerto and the Brahms piano concerto already mentioned, and other works by Vaughan Williams, Stravinsky, Bach, Ravel, Schubert and Debussy, had been played. The symphonies were those of Brahms in E minor and C minor, Sibelius's Second, Schubert's "Unfinished," the new work of Nicolai Berezowsky and the Strauss work heard yesterday. Granting that some of these works had previous performance in the season, are there many orchestras in America who could have given six such programs, with only five repetitions in the whole week, and emerged with so much glory? Are there? And how do our resident orchestra programs compare with these?

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 4 - 1934

Boston Symphony

A rich evening was provided by Serge Koussevitzky; the Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin, ~~its con~~certmaster, and Nicolai Berezowsky, young composer, with Carnegie Hall packed for the occasion.

Berezowsky's 2nd Symphony was heard here for the first time, and revealed nothing revolutionary in any sense. The work is highly derivative—from the Russians—but exhibits skill in workmanship and understanding of the symphonic form. Bach's 3rd Brandenburg concerto, marvelously played; Sibelius' violin concerto, handled by Burgin and the orchestra with marked virtuosity, the emotional intensity of the soloist, an outstanding feature, and Ravel's magnificent abstraction, "La Valse," made up the rest of the bill.

▼

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 5 - 1934

Boston Symphony Thrills Hall Again

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluding its fourth visit of the season Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, played under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, the Brahms ~~First Piano Concerto in~~ D minor, with Leonard Shure, young American, as soloist; Richard Strauss' "Symphonis Domestica," and the Sinfonia from Haendel's Oratorio "Solomon."

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAR 4 - 1934

Leonard Shure Scores in Debut Here as Pianist

Appears at Carnegie With Boston Symphony, Offering Strauss and Brahms

Orchestra at Its Best

D Minor Concerto Well Received by Audience

By Jerome D. Bohm

Familiar music and an unfamiliar pianist were brought forward by Serge Koussevitzky at the fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The compositions given were Mozart's overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," the first piano concerto of Brahms, in D minor, Op. 15 and the Symphonia Domestica, of Richard Strauss. The pianist was the twenty-four-year-old Leonard Shure, a native of Los Angeles who studied with Artur Schnabel in Germany from his fifteenth to his eighteenth year, and who made his first appearance in this country since 1925 in Boston recently in the same concerto and with the same orchestra.

The fact that Mr. Shure chose this formidable work to effect his metropolitan debut already spoke in his favor. It would have been far easier to win his audience with one of the concertos devoted merely to the exercise of virtuosity. The Brahms D minor concerto is anything but a virtuoso's holiday. Not that its difficulties are less daunting than those of its more superficially glittering companions by Liszt or Tchaikovsky, but they appeal less readily to the uninitiated.

Already Pianist of Parts

Despite its comparatively early place among the German master's works, the D minor concerto is a profounder, more searching piece of writing than the B flat concerto, the product of the maturer Brahms. The first two movements, originally symphonic in intention, and penned at a time when Brahms was deeply affected by Schumann's attempted suicide, are permeated with pessimism. The titanic opening pages of the first movement give way to melancholy reflections and the entire adagio movement is elegiac in its implications. Only in the final rondo are the gloomy thoughts dispelled, giving way to a buoyant, exhilarating mood.

Young Mr. Shure already is a pianist of parts. He has ample technique to make light of the knottiest problems of mechanism. Octaves and double notes in rapid tempo were executed with stunning bravura. What is of far greater importance, however, is that he has the imagination, the sensitivity and the ripeness of conception essential to giving a convincing and moving presentation of a work such as only a musician of innately poetic gifts could summon up, and his tone, even in the mightiest fortissimo, was kept within esthetic bounds. Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra provided a superb accompaniment.

Orchestra In Good Form

Of Strausss' Symphonia Domestica little new remains to be said. Strauss never has been at his happiest when depicting his private life in tones. One has but to gaze at the score of his opera "Intermezzo," based on a marital misunderstanding, for substantiation. Forty-five minutes, no matter how glowingly they are occupied with masterly orchestration, is a long time for the exploitation of platitudinous ideas. Mr. Koussevitzky expended much energy and loving care on its pages and the orchestra covered itself with glory, but the glory is not, in this instance, primarily Strauss's.

In the evening, in the same hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony, under Hans Lang's direction, held forth. The greater portion of the program was devoted to works heard earlier in the week: Honegger's arrangement of five movements from Bach's French suites and Rachmaninoff's second symphony in E minor. The new element was the cello concert of Saint-Saens in A minor, Op. 33, which Gregor Piatigorsky set forth with tonal loveliness and technical expertness.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 4 - 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play this week in Boston the prelude and "Angel's Farewell" from the "Dream of Gerontius," by Sir Edward Elgar, who died on Feb. 23.

NEW YORK SUN

MAR 5 - 1934

Leonard Schure Plays With Boston Symphony

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee at Carnegie Hall Saturday consisted of three numbers, the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," the Brahms piano concerto in D minor and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." Of these the second was the most important item, and its interest was increased by the appearance of a promising young pianist, Leonard Schure of Los Angeles, born there in 1910, and in his later years a pupil of Arthur Schnabel. He returned to this country last summer and recently made his first appearance here since 1925 when he played this same Brahms concerto in Boston.

Mr. Schure has a valuable talent. He has a technic developed along lines providing him with powers to porform music construction in heroic mold, and back of it he has intelligence and deep feeling. His interpretation of the concerto was unequal and there were some crudities which will undoubtedly disappear in time. The analysis of the composition was more successful than the synthesis.

Mr. Schure showed understanding of the work and strong reactions to its eloquence, but he did not quite shape the whole to perfect proportions. He played the first movement with boldness, with strength and with infectious enthusiasm. The slow movement he certainly felt deeply, but his projection of it seemed anxious and not entirely fluent. His painstaking was sometimes too exposed.

The finale was not so impressive under his hands as the first movement, but a young man who can play this majestic work with so much appreciation and such a large measure of success is already a pianist of substantial achievement and one who will without doubt accomplish more as his mind matures and his control of his resources becomes more certain. The concerto, as all music lovers know, is not a mere piano piece; it is for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Koussevitzky furnished an orchestral background of splendid quality.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

MAR 4 - 1934

At Carnegie Hall, a matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Brahm's D minor piano concerto, and Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica."

Leonard Shure, twenty-four-year-old pianist from Chicago, who has been giving concerts in Europe, was the soloist in the Brahms composition, and played with unusual technical finish and vital musical understanding. He faithfully followed the large dramatic line of the concerto and voiced its lyrical measures with a tone of excellent quality.

Mr. Shure's style in general is confident and invigorating, and it should be interesting to hear him in recital here. He had impressive success with his auditors.

The orchestra gave a highly colorful and resounding performance of the Strauss opus, into which Mr. Koussevitzky put much imagination and temperamental drive without, however, making this weak score sound like important music. It is the least convincing of the Strauss symphonic poems.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 4 - 1934

Sir Henry Wood has returned to England after a brief visit to America, during which time he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a ~~pair of~~ concerts. Sir Henry's visit was apparently too short, or too pleasant, to convince him of anything opposite to the overwhelming wealth of the American people for he stated that we spend lavishly with no suggestion of depression, that everything is booming with success. Sir Henry said that we talk much about being "broke", but that we would ride to the poor-house in our limousines.

N. Y. World-Telegram

MAR 5 - 1934

Leonard Shure Registers Well

LEONARD SHURE, a young pianist from Los Angeles, made successfully his first New York appearance as soloist of the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The fact that he chose as his concerto the Brahms D minor speaks volumes for his seriousness as well as for his equipment.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted the superb ~~band in~~ Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

* * *

Giovanni Martinelli's first local Enzo Grimaldo at the Metropolitan on Friday night was also his second on any stage. His only previous appearance in the part had been at Cleveland on one of the Metropolitan company's visits.

* * *

Beryl Rubinstein, making one of his rare appearances in New York on Wednesday evening at the Town Hall, will play his own sonatina in C sharp minor, besides pieces by Mozart, Bach, Schumann, Faure, Scriabin and Balakireff.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 4 - 1934

CONDUCTOR SAILS

Sir Henry Wood has sailed on the Manhattan for London after a brief visit to America, during which he conducted three concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston and [redacted]dence, and one of the Cadillac broadcasts in New York on [redacted] 28. He will return next season to spend at least a month here and to be heard as guest conductor with sveeral principal orchestras.

PHILIP HALE AT 80

Quite frankly, it is a bit difficult to write a piece congratulating a man on his 80th birthday without producing something which, with a few changes in tense, would make an obituary editorial! For a person of Philip Hale's youthfulness of outlook, such a premature summation of his career is unthinkable. Nor would a lusty, slap-on-the-back greeting, stressing the "eighty-years-young" philosophy, be appropriate. For Mr. Hale is old in wisdom and mellowed in the ways of civilized life.

Thus we may salute him only as a very dear friend, who has attained an honorable age and whose absence from the scene of our common labors we regard as merely temporary. Those who know Mr. Hale through his printed words know something of the man—the eclecticism of his knowledge, the pointedness of his wit, and the Whitmanic range of his human sympathies.

Distinctive as these qualities are, they are only a cloak for the man himself. They are surface indications of a spirit which is as large, as deep, and as true as any man's can be. Just where and when Mr. Hale did all his work for The Herald, the Boston Symphony programs, and other publications was something of a mystery to his less gifted colleagues. But there was no mystery about where they came from. Only a man of his native wit and intelligence could have produced them.

So, dropping the past tense into which we foolishly blundered, we wish Mr. Hale a happy, happy birthday and very many returns of the day!

119

Manhattanese Mildly Wonder At Bostonians

Symphony Orchestra's Range Through a Week's Tour, Menuhin Comes

THERE IS nothing like "little old New York." Its provinciality as a capital of music has long been a common jest. But ever there are new instances. Last week the Boston Orchestra gave four concerts within the metropolitan borders—two in the Borough of Manhattan, two in the Borough of Brooklyn. At them, outside lesser numbers, it played Sibelius's Second Symphony and his Concerto for Violin; Berezosky's new symphony; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Strauss's "Domestica"; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"; Brahms's First Concerto for Piano. Halting en route at Northampton for Smith College and at New Haven for Yale University, it added to this list Brahms's First and Fourth Symphonies; included also in one or the other of those concerts Skriabin's tone-poem and Sibelius's concerto. Thereupon sundry Manhattanese opened wide eyes; lifted broad palms to heaven and exclaimed in a loud voice: "Can such things be?" An orchestra of the first rank had played all these pieces in six days—to say nothing of numbers from Bach, Debussy, Stravinsky and Vaughan Williams—and played them as became that rank.

Men and brethren, such things can be and excite no wonder whatsoever in this New England village where orchestral concerts are not subject to Toscaninian limitations and no one is trying to palm off on the pocket-books of the country a resident orchestra as a national institution. As matters of fact, Brahms's Fourth Symphony—these ten years one of Dr. Koussevitzky's battle-horses—was played at the concerts immediately preceding the journey southward. A week earlier, one program for the Manhattanese—Bach's Third Brandenburg oncerto, Berezovsky's Symphony, Sibelius's Concerto, Ravel's "Waltz"—had done similar duty in Boston. The "Poem of Ecstasy" returned to the active repertory at the first concerts Third Brandenburg Concerto, Berezovsky's Symphony, Sibelius's Concerto, Ravel's "Waltz"—had done similar duty in Boston. The "Poem of Ecstasy" returned to the active repertory at the first concerts of the season; Brahms's First Symphony reappeared on Jan. 14; his First Piano Concerto, with Mr. Shure as pianist, at a supplementary concert on Dec. 18. Through two seasons Sibelius's Second Symphony has been played again and again from Boston as far as Chicago. The "Domestica," of late repeated in every second year, was last played in Boston on Feb. 9 and 10; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony at a supplementary concert on Feb. 19.

Here in Boston the Symphony Orchestra takes such a repertory in its stride and deploys it at need when it travels abroad. Incredible as it may seem in New York, where no small public seems to regard symphonic music as a useful accessory to Mr. Toscanini, the audiences at Symphony Hall take pleasure in a widely ranging repertory. Still more incredibly from the point of view of many Manhattanese, Dr. Koussevitzky prefers such a repertory and spares not to enlarge and maintain it. "The hinterland," however, as every New Yorker knows—especially if he or she is an immigrant from "the provinces"—is a queer place. ald Tribune above no signature:

Fortunate Berezovsky

As it happened Mr. Berezovsky's symphony was better received in New York than it had been in Boston. Said the Herald Tribune above no signatiure:

> Mr. Berezowsky, being youthful and a product of his time, writes in the prevailing mode. His harmonic tissue is pleasurably astringent. He avoids sentimentality as if it were the "flu." He is prevailingly concise, direct and vivid. Best of all, he knows how to derive a significant and fine-grained expressiveness from these methods; and he has accomplished the unusual feat of writing a symphonic slow movement that has quality and mood and poetry. His first Allegro, too, is an excellent piece of writing. The Scherzo and Finale are less striking.
>
> Mr. Koussevitzky directed the novelty with unflagging devotion, as if he felt that he had discovered something worth while, and his orchestra played it brilliantly. The audience bestowed much applause upon the work, and summoned Mr. Berezowsky repeatedly to the stage.

Mr. Henderson, also impressed by the slow movement, was more analytical. "The symphony," he wrote in The Sun, "is . . . a characteristic product of this period. . . . The domination of the score by fundamental thematic ideas of intellectual rather than imaginative or emotional nature is the hall mark of its modernity. We must not any more wear hearts upon sleeves or invite the world to feel with us. We must say, 'Come, let us reason together.'

"In spite of this attitude toward the the art of music Mr. Berezowsky has produced a slow movement, arrestingly begun in a low register of the flute. which has mood and a confession of the forbidden romanticism. If the composer put no feeling into this movement, he none the less suggested pensive reflection and a tender yielding to his auditor. It is something to have accomplished this much in a day of abnegation: It is something more to have reached it with the lyric idiom of the contemporary school which is inclined to be acrid and pungent rather than gentle and wooing.

"Mr. Berezowsky's first movement did not attain its apparent object. It lost itself in its own ingenuity. It is clever, indeed, and presents a fine front; but its melos is of shattered fragments and its structure a piecing together rather than a development. The scherzo, the second movement of the symphony, is animated and sharply outlined rhythmically, but its material is of no great moment. The trio, scored for wood and brass, is the most engaging part of it.

"The finale is for the most part a sound of many instruments wrestling with problems of polytonality. The Boston artists gave the work a superb performance and Mr. Koussevitzky, who seems to rest the musical salvation of the world on this kind of music, conducted it with splendid enthusiasm."

Also Mr. Burgin

After Mr. Berezovsky at this concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York came Sibelius's Concerto for Violin with Mr. Burgin to play the solo-part. Toward him the reviewers were brief but warm. He was "an admirable artist who earned his applause". . . "His deft and commanding account of the difficult solo-passages fully deserved the ovation that followed." . . . He was "a musician of skill and feeling." He played "with a convincing directness that befits the style and connotes his understanding of the music."

Here in Boston

When Mr. Menuhin plays for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of March 23 and 24, he will be heard in Beethoven's Concerto for Violin, and in the concerto that Mozart at the age of ten wrote during a visit to Paris for Princess Adelaide, the daughter of Louis XV. The manuscript was recently unearthed from family archives; edited by Hindemith and published.

The Harvard University Orchestra, with Mr. Malcolm Holmes as conductor, announces its annual public concert for Tuesday evening, March 27, in Paine Hall at the Music Building. To it Mr. M. R. Rogers, a graduate student will contribute two numbers. The program stands:

Concert Overture, "Fingal's Cave"	Mendelssohn
Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 1, in D major for String Orchestra	Corelli
Saraband and March for Full Orchestra	Rogers
Symphony, No. 4, in C minor	Schubert

Mr. Kirkpatrick of the harpsichord, who played notably at Cambridge a few evenings ago, will join the Vecchi Singers in a concert of ancient music at New York on March 16. He will be heard in pieces from the Englishman, Bull; from the Italians, Rossi and Scarlatti.

Elsewhere

Ernest Bloch's setting of the ritual used on Sabbath in the Reformed Jewish Synagogues, will be heard for the first time in America at a concert in Carnegie Hall in New York on Wednesday evening, April 11. The composer will conduct; Mr. Schorr of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing the Cantor's music; a full orchestra will be assembled from the Philharmonic Society and a full chorus from the Schola Cantorum. Messrs. Birchard, in Boston have already published the score.

Mr. McCormack, who has vanished from the concert-hall in Boston, has an eye to anniversaries. Next summer, at his manor-house in Ireland he will mark his fiftieth birthday; next autumn in New York his twenty-fifth year on the American stage.

Honegger has transcribed for orchestra various movements from Bach's French Suites for harpsichord. Last week in New York the Philharmonic Society played them under Mr. Lange at a pair of stop-gap concerts while Mr. Toscanini is making ready Beethoven's Mass. The reviewers were little impressed. To them the arrangements were unsympathetic and maladroit, "translating Bach's wit and poetry into ponderous prose."

Mr. Heifetz has gone to Russia for a tour that will continue well into the spring. Next to South America; finally back to the United States next autumn. . . . Mr. Moiseivitch, the pianist, will return to America in October for two months of concerts. . . . Erika Morini, the violinist, heard but once in Boston is also to be expected.

London is over-served by its symphony orchestras. In the current season the Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beechman, the London Symphony Orchestra under Sir Hamilton Harty, the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation under various conductors, have all failed to pay their way. A limited public divides itself among the three and leaves each in the lurch. The "B. B. C." orchestra meets its deficit out of other revenues of the corporation. Certain rich men stand behind the "L. P. O." The co-operative "L. S. O." struggles on as best it may.

Or for Any Other

The number of persons who give definite reason for their musical likes and dislikes is astonishingly small. [New York Sun H. T. P.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 5 - 1934

P. Von Eltz, Charter Member Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paul Von Eltz, a charter member of the old Boston Symphony Orchestra and for many years a leading musician, was found dead Sunday at his home, 32 Paul street, Newton Center. He was in his eighty-ninth year. Funeral services will be at his home Tuesday at 2.15 P. M. Burial will be in Forest Hills cemetery.

He was a native of Dresden, Germany and came to this country when he was only three years old. At the age of fourteen he was a piano soloist in New York city. He attended school until he finished the grammar grades and then devoted himself to music, studying privately. He came to Boston seventy years ago and for a time was a member of the old Germania band. Mr. Von Eltz traveled widely as a musician and was connected with many orchestras during his career, specializing in the violin and the viola.

His wife was Marie L. Chadbourne of Dorchester. She died fourteen years ago. He is survived by two daughters: Mrs. Frank T. Eskrigge of Newton Center and Mrs. Marion Simpson of Auburndale.

UNDAY POST, MARCH 4, 1934

To Honor Sir Edward Symphony Concerts--

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A week ago last Friday Sir Edward Elgar, Master of the King's Musick and by most of his countrymen regarded as England's outstanding composer, died at Worcester, the English city near which he had been born almost 74 years before. And at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, the first to occur here in Boston since Sir Edward's death, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will do him honor by the playing of two excerpts from "The Dream of Gerontius," generally held to be his masterpiece.

* * * *

This oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," written to the text of Cardinal Newman, was first produced at the Birmingham festival in England in 1900, and met with but a moderate success. Two years later its performance at the Nether-Rhenish festival aroused such enthusiastic response and elicited such high tribute from Richard Strauss that the English verdict was revised, the work was performed in 1903 at no less than three English festivals, and in 1904 there was a three-day Elgar festival at London's Covent Garden. Since that time Elgar has stood almost unchallenged in England as contemporary master of the oratorio, even though "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom," the first two parts of an uncompleted trilogy, achieved less sensational success than did "The Dream of Gerontius."

* * * *

Outside England Elgar is known far better by certain of his orchestral works than by his oratorios, although "The Dream of Gerontius" was performed here in Boston by the Handel and Haydn Society no longer ago than last year. His "Enigma Variations," heard from Sir Henry Wood and the Boston orchestra but a few weeks ago, are by many considered his outstanding contributions to symphonic music, but even more familiar to the great public are his "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, and his salon-piece, "Salut d'amour." Nor will his overture, "Cockaigne," picturing London life, soon vanish from lighter orchestral programmes. There are many other orchestral pieces in the list of Sir Edward Elgar's works, including two symphonies, long unheard in Symphony Hall, and the violin concerto lately played there by Mr. Heifetz, but by the "Enigma Variations, "Pomp and Circumstance," the "Salut d'amour," Cockaigne" and "The Dream og Gerontius," does his name seemed destined to live, at least on this side of the Atlantic.

* * * *

The Prelude to the "Dream of Gerontius" and the Finale, "The Angel's Farewell," in an instrumental arrangement, are the portions which will be heard at these Symphony Concerts. Also on the programme is the Concertino for Piano and Orchestra which its composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, dedicated to Jesus Maria Sanroma. With Mr. Sanroma as soloist, the piece was heard with pleasure last season at a Monday evening Symphony concert, but this will mark its first performances before the Friday and Saturday audiences. On this occasion, too, Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist.

* * * *

The soloists have been announced for the coming performance, on Sunday, March 18, of the B minor Mass of Bach, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will present as the Spring Pension Fund Concert. They are Olga Avierino, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, both already heard with the orchestra in the course of the present season and hence requiring no introduction, and Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor, distinguished singers both long familiar to Boston theatregoers. This Mass, as previously announced, will be given in two divisions, the first beginning at 4:30 in the afternoon, the second at 8:30 that evening

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 7 - 1934

DR. CHAPMAN TO TALK ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Music Critic Will Lecture at Public Library Sunday.

The third in the series of free lectures on the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert programs by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, will be given Sunday afternoon in the Providence Public Library at 4 o'clock. The orchestra will make its third appearance of the season next Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Dr. Chapman will talk on the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitski, analyzing the particular works of the three composers, Bach, Sebelius and Brahms, who are to be represented on the program. The lecture, as it customary, will be illustrated at the piano, pointing out themes and developments. Dr. Chapman will also speak on the orchestra and the functions of its instruments.

This series of free lectures is a project of the Monday Morning Musical Club, originated by Mrs. Ada Holding Miller four years ago. Mrs. Miller, who was the first chairman of the club's library committee, states, "The continuance of the large audiences has proved the appreciation of students and music lovers in taking advantage of the opportunity to become more familiar with the symphony selections."

Owing to the size of the hall at the library, there is a limited number of seats. The library committee of the club is in charge of arrangements.

A WORLD PREMIERE AND DEBUT

Symphony Concert in Cambridge Doubly Important

Post Mar 9

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A world premiere and a professional debut marked the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening. The premiere was that of Walter Piston's Concerto for orchestra, later to be heard at Symphony Hall, while a performance of Beethoven's First Pianoforte Concerto introduced Miss Shirley Bagley, winner last year of the Mason and Hamlin prize at the Conservatory and, as such, automatically entitled to this Cantabrigian appearance.

CONDUCTS OWN MUSIC

Mr. Piston, who conducted his own music, was warmly applauded by an audience that must have contained both past and present members of his classes at Harvard University. Nor was this audience unappreciative of the competence of the youthful soloist.

That Mr. Piston's Concerto should prove to be cast in the current mould of such pieces was but to be expected. The characteristic music of the 20th century, like that of the early 18th which it superficially resembles, is prone to bear a common physiognomy. Hearing Mr. Piston, one might have thought of Honegger or Hindemith or of the Stravinsky that influenced both, and at the same time consider how much all of them owe to Johann Sebastian Bach.

But there is a vigor and freshness in Mr. Piston's invention, an enthusiasm that frees him from the common reproach of having written too cerebrally. And from the first bar to last his Concerto moves with a confident mastery that definitely places him among the Americans to be reckoned with.

Miss Bagley, as becomes one of her musically tender years, has chiefly concerned herself to date with the building of a firm technical foundation and with the acquiring of the fundamentals of style and interpretation. Her playing of Beethoven's relatively early work had clarity and even brilliance. It was tasteful and polished. Yet this music demands from its performer a degree of sentiment, elegance and charm that Miss Bagley quite pardonably failed to give it.

A performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony, which is one of the most notable achievements of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, brought the concert to a stirring close.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

MAR 6 - 19

'Evocation' Scores in Boston

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER, the famous composer, wrote "Evocation" for the opening of Severance Hall and dedicated it to John L. Severance. There was a variety of opinion in regard to the work following its performance by the Cleveland orchestra. One faction was enthusiastic in its praise; another believed that it showed a falling off in inspiration that Loeffler has shown in other works.

Now the work has been performed in Boston by the Boston symphony orchestra and there seems to be no two opinions; it is classed as another work by an acknowledged master. After the performance, the composer was called to the stage many times by the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky.

190

Transcript

Y, MARCH 10, 1934

Musicians

Symphonic Afternoon Variously

Elgar Recalled from Prime, Mr. Hill to Mr. Sanroma, Mozart and Debussy

THOUGH there are six pairs of Symphony Concerts to come, there were distinct signs, on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, of an ending season. Thus far, two piano-concertos—one from Mr. Petri, the other from Mr. Schnabel—and a boyish exercise, resurrected by Sir Henry Wood, had sufficed for Mozart. Now, Dr. Koussevitzky remembered him as symphonist, and the thrice-familiar symphony in E-flat major stood first on the program. . . . Two years ago Mr. Sanromá, the conductor and the orchestra produced Mr. Hill's Concertino at Cambridge. They have since played it in concerts elsewhere. Now for the first time the "regular subscribers" heard it. . . . Between the first and the eighteenth pair of concerts no Debussy, acknowledged master though he is. Accordingly a long leap from the two Nocturnes in October to the Symphonic Sketches of the sea in March. . . . Finally the commemorative Koussevitzky, doing honor to the departed Elgar with an orchestral excerpt from the oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius." True, a fortnight had elapsed since the departure; but what is a conductor to do when the eminent composer dies at the moment when programs are "all set" for a week's touring?

As it was, this Prelude and Closing Scene out of "Gerontius" were surprising to hear. It dates from 1900 when the "Enigma Variations"—likewise heard at Symphony Hall last January—were establishing Elgar as composer in England and beyond the narrow seas. It had not returned to these concerts through thirty years; while few meanwhile had sat before it in performances of the oratorio as such. To most listeners it must have come on Friday as new sensation. True, the musical speech is the speech of the descendants of Liszt and Wagner, of Strauss in prime. It is historical now and for the while outmoded. The younger composers of the nineteen-thirties, like Mr. Piston the evening before at Cambridge, write in a different idiom. True again, Elgar was a faithful communicant of the Roman church; believed, aside from the emotional and esthetic impression, in what Cardinal Newman's poem (which was text) set down. To many a listener, on the other hand, it could be no more than poetized vision of the spiritual dissolution of death and of spiritual re-incarnation—if such there is—beyond the grave.

Nevertheless, upon one hearer the rediscovered Prelude made something like the impression that the records say it generated in the first audiences. Familiar sonorities, if the listener likes; but sonorities in their kind uncommonly rich and deep; that rise in surge; that still and surge again; that keep to this day no small musical vitality. Already Elgar knew the post-Wagnerian orchestra through and through; could wield it in his own fashion. Akin were the intensity and the poignancy of the whole music in surge or stilled. In his larger and graver works, from the variations and "Gerontius" through the other oratorios, the two symphonies and the two concertos, Elgar wrote from the depths of his being. It was one of his notable powers that into the resulting music he could infuse undiminished these intensities. Time and again he told conductors (as he might have told Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday) that all that he would say was contained within the music before them; would manifest itself. They had neither to enlarge nor to intensify it. So indeed he himself conducted it.

Hence the sting of the Prelude upon imagination and emotion when it is an agitated music; the compassion and the peace suffusing it when it moves in calm. Obviously had there been no "Parsifal" between earth and heaven, there would have been no "Gerontius." The kinship between the oratorio and the opera is only the clearer now that "Parsifal" has gone up and down the world. Even so Elgar's music is the expression of deep-seated religious ardor, of very personal faith; so abides the years. And always his potent strings sound for him. Stravinsky may discard them when he likes. They remain the choir through which Elgar spoke large and full. By the signs of this Prelude his symphonies and his overtures are still playable, little less than the variations and the violin-concerto of last January. Besides, most of the old men that would have none of Elgar on this side of the sea, have gone their ways.

It is premature to write of the baggage that Mr. Hill will leave behind him, since in prime he practices his two-fold profession of composer at Francistown and teacher at Cambridge. Yet when the day of reckoning does come, one fancies that the little Concertino of Friday will abide it better than some of his larger pieces. Blessed is he who in a work of art accomplishes all that he intended. Seemingly the Concertino is such a music. Blessed again is he who out of musical invention, resource and craft can generate in his hearers esthetic delight. On Friday there was no doubting the general and the particular pleasure of the audience. Give Mr. Sanromá his due as pianist in a piece written for him and in which he improves every opportunity. Yet not a little of the applause was for Mr. Hill and no other. The pantomime by which he would have transferred it to Mr. Sanromá, did him credit; but next to Mr. Loeffler he remains the resident composer whom the Symphony Concerts most like to honor.

As it is, the Concertino is a little miracle of condensation and cohesion. Within half the usual time and half the usual dimensions, it traverses the full course of a piano-concerto. From beginning to close it maintains itself in continuous and variegated development, both unlabored. The principal theme interests in itself; in one phase after another unifies the whole Concertino. Not even in his symphonies is Mr. Hill more the ready and individual craftsman. Under his hand the lesser motivs run free and fertile and decently akin. Before the Concertino has ended, it has fulfilled the functions of a concerto on the grand scale—the succession of matter and moods from introduction to final rondo; the contrastings and blendings of piano and orchestra; the opportunities for the pianist to disclose and diversify his mettle.

The Sanromá of the crisp, bright tone, the propulsive rhythms, the fine-chiselled ornament; the Sanromá who is keen musician as well as full-equipped virtuoso shone out of the Concertino; while the adroit Hill never once overtaxed those faculties that the pianist has still to ripen, say for deep-freighted song. Through the whole piece, from composer and pianist both, the light and ingratiating hand. The othe day, Mr. Berezovsky vindicated the right of the entertaining symphony in these concerts. Now Mr. Hill does as much for the pleasurable and miniature concerto. Dr. Koussevitzky's hospitable mind, like his devotion to every piece on every program, is not the least of his virtues.

Of the repertory pieces Debussy's sea-sketches—how modestly they are named!—remain an undimmed masterpiece. Nowhere, unless it be in the stouter scenes of his opera, has Debussy worked on so large a scale and in such firm integrity. These sea-pieces are no beguiling play with rhythms and harmonies and timbres, no accretion of little illusive strokes. By every test they are music of symphonic scope and spaciousness, manifold in content, ordered in design, advancing in unity. Those who would have Debussy a composer of impressionistic miniatures deceive themselves. In "The Sea," as in certain scenes toward the end of "Pelléas," go heights and depths, amplitudes and poignancies. Debussy loved the little piece, piquantly and elusively concocted; but in his decade of prime he could also stretch the large canvas and fill it.

In "The Sea," again, Debussy renews the peculiar enchantment of his music. His sensations from the ocean-waters are indeed transmuted into tones. With their aspects under changing lights, with their motion under varying winds, with their dark depths and shimmering spray he infuses a music that is the counterpart of colors and textures and stir. Then upon it lays a magic of his own. The waters that his eyes have seen become a sea of dream and vision that haunts his imagination and suffuses his tones. His wind and waves converse. His little waves sport in the breeze. His great waves know the tempest. Farther and farther opens the horizon; changeful and more changeful becomes this sea, until of a sudden the sun rides the heavens and all is blue expanse. The tone-poet, like poets in other media, sees, hears, feels—and transfigures. The measure of the transfiguration is the measure of his poetry. At each hearing Debussy's sea-pieces lay new hold upon us.

Continued on Following Page

Continued from Preceding Page

Dr. Koussevitzky remains discerning and achieving conductor with Debussy, though the orchestra has sometimes given him more sensitive response than it did on Friday. But with Mozart's symphony he over-labored the slower-paced pages. Motion is essential quality to all music. With Mozart in particular it must flow. Yet the conductor now stayed the pace of the Andante in the E-flat symphony until it barely moved and pulsed; while each phrase was too obviously poised and rounded. The serene progress of the whole movement languished. Similarly with the shorter introduction to the symphony. Too slow a pace, too elaborate a phrasing relaxed it. Only with the quicker movements and with the buoyant tutti that a reduced orchestra permits was Dr. Koussevitzky the conductor that in ten years in Boston has grown out of a stiff and mannered Mozart into a Mozart of grace and fire, tender or grave, serene or strong. Like the rest of us, Dr. Koussevitzky sometimes tries too hard.

H. T. P.

Mar. 10

OSTON POST, SATURI

TRIBUTE TO ELGAR BY SYMPHONY

Hill's Concertino With Sanroma at Piano Enjoyed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday as a memorial to the late Sir Edward Elgar the Symphony Orchestra for the first time in 30 years played the Prelude to his oratorio "The Dream of Gerontius." The other event of the afternoon was the first performance at a regular subscription concert of Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma again as the soloist.

MUSIC OF SOLEMN BEAUTY

Had not Sir Henry Wood so recently conducted here Elgar's most viable orchestral work, the "Enigma Variations," Dr. Koussevitzky would undoubtedly have chosen it for this, his first Boston concert since the composer's death. To be sure, the First Symphony has not been heard here since 1910, nor the Second since 1911, while the recent success of the Violin Concerto as played at a Pension Fund Concert by Mr. Heifetz now stirs curiosity regarding them. Yet it cannot be denied that, under the circumstances, Dr. Koussevitzky's musical tribute was the most fitting that he could have paid.

The Prelude to "Gerontius" is music of solemn beauty, music that, with an eloquence seldom matched by any composer, voices the common dread of death, the awe and fear in the face of the unknown, yet with a final thought of hope and consolation. Sir Edward's setting of the poem of Cardinal Newman, which sped his fame to the four corners of the earth, is an uneven work. Beside pages of terror or of exaltation, pages of mystical fervor, are others in the best tradition of Victorian oratorio. But hearing the Prelude played so affectingly, it was easy to wish that, with competent chorus and solo singers to assist, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were continuing to the last bar. The performance, as may be certain, would have been a revealing one.

Hill Jazzes a Concerto

The previous Symphony Hall performance of Mr. Hill's Concertino was at a Monday evening concert two years ago. Yesterday, as before, the features of the work that most impressed were the striking suggestion of the "Fate" motive in Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and its polite but persistent jazziness. Had Mr. Hill been reared musically in Tin Pan Alley he might have tried to make a concerto out of jazz, and have failed. With a different upbringing, he makes jazz out of a concerto, and succeeds in blending elements commonly held to be irreconcilable. Mr. Hill has written more valuable pieces than this Concerto, but its effectiveness with an audience may be taken for granted.

Mr. Sanroma, to whom the piece is dedicated, played it yesterday with the right degree of insouciance and verve. Both he and the composer, who was present, were enthusiastically applauded.

Mozart and Debussy

For beginning and end to the concert came two orchestral performances of rare distinction, the one of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, the other of Debussy's "La Mer."

One may feel that the Symphony in E-flat holds less of interest than those in G minor and C major, and harbor a suspicion that the music of Debussy is an iridescent bubble which will some day burst. But there is no denying the opportunity that Symphony and Suite, so far apart in spirit and in substance, afford to a sensitive, imaginative conductor and a virtuoso orchestra.

10, 1934

Globe Mar 10

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Both literally and figuratively Mozart of the E-flat Symphony and Debussy of the "thre symphonic sketches" "The Sea," were beginning and end of the Symphony concert yesterday. The program also contained Prof Edward Burlingame Hill's Piano Concertino, the solo part of which was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, and the Prelude to the oratorio "The Dream of Gerontius," by the late Sir Edward Elgar who died a fortnight ago. This Prelude was, of course, performed in memory of the eminent English composer, whom some consider to have been the outstanding figure in the music of his country for the past generation.

The general—and superficial—conception today of Mozart is that of a man who reflected in his music the fine manners, the elegance, and the leisurely pace of life which prevailed during his time. Some will grant that, according to the technical resources of his day, he expressed a certain amount of purely artificial drama in "Don Giovanni," humor in "The Magic Flute" and "The Marriage of Figaro," and religious awe and emotional intensity in such parts of the Requiem that he was able to write.

Broadly speaking, the seeming tranquillity and the clear flow of melody in his piano music, his concertos, and sundry chamber pieces appear to constitute a basis for this conception. And yet, time and again, one encounters little episodes where unconstrained merriment, a bold harmonic progression or an atmosphere of melancholy suggest that he put more of himself in his music than many realize. Now, any attempt to make a Beethoven out of Mozart would be ridiculous, but the E-flat Symphony, especially the first movement, is permeated with adventurous technical devices and general emotional upheaval that demand for a catch-as-can description the adjective "Beethovenesque." Here, beyond doubt, Mozart was transfiguring into music what lay in his heart. Intermittently conventional, external qualities intrude, but not for long.

The performance was enjoyable, though here and there Dr Koussevitzky's propensity for over-dramatizing was clearly out of place. Eighteenth Century music speaks well for itself when played according to the known practices of the period in which it was written. Unlike the more robust music of the 19th Century, which oftentimes may be overplayed without distortion, 18th Century scores do not bear well highly-spiced interpretations.

Debussy's superbly imaginative tone painting of the various moods of the sea, as he saw them, still arouse wonder at the genius which put them into such vivid music. They are infinitely more subtle, more varied and individual than such "sea" music (meritorious though it is) as the "Fingal's Cave" Overture; Mendelssohn was concerned with literal reproduction of sound; Debussy let his own powerful fancy play over the subjects he chose.

It is not inconceivable that, in the wave of belated interest which is sometimes bestowed upon a man's music after his death, the compositions of Elgar may enjoy in this country more of a vogue than has been their lot in the past. For one reason or another—no man can say why—his music has never been really popular here, except for "Pomp and Circumstance" and the ubiquitous radio trifle, "Salut d'Amour." The "Enigma" variations and "The Dream of Gerontius," of his more substantial work, are probably best known. Save for a solitary performance the first in this country, by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, 23 years ago, Boston had not heard his Violin Concerto until Dr Koussevitzky played it this season. The symphonic poem, "Falstaff," unknown here, might have proved more interesting and representative of Elgar's gifts than the "Gerontius" prelude, the oratorio came to being while Elgar was under the spell of Wagner, specifically of "Parsifal."

Mr Hill's Concertino once again impressed as exuberant, somewhat jocund music. Mr Sanroma was cordially applauded for his truly brilliant piano playing.

Next week Arnold Schoenberg will conduct his own tone poem, "Pelleas and Melisande." Dr Koussevitzky will present the "unfinished" symphony of Schubert and the tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."—C. W. D.

MUSIC

Herald Mar. 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Mozart, Symphony in E flat (Koechel No. 543); Hill, Concertino for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 36; Elgar, Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius"; Debussy, "La Mer," Three Symphonic sketches. Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Two works of old acquaintance, one of recent date, and an excerpt from Elgar's oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," made up this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. It was no small amount of delight that the Mozart symphony (Koechel No. 543) and Debussy's "La Mer" brought, for they had not been heard for some time.

The E flat Symphony of Mozart—one of the three great symphonies written by him in the last year of his life—has long been known as one of the most euphonious works ever penned. It is scored without oboes, a fact that gives Mozart the opportunity to use his favorite wind instrument, the clarinet, in a great variety of ways.

The performance of the entire symphony left, literally, nothing to be desired. Proportions were in perfect taste; tempos were ideally realized; in short, the very essence of Mozart's musical thought found inspired expression. The audience was quick to sense the unusual beauty of the work and its interpretation.

Of the three sections which make up Debussy's "La Mer," the first (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean) has long been considered the best. It has within it some of the most transporting moments to be found in Debussy's writings; the second and third sections lack the magical qualities of the first.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for Pianoforte and Orchestra is one of the really clever pieces for this combination written in recent years. The piano part is formidable and effective in the modern percussive sense. The orchestral part is full, though never thick, and it brings the piano into grateful prominence. Combining Gallic and American features in atmosphere and treatment, Mr. Hill's Concertino is imbued with abundant wit that is, of course, never common, and a vitality that is contagious. Jesus Maria Sanroma played the solo part in his most brilliant fashion. Mr. Hill was indeed fortunate in having his work presented by a pianist who is so admirably equipped, and is so keenly attuned to its spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky brought all the fine points of Mr. Hill's orchestral skill into their full value.

In memory of Sir Edward Elgar, who died on Feb. 24, Dr. Koussevitzky played the Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius."

Listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a habit which we grudgingly interrupt. The past week seemed strangely bare with the orchestra away. How many who take the orchestra more or less for granted have stopped to realize what musical life in Boston would be with the orchestra's efficiency in any way impaired?

Next week's program consists of works by Schoenberg, Schubert and Strauss. Mr. Schoenberg will conduct his symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande." Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat his memorable performance of Schubert's "Unfinished" (heard recently at a Monday concert), and Strauss's "Till Eilenspiegel." Thus Boston will be able finally to make the acquaintance of Arnold Schoenberg as an interpreter of one of his important early works.

Bach's B minor Mass will be given in two parts, Sunday afternoon and evening, March 20. The fifth concert of the Monday evening series will occur on March 21. Mr. Alfred Zighera, cellist, will play Lalo's Concerto for Violoncello. Other numbers will be the Sibelius Second Symphony and a Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis by Vaughn Williams.

ELGAR TRIBUTE BY SYMPHONY

Parts of Late Composer's Oratorio Performed by Orchestra

Mar 10

In memory of the late Sir Edward Elgar, great English composer, who died recently, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky most fittingly led the Boston Symphony orchestra through a performance of the prelude and final pages of the composer's oratorio "The Dream of Gerontiuse," a fortunate choice, indeed, as the text, taken from Cardinal Newman's poem of the same name, has to do with death and paradise.

The remainder of the program played in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon included the first performance at the regular Friday and Saturday series of Edward Burlingame Hill's concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, Mozart's symphony in E flat major (Koechel No. 543), and Debussy's "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques. The soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, the orchestra's pianist, distinguished hereabouts for his work with the Boston Symphony, his activity on numerous other concert platforms, and in all too infrequent recitals.

Sir Edward died at Worcester, England, on Feb. 23 at the age of 77. Just two days later the orchestra went on toru so it was not until yesterday that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were able to honor appropriately and publicly his passing.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of both the Mozart symphony and the prelude to Elgar's oratoria "The Dream of Gerontius," seemed unusually fine and moving, the tribute of a great conductor and orchestra to a noted composer.

In Hill's modern and rhythmic concertino, Sanroma, once again proved himself a pianist above the usual, one more than well equipped technically, with a broad or fine touch as the score, which was dedicated to him, demanded. He was enthusiastically applauded as was Mr. Hill, who was present. True, the work lacked depth and feeling—but perhaps none was intended.

Debussy's "La Mer" ("The Sea") brought the concert to a close. For gentle description of an ocean in repose there is little in the world of music to surpass it.

W. T. C., Jr.

SOMERVILLE MAYOR

Music

Monitor Mar 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, honored the memory of Sir Edward Elgar by including in its eighteenth program of the season (March 9-10) the Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius," one of the major accomplishments of the British master. The selection, well made for its purpose, was performed with eloquent expression of emotion and power.

The concert began with Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K.543). The opening Adagio (which foreshadows clearly the Beethoven of "Fidelio") was filled with somber mystery. The Allegro was taken neatly and deftly, with even the kettledrums subdued to a proper reticence in relation to the rest of the instruments. The Andante dragged badly, and the conductor practiced upon it some of his worst extravagances of labored expression. The last two movements went with a fine dash.

The near-novelty of this program was Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for piano and orchestra. The soloist was Mr. J. M. Sanromá, to whom the work is dedicated. The Concertino had been heard at a concert of the Monday series, two years ago. It is a clever bit of writing in lighter vein, employing amusingly the jazz idiom, but with the restraint and taste of a gentleman and a scholar of Harvard University. It was played by Mr. Sanromá with the facile technique and the flair for the modernistic that distinguish him.

The concert closed with a brilliant performance of Debussy's "La Mer."

L. A. S.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 11 1934

As Music Goes

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

Not a collection, of short pieces, the Boston Symphony Orchestra program for Tuesday night is more than likely those to which we have become accustomed from many years of truly symphonic concerts.

The Brandenburg Concerti, the third of which will be played, were completed in about 1721 and work upon them undoubtedly went along with the incomparable "Well Tempered Clavichord," two volumes of contrapuntal studies which have never been equalled for originality of thematic invention and purity of style. It is not necessary to be familiar with the many characteristic idioms of Bach to share in the interest and spirit of this so-called concerto. It begins with the full string orchestra in very impressive and massive volume. This work is more plentifully supplied with directions for performance by the composer than many, which undoubtedly shows that he gave to it his best attention and brought it to completion before placing it at one side. It shows polish and finality. The string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra is surpassed by none, and its unity of ensemble, wealth of string color, dynamic balance and potential sonority will give this splendid classic a vital and impressive rendition.

Jean Sibelius whose Concerto for Violin and Orchestra will be played by Mr. Burgin, admired concertmaster of the orchestra, is a contemporaneous composer whose greatness is recognized and acknowledged during his lifetime. It may be that his pleasingly melodious "Valse Triste" and grandiose "Finlandia" have done much to bring him to prominence in the popular mind. But to the cognoscenti his splendid symphonies and this concerto reveal his greatness and place him among the highest of modern and present day composers. Although recognition is already granted Sibelius, true appreciation and popularity will take longer for his works are musically profound.

Soloist Hailed

We hail with joy the appearance of a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and devoutly and piously hope that it represents the inauguration of a new custom whereby the great concerti of musical literature may be heard in their proper settings with the background of a magnificent orchestra. There are among the members of the orchestra virtuosi whi may capably perform these works so sadly lacking in the past. Each time one hears Mr. Burgin comes renewed realization of the greatness of his artistry, the scope of his interpretative insight and the propriety of his appearance as soloist with this or any great symphony orchestra. The perfection of his technique, the beauty of his tone and the soundness of his interpretations will make this concerto presentation superbly revealing. Furthermore, his association with the conductor and the men of the orchestra will make for a unity of sympathy and artistry not always achieved in the performance of "guest" artists, be they ever so notable, who are strangers to the orchestral personnel.

There is always a strong suggestion of earnest sincerity in Sibelius. His music savors of the profoundly devotional; even in his merry moments he shows dignity with occasional glimpses of austerity. He is an avowed and advanced modernist and those who appreciate recently devised idioms of musical speech will rejoice in his departures from the stereotyped lines and figures of musical expression. The reputation of this master, still living and hard at work, has been enhanced in no small measure by the devotion of Dr. Koussevitzky, who may be termed an enthusiastic exponent of Sibelius, and to the warmth of praise of the distinguished music critic, Olin Downs, whose praise of Sibelius is boundless. Dr. Koussevitzsky's interpretations may therefore be considered authoritative. It would seem from all signs and tokens that Sibelius is one of the greatest composers of our time who will claim a high place among the composers of all time. That he has just been made a Professor of Music of the Royal College of Music of London is an item of more than ordinary musical interest. One may hope that it is a position of much honor and recompense, allowing unlimited leisure for future composition.

Who shall say that we are starved for Brahms or ask "what are Brahms?" Brahms begins his fourth and last symphony without preamble and with his accustomed simplicity. A pleasing dialogue between the strings and woodwind, a flow of beautiful melody which a child may understand but which requires more mature abilities to follow through its weavings and genuflections into sterner and abrupt changes of key and rhythm only to emerge from time to time in the same tonal subjects with which the symphony began. One hears horns and trumpets, and strongly marked rhythms in varying degrees of tonal power. There seems to be a sense of musical unrest leading up to a magnificent climax in the brass choir, reinforced solidly by the string orchestra.

There are in this movement several pages of delicious harmonies which are hardly surpassed in the entire realm of music. They are thrown into high relief by occasional brief but pungent and positive suggestions of the gruff and grim Brahms, picturing the sunshine and shadow of his acute and penetrating mind, yet in the main this movement, and indeed the entire symphony is most cheerful and esthetic in its emotion. Should one compare its life and light with other contemporaneous works it would easily be found that Brahms surpasses all in the wealth of beauty of his musical thoughts, in the appreciation of musical form and rational composition and in the inherent and necessary psychology of musical thought transference and sublimation. When he repeats a graceful phrase it is always to its advantage. If he reiterates an entire paragraph it is always with some new adornment or variant which makes the theme even more beautiful and appealing.

In the second movement, "andante moderato," Brahms shows his remarkable ability in the elaboration of a very simple phrase into a tonal edifice of strength and beauty. A variant of the first five notes of the scale is announced by the horns and reinforced by the woodwind. This is assumed by the clarinet over plucked strings. The figure of a graceful legato over an acute staccato is one not often met with in music. The secondary theme resembles the first motive in sentiment. Again one hears a rugged counterfoil which is soon replaced by a suave melody of great beauty and breadth. Occasional recollections of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the overtures to "Fidelio" appear in this movement. Probably no composer influenced Brahms more than Beethoven.

The last movement is really in two parts, a "joyful" and an "energetic" allegro. They are characterized by verve and action. The tunes are most pleasing, even "catchy." Again and again one notes similarities with Beethoven. There are moments of extreme vitality soon contrasted with languor. There are recollections, even quotations, from the first movement, and they are well worth the rehearing. One notes an exquisite solo for the flute accompanied by soft punctuations from the strings and horns. It is in dreamy legato without displayful bravura, a study in tone rather than in technique. The performance of this exquisite moment by Mr. Laurent may well be considered one of the pleasurable anticipations of this concert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 11 1934

Boston Symphony Music Found at Public Library

In the music collection at the Providence Public Library will be found the selections to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert on Tuesday evening. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G-major, is arranged for a piano duet; Sibelius's Concerto in D-minor is for violin solo with piano accompaniment, and Brahms's Fourth Symphony may be obtained in an arrangement for piano solo or for a piano duet.

A critical survey of Sibelius's works is contained in Cecil Gray's book, "Sibelius," which includes a complete list of his works. Of the Concerto he writes: "The most admirable feature * * * is probably the happy mean it strikes between brilliance and virtuosity on the one hand, and exclusively intrinsic musical interest on the other." This Concerto is analyzed movement by movement in F. B. Emery's compilation entitled "The Violin Concerto," which covers more than 3000 works. Among other material of interest concerning Sibelius there is a chapter devoted to him in Rosenfeld's "Musical Portraits," in Gray's "Survey of Contemporary Music," and there is a brochure by Rosa Newmarch, "Jean Sibelius," the latter with text in German.

Goepp's "Symphonies and Their Meaning" and Upton's "Standard Concert Guide" will aid in the understanding of Brahms's Fourth Symphony. To the biographical material concerning Brahms there have recently been added two volumes: "The Unknown Brahms," by R. H. Schauffler, and "Brahms," by William Murdock, both of these books devoting considerable space to Brahms's music.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 11 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will play Schönberg's symphonic poem, "Pelleas und Melisande," Schubert's symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" at its concerts in Boston this week. Mr. Schönberg will conduct his own work.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

(2)

MAR 14 1934

Boston Symphony Players Present Burgin as Soloist

Violin Number Outstanding Feature of Concert in Providence.

Two concertos, one for strings and the other for violin and full orchestra, were the unusual features of the Providence concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening.

In the past the symphony audiences in Providence had the added pleasure of listening to vocal or instrumental soloists, but this feature has been omitted in recent years. Last night it was resumed for this occasion. The soloist was Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, an artist long familiar to the audiences here and in other cities where Dr. Koussevitzky's famous organization plays. He has often been heard by these audiences in brief solo passages, but last evening he was given the mission of interpreting the complicated and compelling Sibelius concerto. To say that he was the outstanding figure of the evening is no disparagement of the splendid leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky or the playing of each individual performer in the great orchestra.

Mr. Burgin, as would be expected, brought to his work the fine intelligence of a highly developed musical mind combined with skill and artistry of the highest order. He is a violinist of rare abilities, a musician steeped in the culture of the life he has led, and his rendition of the Sibelius work was a triumph that won for him a tremendous tribute from the great audience.

Trans Mar 16

It is in order to remind the public of the Symphony Concerts that the first piece on the program for tomorrow and Saturday is Schönberg's tone-poem, "Pelléas and Mélisande," with the composer conducting; that it is thirty minutes long and played without pause; that through that half hour the tardy must wait for entrance before guarded doors.

122

Mar 17

COMPOSER CONDUCTS "PELLEAS"

Schoenberg's Tone Poem Played by Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At last a Boston audience has heard Arnold Schoenberg's "Pelleas and Melisande" conducted by its composer. This performance, scheduled for an earlier pair of Symphony concerts and cancelled because of Mr. Schoenberg's sudden illness, took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and will be repeated there tonight.

RICH BUT OVER-LONG

Had the original programme been carried out we would have heard "Pelleas and Melisande" on top of the String Sextet, "Verklaerte Nacht," and have been ever more forcibly reminded that the Viennese-modernist served his apprenticeship as composer by following in the footsteps of Wagner with subsequent glances in the direction of Mahler and Strauss.

To call so masterly a score as that of this tone-poem after Maeterlinck's play a work of apprenticeship suggests a misuse of that term, but surely there is little of what we have come to consider the essential Schoenberg in this rich-sounding, mellifluous, over-long and over-elaborate score. There is, of course, a prodigious display of contrapuntal skill but the polyphonic complexities of the later Schoenberg are of a different order, quite without the fatness and the turgidity that mark this "Pelleas and Melisande."

Lacks Personal Quality

As Strauss turned away from Brahms and Mendelsshon to become a follower of Liszt and Wagner, so did Schoenberg turn his back upon Straussian post Romanticism to cultivate the acerbities and the intellectualities of the neo-classical era that he has done so much to shape. And post-Romanticism suited him as little as classicism suited Strauss.

This "Pelleas and Melisande" lacks sharpness of characterization, the prime requisite in a tone-poem that aspires beyond mere narration. Neither Melisande nor Golaud nor Pelleas is set before us with any vividness. There is scant suggestion, indeed, of the fate-haunted atmosphere of the drama. Even if we did not know the opera of Debussy in which these characters come to musical life, we would still feel that Schoenberg had failed to make them clear to us. Again on the purely musical side there is the lack of a personal quality in the motives and melodies.

Has Plenty of Disclosing Works

How different in that respect is the "Unfinished Symphony of Schubert and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," which completed the programme. There is little either of Beethoven or of Weber in the one or of Wagner or of Liszt in the other. A pity, then, that Mr. Schoenberg did not choose to disclose himself to us in a work that would prove him also a musical indiviualist, for there are plenty of such works in his portfolio.

But that the tone-poem gave pleasure yesterday was indicated by the applause that returned the distinguished guest several times to the platform.

"Unfinished" and "Till"

Like that at a Monday evening concert a few weeks ago, the performance of the "Unfinished" Symphony yesterday was altogether felicitous. Schubert was allowed to speak for himself, although Dr. Koussevitzky saw to it that every sonority was flawless, every phrase rightly turned. Justly, the performance aroused great enthusiasm.

There was applause aplenty, too, for "Till" yet Dr. Koussevitzky succeeds less well with it than with the other tone-poems of Strauss. He over-refines, over-polishes this music; now halts its progress, now speeds it unduly. And in that process some of the homeliness and the humor, the spontaneity and the exuberance of the music is lost.

Tran Mar 17

This Monument Built by Bach For Humankind

Through the Mass in B Minor As It Returns Again to The Concert-Hall

Tomorrow afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall Bach's Mass in B minor will be heard for the fourth time in Boston in recent years from Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs. When it was revived in the spring of 1931, The Transcript published an expository article, now out of print, prepared by Alfred H. Meyer of its staff for music. Within the last fortnight, from the new audience about to sit before the Mass, repeated requests have come for an available reprint. With these requests The Transcript now complies; but it has room for only so much of the article as is description of the music. To the readers who thus compliment them, Mr. Meyer and the music-department return proper thanks.

BACH wrote in all five works which bear the name "mass." Says Professor Terry in Grove's Dictionary: "Five of the Leipzig works bear the title 'Missa' (Messe: Mass)—the Mass in B minor, and four miscalled 'short' Masses in F major, G minor, A major, and G major. In Lutheran liturgical use the 'Missa' was a setting of the Kyrie and Gloria in Excelsis sung at the beginning of the 'Hauptgottesdienst' after the Introit. The four 'short' Masses are complete Lutheran 'Messen.' The Mass in B minor in its original form also was a Lutheran 'Messe,' composed in 1733. . . . The subsequent addition of the Credo, Sanctus (with Osanna and Benedictus) and Agnus Dei enlarged it to conform in structure to the Roman 'Ordinarium Missæ,' though Bach neither wrote it for Roman use nor made it serviceable for use at Dresden by sending these addenda to his Roman Catholic sovereign. These added portions were to a large extent drawn from earlier works and the autograph of the complete Mass may be dated circa 1738." . . . In the Mass in B minor, Bach's orchestra consists of flutes, oboes, bassoons, trumpets, drums and strings. The oboe is not the oboe of our day, but the oboe d'amore, pitched a third lower. The wind instruments are often used "obbligato," in the fashion of the day.

Kyrie and Gloria

The mass of the Roman Catholic church includes of course the Kyrie, Gloria in Excelsis, Credo, Sanctus, Agnus Dei. For Bach the three-fold "Kyrie eleison" (Lord, Have Mercy), "Christe eleison," "Kyrie eleison" means three extended musical numbers. The five-voiced fugue with which the Kyrie begins, at once sets the mood for the whole mass, that of penitence, of an ardent pleading for forgiveness of sins. As successive points rise higher and higher, the pleading seems to become more and more urgent until it reaches a point of almost painful insistence. The "Christe eleisoa," a duet for two sopranos, is in turn free from this passion for forgiveness. It is serene and confident, an expression of the faith that is certain of pardon, and that Christ will grant it. The final Kyrie reduces the chorus to four parts. It breathes less gloom than the first. A fine tranquillity runs through it.

The Gloria in Excelsis Bach divides into eight distinct numers: Gloria, Laudamus, Gratias, Domine Deus, Qui tollis, Qui sedes, Quoniam, Cum sancto Spiritu. Gloria, Laudamus, Gratias form a first group of praise and thanksgiving. The radiance of a company of angels (naturally associated with ideas of "glory") bursts dazzlingly forth as trumpets sound the live rhythms, give voice to the exuberance of the "Gloria" theme. There is a sudden change to a mood of meditative tranquility when the chorus reaches "et in terra pax." With it a gently florid theme with an air of serene joy on "bonæ voluntatis" soon mingles. Laudamus comes as a soprano solo with violin obbligato. Says Schweitzer: "The fine violin accompaniment . . . is a typical specimen of Bach's 'joy' motif. In Bach's works there are at least two hundred motives constructed on this rhythm of joy, while it is scarcely met with in Handel or Beethoven." It is a rhythm of two-sixteenth notes alternating with an eighth. The Gratias expresses its thanks through an exceedingly plain theme, probably placed at this point as a sort of relief after the florid Laudamus. But when "magnam gloriam tuam" is reached, there is again an active theme more in the spirit of the original Gloria.

As the first three divisions of the Gloria have been praising God, the other five concern themselves with the Glory of Christ. The duet for tenor and soprano, Domine Deus, has been called a "charming intermezzo" by one commentator. Parry makes these enlightening observations: "The melodic material is in a singularly tender mood, the cue to which is a short descending figure of four notes from tonic to dominant, which Bach used rather frequently when in that vein. . . . Such a mood might not seem obviously appropriate to the words unless it be remembered that the name 'Jesus' always suggested to Bach, and probably to the majority of German Lutherans of that time, a feeling of tenderness and love."

The Qui tollis is one of the most expressive numbers of the entire mass. It is a four-part chorus, often in strict canon form. Its mood mirrors perfectly the reverent mood of the text; its theme of descending thirds would seem to grow out of the very diction of the Latin. But this happens to be one of the choruses that Bach re-made out of an existing cantata-chorus of similar emotional import. And Antonia Lotti (1667-1740) had used a very similar theme in one of his masses. Qui sedes and Quoniam tu solus are respectively an alto solo with accompaniment of oboc d'amore and a broader and bolder bass solo with horn obbligato. This leads into one of the most magnificent choruses of the mass, the Cum Sancto Spirito with which the Gloria ends. This brilliant chorus of rejoicing leads to an elaborate closing fugue on a fiery theme. It is one of the most magnificent fugues (or compositions, for that matter) on record.

Credo and Crucifixus

The Credo falls into these divisions: Credo in unum Deum, Et in unum Dominum, Et incarnatus, Crucifixus, Et Resurrexit, Et in Spiritum sanctum, Confiteor. The old plain-song intonation for the Credo, Bach uses as the theme for the five-voiced fugue which is the introductory movement for this division. The solidity of the music here expresses affirmation, a statement of belief so positive as to be unshakeable. Bach's creed is "founded upon a rock"—this first

Continued on Following P

MUSIC

Herald Mar 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Arnold Schoenberg's formal introduction to a Boston public finally took place yesterday afternoon at this week's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Schoenberg conducted his symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," which had been originally scheduled for an earlier concert this season.

It will be difficult for the Boston public to judge this work in an open-minded way. Debussy's opera on the same subject is strongly entrenched in this community, and rightly so. Hearing the Schoenberg work at this late day, one meets it with conscious and unconscious prejudices, for too few will realize that it saw the light of day at approximately the same time as Debussy's uniquely beautiful opera. Too many will regard it as a piece trying to usurp the place in their affections already given to the other work. It seems to us that the only fair way to evaluate it is to go back to 1902-3, when two composers of divergent languages and esthetics were under the sway of the Maeterlinck drama. Perhaps only in this way will the listener give to each work the right to exist. From that basis a worthy appraisal is at least possible.

There is no doubt that Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande" will go down as a great opus, representative of the full maturity of its composer. Schoenberg's future fame will scarcely rest upon his "Pelleas" music. It is the work of a younger artist, who has reached the limit of expression within the means and influences of hand; the work of one who has not yet emerged into his complete individuality.

But, casting unnecessary prejudices aside, there is already recognizable a full mastery and an almost complete achievement of the intentions of a younger artist who deals in literal results, rather than subtle fancies swayed by the intangible. Nothing more radically different from Debussy's musical thought processes could easily be imagined than the Schoenbergian idiom.

The representation of even some of the salient points in Malterlinck's drama has in this case resulted in a work that is, for most people, too long. However, some one once wisely remarked that "terse and aphoristic methods are for older men." One can readily understand the affection that Mr. Schoenberg has for this piece and his desire to play it. It speaks so thoroughly to him of that period in life when one's destiny is still unrealized. It expresses richly the impressions of a sensitive and searching mind; and it reflects the musical language and environment in which Schoenberg found himself at that time.

Mastery of expressive powers, mastery of texture, mastery of instrumentation, are, of course, evident throughout the work. The rich polyphony with which Schoenberg surrounds the themes in his "Pelleas" music, makes it too opaque for some tastes, yet it has moments, within its own style, of a revealing transparency. No one need like the work, but we imagine that Debussy himself would accord it at least a sympathetic hearing, appreciating it because it differs so definitely from his point of view.

Schoenberg is an unaffected, direct and sincere artist. He received an ovation from audience and orchestra yesterday, and he received it almost impersonally. When will Boston hear his "Gurrelieder," or works of more recent date?

Yesterday's program was very well planned. After the Schoenberg, came, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, that marvel of transparent, effortless beauty, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." This most perfect of Schubert's large instrumental works, was interpreted with a persuasive simplicity that disclosed, almost flawlessly, its sublime, pathetic, and sometimes melting qualities. There are details in this symphony, such as the single note on the clarinet, with a wondrous spiral of harmonies revolving underneath, that are in themselves recompense for some of life's hardest moments.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was a masterstroke on this program. It may shock those who take their music solemnly to know that some of the most serious among the world's great musicians regard this as the best symphonic poem by Strauss, just as they prefer "Die Meistersinger" to any other Wagner opera.

"Till" rollicked through his gorgeously grotesque buffooneries in a magnificent performance.

Next week Yehudi Menuhin will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto. There will be a suite of pieces by Domenico Scarlatti, arranged for small orchestra by Alfredo Casella. Further numbers will be Randall Thompson's Second Symphony and three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz.

Amusements

Amusements

Globe Mar 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Arnold Schoenberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a first performance in this city of his symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," yesterday afternoon. The Viennese musician—whose reputation as a teacher of composition and as one of the more striking "ultra-modernist" composers had preceded him to the United States—proved himself an authoritative conductor of his own music. He was greeted by a rising orchestra and at the end of the performance audience and players alike saluted his finely conceived and eloquently delivered reading of a complicated score.

Mr Schoenberg was originally scheduled to conduct a program of his work at a Symphony concert last January, but a sudden injury prevented him from appearing. He had directed "Pelleas" in Cambridge on the evening before, so yesterday's performance was not the first in this locality.

Though "Pelleas and Melisande" was finished at about the same time that Debussy completed his opera on the same subject, a little more than 30 years ago, the two have nothing in common, musically speaking. Schoenberg followed in this score and in his others which had come before, the example of Wagner and Richard Strauss in management of a large orchestra. This work was the last, however, in which he was frankly engaged in finding himself; subsequently he struck out a new path, and thereafter developed the essentially dissonant style which has since made him known wherever symphonic music is played.

Because "Pelleas and Melisande" is so frequently reminiscent of "Tristan" and of the Strauss tone poems, it was disappointing that Mr Schoenberg did not choose to play one of his truly characteristic pieces, the "Five Pieces for Orchestra," the "Kammersymphonie," or the "Music to an Imaginary Cienma," for example. Though "Pelleas" is thus not a masterpiece, it reveals the superb command of a large orchestra, which Mr Schoenberg possessed at the age of 30. It is not to be overlooked, either, that he was largely self-taught in music. In spite of its derivative qualities, "Pelleas" is an imaginative music, a gorgeous contrapuntal fabric, glowing with a multitude of orchestral colors. Where Debussy was content with nebulous suggestion of the fascinating tale of Pelleas, Golaud, and the pathetic Melisande in dim, gray Allemonde, Schoenberg told his version in detail. Graphic, even naive, depiction—such as the trombone glissando and descending chromatic scales tremolo, for the violins—prevails throughout. The better parts are of course those where the beginnings of an individual style are perceived. Yet, curiously, Schoenberg employed the Wagnerian and Straussian styles as if they were natural to him. "Pelleas" is not merely a dilute compound of those masters of 19th Century Romanticism.

Sometimes even such a great orchestra as the Boston Symphony surpasses itself. This occurred yesterday, no less in Mr Schoenberg's work than in the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss, which Dr Koussevitzky conducted. Eloquence was the order of the day. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation of "Till"—one of the best tone poems that Strauss ever wrote—is proverbial, but that of yesterday seemed better than ever. One was truly enthralled. The Schubert Symphony was neither underplayed nor overly dramatized.

Yehudi Menuhin will be heard for this first time in Boston with orchestra at the Symphony concerts next week. He will play the Beethoven Violin Concerto. The program includes Alfredo Casella's transcription for orchestra of excerpts from the piano sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti; three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, and the Second Symphony of Randall Thompson, as yet unheard here. C. W. D.

CENTRAL SQ THEATRE OFFERS 15TH ANNIVERSARY FEATURES

The Central Square Theatre, Cambridge, will celebrate its 15th anniversary during the week, beginning today, with the presentation of screen and stage attractions of unusual interest. The feature films, today and through Tuesday, will be "Carolina" and "Hold That Girl."

The special stage attractions provided by Manager Maurice Corkery will include Jack Miller, organist; Tom Quinn, radio tenor; Ruth MacIntosh, torch singer; Francis Doyle, Priscilla White, the Harvard Rhythm Kings, Bob Mills and Charlie Frank's Orchestra. A news reel will show outstanding events in 1919, the year that the Central Square was opened.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 1 9 1934

GRATIFYING—IF TRUE!

Glad as they are to hear words of sincere praise from a distinguished foreign visitor, many Americans must find it difficult to share in the impression of American concert audiences which Great Britain's Sir Henry Wood is carrying back home with him after his brief stay on this side of the Atlantic.

Sir Henry gained his impression while serving as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From his comment it is evident that he regards the American audience as just about everything an audience should be. "Never have I known an audience to listen in such absolute silence," he declares. "There was not a rustle of a program, not a cough, not a movement of any kind. There was no need to tap my baton before beginning. So soon as I appeared on the platform there was absolute stillness."

What Sir Henry describes is indeed the dream of every orchestra conductor, every concert performer, from coast to coast and from the Canadian boundary to the Rio Grande. Unfortunately, however, the fact remains that for the most part it is only a dream. The special curiosity and respect aroused by a visitor of Sir Henry's eminence may have turned the dream into reality once or twice, but if the noted British conductor were to settle down over here and practice his art permanently he would no doubt be forced to revise his opinion. Perhaps American audiences are no worse than their contemporaries of other nations when it comes to observing the proprieties at concerts, but common experience shows that they are just as accomplished at rustling programs, shifting about in their seats, and conversing in the midst of a grand pianissimo as anyone else. Sir Henry, we fear, has simply happened to see us at our be

---

Mar 19 Trans

Music and Musician

Again Upon A Summit of Music-Making

Bach's Mass by Koussevitzky, The Symphony Orchestra, The Cambridge Choirs

JUBILATIONS and sublimities went mingled through the performance, on Sunday at Symphony Hall, of Bach's Mass in B minor. The jubilations rose from the audience; the sublimities primarily from Bach and, in degree, from his interpreters. Once more the occasion assembled an audience, filling the concert-room at both "sessions" to the last place, numerous with the youth that, beyond its elders, bids fair to be salvation of music in Boston. Though it listened with the utmost attention and quiet, its exuberance was obvious in the first greetings to conductor and solo-singers as they came to the stage, while the chorus, rising in its place, swelled the tumult. At the final measures of the Gloria, which ended the first "session," the applause rang louder and longer; at the close of the whole Mass redoubled yet again, until Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Woodworth (who trained the Cambridge choirs), had returned twice and thrice with the solo-singers. Finally, chorus and orchestra ceased their plaudits for others to receive those they had themselves richly earned.

These ardors were uncommonly good to watch and hear — first when they were directed toward Mr. Woodworth, who had outdone himself in the preparation of the two choirs; second when they affirmed the will of the audience to treat the occasion as concert of music rather than as quasi-religious rite. They were also release and relief to the tension into which the sublimities of the Mass had stretched most that heard.

Certainly the performance excelled any predecessor since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the Mass—in this corner of the world—for the Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival three years ago. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society presented their usual numbers; bore witness by their singing to persistent diligence at voluntary rehearsal. If the tenors of the Glee Club seemed less sonorous than in the past, the basses made amends, alike in tonal volume and quality; while seldom have the sopranos of Radcliffe sung so confidently and warmly, or the altos lent them firmer foundation and deeper contrast. When Bach would scale the heavens with praise the glowing ascents of these women's voices; when he would brood over this office of the Roman Church and his devout reactions to it, the wide phrasing and the deeper tones of the men.

By the evidence of both "sessions," Mr. Woodworth had schooled the chorus to a remarkable flexibility; Dr. Koussevitzky had kindled it with his transmitting energies; while both had infused it with a rhythm vitalizing to the composer and upon his audience. It may be that at moments these young voices fell short of the mass and weight of tone that Bach invites; but an older chorus would have fallen short inevitably of its youthful energy, candor and confidence.

The pages for individual singers lack the range of invention and emotion, the sweep and the splendor of the pages for chorus. The contemplative rather than the overwhelming Bach wrote them; would touch them with subjective beauty rather than objective power. That beauty, even when it is most communicative, as in the tenor's Benedictus or the alto's Agnus dei, belongs to Bach's time and place rather than to the centuries and the world; upon ears of the nineteen-thirties falls a little remote. When these disquisitions in solo or duet miss that appeal, they seem no better than routined. Enough that to the one of the airs aforesaid Mme. Matzenauer lent the breadth and the depth still lingering in her tones; while to the other Mr. Crooks brought his tenor poignancy. Upon Mme. Averino and Mr. McClosky there was only the handicap of voices that needed more volume and warmth to match into the vast scale of the Mass.

The orchestra, now thrice familiar with its part, attained the pungent tone of the woodwinds, the piercing tone of the high trumpets, the propulsive power or the long-drawn beauty of the strings. For the solo instruments Mr. Speyer and Mr. Devergie played the oboi d'amore with keen sense of their penetrating voice; while Mr. Burgin fell not a whit short of the half-pathetic, half ecstatic violin-measures that accompany the tenor's Benedictus. . . . Nowhere did Dr. Koussevitzky's ear and hand fail in the adjustment of the orchestral and the choral tone into one body; while they held the choral parts in as just balance.

For content, clearly the conductor set out the fugal and the polyphonic structure of the Mass; upbuilt it into the Bachian march and power and splendor. He was as alert and eloquent with the figures and the harmonies whence spring Bach's graphic or intensive suggestion, wherewith he weaves, maintains and imposes an atmosphere. He upreared the choruses; gave them motion as well as volume; diversity as well as mass. He missed hardly a delineative stroke. He overwhelmed with objective power; outdrew contemplative beauty or pathos. He kindled the chorus with his own fires, yet measured his heats and theirs. He held the whole music to an elevation that cloaked its occasional pedestrian measures of cantor and kapellmeister at his calling. Above all, he transfused Bach's pages with a ceaseless and irresistible vitality; in spirit and in truth recreated them; whereas he might merely have reverenced and been dull.

Of those pages the praises of God through the Gloria that culminate in the might and majesty of the final chorus; the affirmation of the Christian faith and the recital of the Incarnation and the Crucifixion in the Credo most lay hold upon present audiences. Through the Gloria from the first glowing outburst to the ultimate upsoaring of "Cum sancto spiritu" outsprings Bach, not merely as the contrapuntist, still less as the pietist, but Bach as the unmatched and ever-living tone-poet of joy. Before this Gloria pales every other music of jubilation that man has thus far made.

Through the Credo runs no less the Bach who was dramatizing poet. No matter how familiar and expected, his setting of the church's sentence about the Incarnation pierces the imaginative hearer with mystery and wonder. The hushed woe of the music that prolongs and deepens the phrase of the Crucifixion wrings the listening heart. A moment, and there comes the suspense of the phrase of burial; then the leap into the exultation of the Resurrection. Not only does Jesus burst his grave-clothes upon our ears, he ascends into heaven. Chatter as we may about the classic Bach; cant about him as we may and call it reverence, he remains the triumphant dramatist in tones. As such he joins the tone-poet of joy to achieve the power and the splendor of the Sanctus, heaven and earth, all men and all angels, declaring the glory of God.

Even there the masteries and the marvels do not cease. The Credo assembles in summary the articles of Christian belief. The devout mind and the resourceful hand of Bach transmute these affirmations into music. . . . The mercy of God upon all those that truly seek it, sings out of the Kyrie as this believing spirit shapes and colors the measures. The beauty of the contemplative airs for the Benedictus and the Agnus dei turn the glass to another side of the tone-poet, the Bach who could sing the longings in the hearts of believing men. The final flash of joy through the Osanna; the end in the simple calm of everlasting trust. A monument of music to borrow the commentators' ready phrase, but of how many and how wondrous faces! H. T. P.

Globe Mar 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

Not the least of Dr Koussevitzky's labors which have made us debtors to him during his 10 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been his performances of great choral masterpieces. He has exercised his powers upon the Mass in B Minor by Johann Sebastian Bach, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," and the "German Requiem" of Brahms, colossal works which either had gone unplayed for many years or not at all by the Boston Symphony. Once again, for the fourth time in as many seasons, he conducted Bach's Mass in Symphony Hall yesterday, at a special concert for the benefit of the Orchestra's pension fund.

The choral parts were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both organizations having this year been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth during the absence from Harvard, on a sabbatical year's leave, of Dr Archibald T. Davison. Two of the soloists, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor, had been engaged for the three preceding presentations of the Mass. The other two were Olga Averino, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone. Instrumental solos were played by the following: Richard Burgin, violin; Georg Boettcher, horn, and Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboe d'amore. Albert Snow was organist. Although the player of the difficult part, written so high for trumpet, was unidentified on the program, he was presumably Mr Mager, first trumpet of the Orchestra. The Mass, as in the past, was given in two sections, from 4:30 until shortly before 6, and from 8:30 until a quarter to 10. All seats were taken, and many stood in the lower side aisles.

Though all concerned in the performance were roundly applauded at the end of the first section, the conclusion of the final chorus, "Dona nobis pacem" was a signal for what may best be termed a "demonstration." There were handclapping and cheers, and when Mr Woodworth appeared in tow of Dr Koussevitzky the stamping and yelling must surely have lifted the eaves of Symphony Hall. Though Mr Woodworth remained modestly out of sight during the performance, it was he who did perhaps the hardest work of all—that of preparing the choruses.

His meticulous drilling, the young fresh voices and intelligence of the choristers, and Dr Koussevitzky's dramatic reading contributed most to a truly electrifying performance. Just what all this meant can be fully appreciated only by those cognizant of the nature of the Mass, and of the expressive and technical difficulties involved. Bach's prodigious polyphony is hard to sing, and a conductor is well put to it in keeping vocalists and orchestra together.

The hard-worked cantor of St Thomas' was guided in the creation of his Mass a pervading idea of devotional simplicity, and a lofty spirit of worship. His technical resources may seem to have been slender, and the deceptive purity of his style to have been simple, when compared to the operatic pretensions of Verdi, Gounod and other sons of the 19th century. In a sense he was simple, expressively speaking, where they were concerned with sonorous "effects," but his Mass has retained its essential nobility for two centuries. They now appear to have lacked Bach's spiritual qualities, without which, probably, the Mass could never have been written. This score is as far removed from the conventional (and therefore more or less artificial) oratorio, as can be imagined. Only those who share to a degree the integrity of intellect and the spiritual fineness that was Bach's can fully understand the poignance, the grief, and hope, the upswelling joyous fervor that inform variously such transcendent creations as the contralto aria "Agnus Dei," the choruses "Gloria in Excelsis," "Cum Sancto Spiritu," "Et Resurrexit," "Credo in unum Deo" and "Dona Nobis Pacem."

Dr Koussevitzky's reading bore the qualities of clarity and intensity and excellence of balance between singers and orchestra that have so long been familiar here. Though one suspected that fervor occasionally got the upper hand of devotion, this reading was irresistible. Mr Crooks and Mme Matzenauer—while she was prone to sentimentalize the "Agnus Dei"—proved the finer of the soloists. Yet Mme Averino sang tastefully, and Mr McClosky with obvious pains to make Bach's figuration perfectly clear.

C. W. D.

Post Mar. 19

DOUBLE PENSION CONCERT

Bach's Mass in Two Sessions by Chorus and Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon and evening, at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, aided by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, performed, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the B Minor Mass of Bach. This two-session concert was given in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, and was attended by an audience that filled every place and even overflowed into the aisles.

NINE SOLOISTS

For solo singers this performance of the Mass, the third now to have been given here by these forces, offered Olga Averino, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and David Blair McClosky, baritone. These members of the orchestra were also listed on the programme as soloists: Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboes d'amore, and Georg Boettcher, horn. Albert Snow was the organist.

There is no need at this time to go extensively into a discussion of the Mass itself. Though some devout Bachites will not have it so, the work is no more all sublimity than, to make a secular comparison, Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" is all ecstasy. One need not be unappreciative of the rapt beauty of the "Qui tollis," the exaltation of the "Cum sancto spiritu," the pathos of the "Crucifixus," the charm of the entwining obes d'amore round the baritone voice in the "Et in spiritum sanctum," even while declaring that there are numbers in the Mass which would never have attracted great attention if divorced from their august surroundings, that there are pages that were for Bach but work-a-day counterpoint, that the treatment of the solo voice is sometimes ungrateful.

Singing Noteworthy

The performance yesterday was in many respects the finest of the three which Dr. Koussevitzky has given us. The present chorus, trained this year by G. Wallace Woodworth, approaches more nearly to the standard of a professional body of singers than did any of its predecessors. The tonal quality yesterday in all departments was excellent.

Passages that would be difficult for a solo voice were sung with ease and accuracy by the various choirs, while with Dr. Koussevitzky to inspire them the fervor and devotion of these young singers was but to be expected.

Chorus Applauds Soloists

In the solo singers, again, the performance was especially fortunate. To Mme. Matzenauer, in the first part of the Mass, fell two of the least rewarding of the solo numbers, but she was given a chance to shine in the "Agnus Dei." Mr. Crooks sang with notable beauty of tone; Mme. Averino acquitted herself with distinction, and never has Mr. McClosky appeared here to such good advantage. Of the virtues of the orchestral soloists it is hardly necessary to speak, and the orchestral ensemble was remarkable both for its plasticity and for its tonal beauty.

The enthusiasm at the end of each division of the concert, when the applause of the audience was increased by that of the chorus, could be paralleled only on the other occasions when these collegiate singers have joined forces with the orchestra.

20, 1934 Globe Mar 20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concert last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last but one of the Monday series, provided another example of how a great orchestra can surpass itself under the guidance of a mettlesome leader. After a busy week-end in which it had played its customary two concerts, had rehearsed at least in part some of the music to be heard next Friday and Saturday, and after it had participated in Bach's B Minor Mass, the Boston Symphony turned out three compelling performances last evening. Dr Koussevitzky chose for his program the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams upon a theme by Thomas Tallis; the Violoncello Concerto in D Minor of Lalo, Alfred Zighera, soloist; and Sibelius' Second Symphony, in D major.

However fatigued players and conductor may have been, no evidence of it was heard. A well-proportioned reading of Williams' Fantasia in which strings displayed their usual corruscating tone, added to one's previous conviction that this English composer is no mere eclectic but a man of peculiar gifts.

The Lalo Concerto had not been heard in Symphony Hall since 1927. This is not surprising. Some of the writing for cello is interesting, some of sensuous beauty. After one has come to think (however narrowly) of cello concertos in terms of Haydn, or even of Schumann, Lalo is bound to seem thin. The orchestral accompaniment is reduced to a minimum save for the ingenious repetition of staccato chords in the first movement.

Mr Zighera is a fine cellist and doubtless brought out as much of inherent beauty as would be possible. His tone is to be envied: smooth and round and never "dry." A few errors of intonation did not lessen the merit of his playing. A pleased audience greeted him cordially.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius impresses deeper at every hearing. It is not Sibelius at his mature best, yet the influence of Tchaikovsky that pervaded his First Symphony was largely escaped in the Second. More of a fantasia than a duly "developed" symphony in early 19th-Century fashion, perhaps, its numerous short themes are striking.

C. W. D.

Concert-Chronicle

Kousevitzkian Monday

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening comprised Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for double string orchestra; Lalo's Concerto in D minor for Violoncello and Orchestra, with Mr. Alfred Zighera as soloist; the second symphony of Sibelius.

Once again one admired the genius of Vaughan Williams in these variations. Certainly nowhere has he excelled this music, and there may be some doubt whether he ever equalled it. Nor can one for the moment think of anything written for strings alone, which shows their great and varied tonal and coloristic beauty in like degree. Full strings, semi-orchestra at the back, individual solo voices, each adds its particular effect. From a deep-toned, grave beauty to an ethereal and luminous brightness they ranged. Churchly music it is, and to hear Dr. Koussevitzky conducting one might have thought that he had been a church musician all his life, thus perfectly did he discover and transmit the essential mood of this music.

Lalo's concerto runs through a prelude and Allegro maestoso, an Intermezzo, an Introduction followed by a Rondo. It is music of and for the 'cello. And Mr. Zighera missed none of the opportunities which it gave him. His tone last evening seemed not particularly large but of exceeding good quality. Songful measures came lyrically and sweetly rather than largely and broadly. Indeed one can suspect that such was Lalo's intention with this concerto. For the rest, at the technical display, at the rhythmical intricacy, Mr. Zighera showed himself a past master. In the orchestral portion tricky passages by way of accompaniment are frequent. Yet from the playing of the orchestra one would never have suspected the pitfalls with which this score is strewn. Soloist and orchestra combined in performance worthy of the highest praise.

And once more were the beauties of Sibelius's Second Symphony unfolded. For many this is the favorite among the symphonies of Sibelius: It is more individual, more a thing of the essential Sibelius than the First Symphony; it does not make upon the listener the demands of the later symphonies. On comfortable middle ground he here finds himself. And what a thing of loveliness this whole symphony is: the first movement, racy of the folk, full of tremendous surgings; the slow movement with its haunting, darksome song; the scherzo with its bustle and its wondrous song; the finale with its upswelling climaxes, its long stretches of grinding tragedy, its glorious conclusion! To none can one give higher place as interpreter of Sibelius than to Dr. Koussevitzky. Last evening was renewed proof of it.

A. H. M.

Post

DAY, MARCH 20, 19.

FIFTH MONDAY OF SYMPHONY

Sibelius' Second Given Remarkable Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at the fifth of the current series of Monday Symphony Concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky gave renewed proof of the seemingly inexhaustible supply of the vitality and enthusiasm that is his. The afternoon and evening before he had given generously of himhelf in the performance of Bach's B minor mass, yet last evening he could lead the orchestra through the Second Symphony of Sibelius in a performance that, even more than its predecessors, seemed to disclose the very heart of the music. Again the final climax, one of the mightiest in all music, swept all before it, and an audience, visibly stirred, clapped and stamped its approval.

For beginning the programme offered Vaughan Williams' churchly Fantasia for strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis. So understandingly did Dr. Koussevitzky read this and the only other composition of Williams that he has conducted here, the First Norfolk Rhapsody, that it would be a matter for surprise were he to continue to leave to Mr. Burgin the conducting of the "London" and "Pastoral" Symphonies.

Between Williams and Sibelius, and somewhat overshadowed by those two powerful musical individualities, came the Lalo of the Concerto in D minor for Violoncello and Orchestra. The solo part last evening was played, and admirably, by Alfred Zighera, who, with Mr. Bedetti, shares the first desk of the orchestra's 'cello section. Well known here as a sensitive and discerning musician as well as an accomplished virtuoso, a serious and substantial artist, Mr. Zighera did for Lalo's agreeable if

---

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

Yesterday evening in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the fifth concert in the Monday night series. Alfred Zighera, violin-cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Vaughn-Williams..Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra
Lalo..........Concerlo in D minor for 'cello
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2 in D major

Comparisons are never invidious when they are complimentary to those who will read the effort. Therefore we may indulge in a comparison (with the one-half of it veiled in the customary mystery) the better to praise Mr. Zighera. Some years ago a 'cellist played with the orchestra, seized an innocent Haydn Concerto and lashed it with his vigorous bowing into something distinctly resembling Tschaikowsky, but remote from Hadn. Such a performer was only a virtuoso; Mr. Zighera is also an artist. As a result we hear this really beautiful Lalo Concerto as it was intended, and at the same time we feel confident that Mr. Zighera would have brought the same integrity to whatever he played and would not have sacrificed Lalo or any other on the altar of his virtuosity. The point of such a prelude is that an audience is often prone to let a brilliant importation blind it to the more honest and equally brilliant playing of an artist, who is known in the orchestra.

Since the easy method of a comparison has been introduced, there is another that occurs to mind in connection with the Vaughn-Williams Fantasia. To be sure it is, as the late Mr. Irving Babbitt insisted, a useless tendency to confuse the arts. But the similarity in intention between Vaughn-Williams and the late laureate, Robert Bridges, is rather striking. There is in each the same intense honesty, the same predeliction for classic forms and thought, the same isolation from the present. Vaughn-Williams in this peculiarly dignified Fantasia builds his modal harmonies on the theme and in the spirit of his 16th century model. In like manner Bridges wrote much of his poetry.

The concert ended with a performance of Sibelius's well-known 2nd Symphony. It is a work which, even if it had not been played several times this season, has no obscurities to discuss.

A. W. W.

Incidents and Prospects

Randall Thompson's new symphony, originally announced for first performances in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, then withdrawn, will be heard at the concerts of next week on Maunday Thursday and Easter Even. Since the Trustees of the orchestra have put by the musical calendar for the church-calendar, this department hastens to use the appropriate designations. By all accounts the new symphony is high-spirited, light-handed music.

Like Dr. Koussevitzky, most conductors in England chose the Prelude to Elgar's oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," as memorial piece at their first concerts after his death. . . . Dr. Davison has received a grant from academic funds enabling him "to continue work on a dictionary of choral composers and a bibliography for a history of choral music."

Jw Mar 20

Vorlds

Fine Program Given by Symphony

Zighera Is Soloist; Sibelius Symphony Played

Philip Hale, the eminent music critic, last season remarked in effect that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations of music by Sibelius were the finest in the world. Hearing last evening's performance of the composer's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Mr. Hale might have repeated his statement, for the music was played in an unforgetable manner.

The Sibelius second symphony, however, was only the second half of a delightful program, well arranged, that took up the two hours of the fifth and next to last of the regular Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall.

The first part included Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra and Lalo's D minor concerto for violincello and orchestra. The soloist was Alfred Zighera, violoncellist, who, with Jean Bedetti, occupies the first desk of the violoncello section of the orchestra.

Despite the charm of the Vaughan William Fantasia for strings and the virtuoso skill displayed by Zighera with the violincello, Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius once again dominated the concert. Sibelius today is undoubtedly the greatest living composer of symphonies. Last year Dr. Koussevitzky played them all and in order. This season only occasionally is an audience rewarded by one of the conductor's brilliant readings.

The second symphony of the noted Finnish composer is an especially interesting one, being considered both pastoral and patriotic in theme, and marking the beginning of a new line of musical thought. In it Sibelius casts aside all romantic feeling and starts the development of a simple, at times bare, ruggedness that in his later symphonies becomes characteristic of his writings.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia has not been played here very often and one is inclined to wonder why. It is delightful music for strings. The stringed section of the regular orchestra is divided into two smaller groups of strings which perform together, separately, and sometimes with one serving as almost an echo for the other. That it was beautifully played goes almost without saying, yet mention should indeed be made of the fact for ordinarily one would have expected a let down in both orchestra and conductor after the tremendous performance of the Bach B minor Mass on Sunday.

To have a position at a first desk in any section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is indication enough of ability. Thus an unusually good performance is assured when one of these men comes forward from among the others to play the solo part in a concerto. So it was last evening, with the distinguished violoncellist Zighera being greeted with expectant applause at the beginning of the Lalo work and with enthusiastic appreciation at its conclusion.

The sixth and final concert of this series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given Monday evening, April 23 at 8:15 o'clock.

W. T. C., Jr.

CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAR 21 1934

Mrs. Lincoln Filene, who spent most of the Winter with Mr. Filene, one of the N. R. A. industrial advisors, in their suite at the Shoreham, left today for her home in Weston, Mass., where she will give a tea Sunday in honor of Dr. Serge Koussivitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Arnold Shoenberg, modern composer who recently returned to Boston from Europe. Mrs. Filene will return to the Shoreham early next week, and expects to entertain in Washington for Dr. Koussivitsky when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert here April 5.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The attractive announcement of next season's symphony concert series, sent out by the Bushnell Memorial, gives a reproduction of a remarkable photograph of Dr. Koussevitsky, in actual action as a conductor, taken by Mr. J. B. Sanroma. Dr. Koussevitsky is, to me, the prince and paragon of orchestral conductors, and I recall that when, years ago, I first came under his spell, he seemed to me, as he has seemed ever since, a high priest of music. This photograph carries a special appeal for me, because it features, so to speak the potent, magic little finger of Dr. Koussevitsky's left hand. In the old days before the existence of the Bushnell Memorial, when so many great concerts were given in the Capitol Theater, it used to be my good fortune to occupy, year after year, the forefront seat of the lower box at stage left, and so I used to come almost under the sweep of Dr. Koussevitsky's little finger, as he made it do incredible feats in the guidance of his men. With his left little finger Dr. Koussevitsky encouraged, coaxed commanded and beckoned. In sheer physical grace Dr. Koussevitsky is, I think, comparable to a great dancer. His command of his muscles, the serene ample dignity of his every gesture and movement, I have never seen approached by any other conductor. It is my hope that some day the Minneapolis symphony orchestra, under its enterprising young conductor, Mr. Eugene Ormandy, may be heard in Hartford; the work of this fine orchestra is already familiar to radio listeners, and for years the Minneapolis orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Henri Verbrughen, ranked as one of the leading orchestras of the country, after the great trio, The Boston, the Philadelphia and the New York Philharmonic.

Menuhin Fills The Symphony Concert Full

Beethoven in Young Rapture, Mozart in Young Sympathy, Prelude and Postlude

THERE WAS a prelude at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon—the twelfth, in G minor, of Handel's Concerti Grossi, played by the string choir in full, or nearly full, numbers. Handel, it seems, may not be too sonorous, even from a twentieth-century orchestra. There was a postlude as well—the two dances and the Rákóczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Familiar is the adjective usually awaiting them; but out of use for the moment since Dr. Koussevitzky has played them seldom during his ten years at Symphony Hall. Perhaps he has been reserving them for the performance of the whole "dramatic legend," which he has long had in mind, but never brought to pass.

Now the economies of the trustees, again the preparation of the Cambridge choirs, stood in the way. As for the economies, no one who has had experience of choral concerts in Boston doubts for a moment that a performance of "The Damnation," and under Dr. Koussevitzky, would fill Symphony Hall to the last seat, might even be repeated. As to the Cambridge choirs, report again runs that they will set to "The Damnation" next autumn under Dr. Davison returned from a year's absence. If so, expectation may again run high. . . . To return to the prelude and the postlude, all between was the playing of two violin-concertos, neither short, in which Yehudi Menuhin appeared for the first time at these concerts.

As for the Concerto Grosso, it was one more such piece from Handel; while eighteenth-century numbers, when there are whole books of them, have a wondrously persistent kinship. Once more came slow and stately introduction; spirited allegro, thick and lively with figures; wide-curving, deep-voiced, gravely moving instrumental song; quick-running and amply figured close. The only variation from type was a short, transitional, slow movement preceding the finale. Once more, likewise, the string choir sounded this music with equal plasticity and precision; shaped phrases, set in accents, without flaw; ran the rich gamut of its tone. Yet again Dr. Koussevitzky "read" the whole concerto lucidly, at a revealing pace, with plausible and unforced shadings upon accent and sonority.

All things worked together for good, but all things also came and went exactly as expected. There is no possible surprise, nowadays, in these Concerti Grossi. They tend to become the beginning and the end of symphonic Handel. Yet he wrote a "Fireworks-Music," a "Water-Music," overtures and ballet-pieces. Now and then Sir Thomas Beecham, who is also busy conductor, shepherds one or another into present concert-halls. In these days when eighteenth-century music flourishes, the Handelian repertory needs extension—and variety.

After nearly two hours of the classics—Handel, Mozart and Beethoven—the romantical, high-colored Berlioz was uncommonly good to hear. The three pieces might also pass as foretaste of what Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will accomplish when at last they undertake the whole "Damnation." The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps was all flickering figures and sinister sweep, well nigh perfect Berlioz in the mingling of graphic surface and uncanny implication. Sensuous and elusive sounded the waltz of the sylphs around the sleeping Faust, from a Berlioz flowing with such imagination rather than with deliberate will. Finally, the rhythms and thunders of the Hungarian March, hackneyed though they are, seemed uncommonly stirring to hear after the tender graces of the juvenile Mozart and the maturer graces of the Beethoven of the violin-concerto. Though the concert did not end till twenty minutes to five, the final fifteen minutes were not the least stimulating to hear.

All else was Mr. Menuhin's, delightful to hear, delightful to observe. Twice before the young violinist had played to Bostonians in recitals of his own; on both occasions to the top of his bent but to audiences that might have been larger, to applause that might have been warmer. Within the fortnight the "socially important," foregathered of a morning at Hotel Statler, honored him with their attention, but generated little excitement. Now, with the hall-mark of the Symphony Concerts upon him, he could be safely risked even in this cautious town—and made furore.

Applause of welcome, applause between the movements of each concerto, applause at the close, all in steady crescendo. The thrice-returning Menuhin, modest, grateful, but also cool-poised; the pantomime with the conductor, the pantomime with the orchestra; occasional shouts from floor or gallery, the shuffling and stamping of feet which, at the Symphony Concerts, is the ultimate expression of general joy. After nearly all the other seats of music, Boston was at last discovering—and approving—Mr. Menuhin. Surely there should be a double-column headline in today's journals. . . . And by a door under the balcony, the paternal Menuhin, pale, slender, spectacled, the Jewish schoolmaster that he used to be, listening intently to his son or hastening backstage to tend him. "Dear Yehudi, Yehudi darling," as our excitable young were shrilling at each other. So much for the record.

Mr. Menuhin played first the recently discovered "Adelaide Concerto" ascribed to Mozart at the age of ten; written to please a princess royal of France and to prove to Parisian doubters his juvenile prowess. So go legend, report and publisher's circulars. There are already mild doubters who descry in the manuscript an eighteenth-century rather than a Mozartian piece and speculate upon what Monsieur Casadesus may have done to it in his editing. (What Herr Hindemith has accomplished in his cadenzas is clear enough—the insertion of a later and different music in voice and style). Others hail it "as palpably by a child of genius."

Into this budding dispute of the learned and the profound, a casual reviewer need not enter. Sufficient for him were the simple grace, the instinctive felicities, of the first movement; the ingratiating lyric flow and tender fancy of the slow division, the elegant lightness and liveliness of the finale. It was also easy to remember that eighteenth-century music, especially of the courtly sort, has a trick of seeming all of a pattern and all of a mood, whether the workaday Mozart or a lesser hand put it to paper. His concertos, at whatever age they were written, are not the operatic overtures or the three final symphonies.

As it is, the pleasure that the "Adelaide Concerto" diffuses justifies the playing of it, a pleasure that Mr. Menuhin steadily heightened. He adjusted his technical means to a simple, thin-bodied music; while Dr. Koussevitzky kept him company with a little orchestra of strings, oboes, horns, handled most adroitly. The violinist's tone could hardly have been lighter or more transparent. Mozart's measures—to use a devitalized word in a living sense—purled from his bow and strings. He kept the melodic line in flowing motion; like happy and delicate fancies set in the ornament.

Agree that this ten-year-old Mozart "lisped in numbers; for the numbers came": but the maturer Menuhin touched the slow movement with a pretty, but not prettyfied, sentiment that a child even of genius, might hardly know. Light and clean went the accents and turns of the final rondo. Throughout there was reason to marvel at the musical perception with which Mr. Menuhin maintained the spontaneity of the concerto; the musical sensibility with which he answered to every detail; the young grace that he infused into the whole. Freshly across a concert-hall of the twentieth century sounded this music of a salon in the eighteenth. To him, thus early, has come the sense of style that assimilates, characters and projects a given music in its life and in its image. Usually it is the last gift of the muses.

Between Mr. Menuhin and Dr. Koussevitzky, the performance of Beethoven's Concerto was as remarkable as that from Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck in another heyday of the Symphony Concerts, as that from Mr. Heifetz and the present conductor within more recent memory. For the hundredth time, as it seemed, Dr. Koussevitzky was unfailingly sensitive in the adjustment of the background of the orchestra to the foreground of the violin; in the mellowing and the shading of euphonies, in the keeping of a just balance through a concerto that is neither wholly symphonic nor wholly displayful.

As for Mr. Menuhin, at the outset of the first movement he struck out a bold, vitalizing, searching tone; for the second theme subdued it into meditative beauty. His rhythm animated every measure of the finale where not a few need such exhilaration. Phrase into phrase, period into period, rose the first movement. No labored intricacy, no uncertain progress hindered the lordly flow; no obscurity once clouded the course. In turn the exactions of the cadenza became a glow of rhapsody. The ornament with which, in the slow movement, the violinist must decorate the dreamful orchestral song, ran light and luminous; while a measured loveliness filled the violinist's brief moments with the melody.

Everywhere technique and intonation were flawless; but they remained the means by which Mr. Menuhin would work Beethoven's will with the music, while in his own image he also disclosed it. He played not only in clear understanding and warm imagination but with rare self-devotion. In the maturities of Kreisler in prime, in the luminous purities of the present Heifetz, Bostonians have known Beethoven's Concerto. Now they heard it from Mr. Menuhin in youthful rapture.

H. T. P.

125

Mar 20

Vorlds

Fine Program Given by Symphony

Zighera Is Soloist; Sibelius Symphony Played

Philip Hale, the eminent music critic, last season remarked in effect that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations of music by Sibelius were the finest in the world. Hearing last evening's performance of the composer's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Mr. Hale might have repeated his statement, for the music was played in an unforgetable manner.

The Sibelius second symphony, however, was only the second half of a delightful program, well arranged, that took up the two hours of the fifth and next to last of the regular Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall.

The first part included Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra and Lalo's D minor concerto for violincello and orchestra. The soloist was Alfred Zighera, violoncellist, who, with Jean Bedetti, occupies the first desk of the violoncello section of the orchestra.

Despite the charm of the Vaughan William Fantasia for strings and the virtuoso skill displayed by Zighera with the violincello, Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius once again dominated the concert. Sibelius today is undoubtedly the greatest living composer of symphonies. Last year Dr. Koussevitzky played them all and in order. This season only occasionally is an audience rewarded by one of the conductor's brilliant readings.

The second symphony of the noted Finnish composer is an especially interesting one, being considered both pastoral and patriotic in theme, and marking the beginning of a new line of musical thought. In it Sibelius casts aside all romantic feeling and starts the development of a simple, at times bare, ruggedness that in his later symphonies becomes characteristic of his writings.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia has not been played here very often and one is inclined to wonder why. It is delightful music for strings. The stringed section of the regular orchestra is divided into two smaller groups of strings which perform together, separately, and sometimes with one serving as almost an echo for the other. That it was beautifully played goes almost without saying, yet mention should indeed be made of the fact for ordinarily one would have expected a let down in both orchestra and conductor after the tremendous performance of the Bach B minor Mass on Sunday.

To have a position at a first desk in any section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is indication enough of ability. Thus an unusually good performance is assured when one of these men comes forward from among the others to play the solo part in a concerto. So it was last evening, with the distinguished violoncellist Zighera being greeted with expectant applause at the beginning of the Lalo work and with enthusiastic appreciation at its conclusion.

The sixth and final concert of this series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given Monday evening, April 23 at 8:15 o'clock.

W. T. C., Jr.

CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAR 21 1934

Mrs. Lincoln Filene, who spent most of the Winter with Mr. Filene, one of the N. R. A. industrial advisors, in their suite at the Shoreham, left today for her home in Weston, Mass., where she will give a tea Sunday in honor of Dr. Serge Koussivitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Arnold Shoenberg, modern composer who recently returned to Boston from Europe. Mrs. Filene will return to the Shoreham early next week, and expects to entertain in Washington for Dr. Koussivitsky when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert here April 5.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The attractive announcement of next season's symphony concert series, sent out by the Bushnell Memorial, gives a reproduction of a remarkable photograph of Dr. Koussevitsky, in actual action as a conductor, taken by Mr. J. B. Sanroma. Dr. Koussevitsky is, to me, the prince and paragon of orchestral conductors, and I recall that when, years ago, I first came under his spell, he seemed to me, as he has seemed ever since, a high priest of music. This photograph carries a special appeal for me, because it features, so to speak the potent, magic little finger of Dr. Koussevitsky's left hand. In the old days before the existence of the Bushnell Memorial, when so many great concerts were given in the Capitol Theater, it used to be my good fortune to occupy, year after year, the forefront seat of the lower box at stage left, and so I used to come almost under the sweep of Dr. Koussevitsky's little finger, as he made it do incredible feats in the guidance of his men. With his left little finger Dr. Koussevitsky encouraged, coaxed commanded and beckoned. In sheer physical grace Dr. Koussevitsky is, I think, comparable to a great dancer. His command of his muscles, the serene ample dignity of his every gesture and movement, I have never seen approached by any other conductor. It is my hope that some day the Minneapolis symphony orchestra, under its enterprising young conductor, Mr. Eugene Ormandy, may be heard in Hartford; the work of this fine orchestra is already familiar to radio listeners, and for years the Minneapolis orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Henri Verbrughen, ranked as one of the leading orchestras of the country, after the great trio, The Boston, the Philadelphia and the New York Philharmonic.

Menuhin Fills The Symphony Concert Full

Beethoven in Young Rapture, Mozart in Young Sympathy, Prelude and Postlude

THERE WAS a prelude at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon—the twelfth, in G minor, of Handel's Concerti Grossi, played by the string choir in full, or nearly full, numbers. Handel, it seems, may not be too sonorous, even from a twentieth-century orchestra. There was a postlude as well—the two dances and the Rákóczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Familiar is the adjective usually awaiting them; but out of use for the moment since Dr. Koussevitzky has played them seldom during his ten years at Symphony Hall. Perhaps he has been reserving them for the performance of the whole "dramatic legend," which he has long had in mind, but never brought to pass.

Now the economies of the trustees, again the preparation of the Cambridge choirs, stood in the way. As for the economies, no one who has had experience of choral concerts in Boston doubts for a moment that a performance of "The Damnation," and under Dr. Koussevitzky, would fill Symphony Hall to the last seat, might even be repeated. As to the Cambridge choirs, report again runs that they will set to "The Damnation" next autumn under Dr. Davison returned from a year's absence. If so, expectation may again run high. . . . To return to the prelude and the postlude, all between was the playing of two violin-concertos, neither short, in which Yehudi Menuhin appeared for the first time at these concerts.

As for the Concerto Grosso, it was one more such piece from Handel; while eighteenth-century numbers, when there are whole books of them, have a wondrously persistent kinship. Once more came slow and stately introduction; spirited allegro, thick and lively with figures; wide-curving, deep-voiced, gravely moving instrumental song; quick-running and amply figured close. The only variation from type was a short, transitional, slow movement preceding the finale. Once more, likewise, the string choir sounded this music with equal plasticity and precision; shaped phrases, set in accents, without flaw; ran the rich gamut of its tone. Yet again Dr. Koussevitzky "read" the whole concerto lucidly, at a revealing pace, with plausible and unforced shadings upon accent and sonority.

All things worked together for good, but all things also came and went exactly as expected. There is no possible surprise, nowadays, in these Concerti Grossi. They tend to become the beginning and the end of symphonic Handel. Yet he wrote a "Fireworks-Music," a "Water-Music," overtures and ballet-pieces. Now and then Sir Thomas Beecham, who is also busy conductor, shepherds one or another into present concert-halls. In these days when eighteenth-century music flourishes, the Handelian repertory needs extension—and variety.

After nearly two hours of the classics—Handel, Mozart and Beethoven—the romantical, high-colored Berlioz was uncommonly good to hear. The three pieces might also pass as foretaste of what Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will accomplish when at last they undertake the whole "Damnation." The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps was all flickering figures and sinister sweep, well nigh perfect Berlioz in the mingling of graphic surface and uncanny implication. Sensuous and elusive sounded the waltz of the sylphs around the sleeping Faust, from a Berlioz flowing with such imagination rather than with deliberate will. Finally, the rhythms and thunders of the Hungarian March, hackneyed though they are, seemed uncommonly stirring to hear after the tender graces of the juvenile Mozart and the maturer graces of the Beethoven of the violin-concerto. Though the concert did not end till twenty minutes to five, the final fifteen minutes were not the least stimulating to hear.

All else was Mr. Menuhin's, delightful to hear, delightful to observe. Twice before the young violinist had played to Bostonians in recitals of his own; on both occasions to the top of his bent but to audiences that might have been larger, to applause that might have been warmer. Within the fortnight the "socially important," foregathered of a morning at Hotel Statler, honored him with their attention, but generated little excitement. Now, with the hall-mark of the Symphony Concerts upon him, he could be safely risked even in this cautious town—and made furore.

Applause of welcome, applause between the movements of each concerto, applause at the close, all in steady crescendo. The thrice-returning Menuhin, modest, grateful, but also cool-poised; the pantomime with the conductor, the pantomime with the orchestra; occasional shouts from floor or gallery, the shuffling and stamping of feet which, at the Symphony Concerts, is the ultimate expression of general joy. After nearly all the other seats of music, Boston was at last discovering—and approving—Mr. Menuhin. Surely there should be a double-column headline in today's journals. . . . And by a door under the balcony, the paternal Menuhin, pale, slender, spectacled, the Jewish schoolmaster that he used to be, listening intently to his son or hastening backstage to tend him. "Dear Yehudi, Yehudi darling," as our excitable young were shrilling at each other. So much for the record.

Mr. Menuhin played first the recently discovered "Adelaide Concerto" ascribed to Mozart at the age of ten; written to please a princess royal of France and to prove to Parisian doubters his juvenile prowess. So go legend, report and publisher's circulars. There are already mild doubters who descry in the manuscript an eighteenth-century rather than a Mozartian piece and speculate upon what Monsieur Casadesus may have done to it in his editing. (What Herr Hindemith has accomplished in his cadenzas is clear enough—the insertion of a later and different music in voice and style). Others hail it "as palpably by a child of genius."

Into this budding dispute of the learned and the profound, a casual reviewer need not enter. Sufficient for him were the simple grace, the instinctive felicities, of the first movement; the ingratiating lyric flow and tender fancy of the slow division, the elegant lightness and liveliness of the finale. It was also easy to remember that eighteenth-century music, especially of the courtly sort, has a trick of seeming all of a pattern and all of a mood, whether the workaday Mozart or a lesser hand put it to paper. His concertos, at whatever age they were written, are not the operatic overtures or the three final symphonies.

As it is, the pleasure that the "Adelaide Concerto" diffuses justifies the playing of it, a pleasure that Mr. Menuhin steadily heightened. He adjusted his technical means to a simple, thin-bodied music; while Dr. Koussevitzky kept him company with a little orchestra of strings, oboes, horns, handled most adroitly. The violinist's tone could hardly have been lighter or more transparent. Mozart's measures—to use a devitalized word in a living sense—purled from his bow and strings. He kept the melodic line in flowing motion; like happy and delicate fancies set in the ornament.

Agree that this ten-year-old Mozart "lisped in numbers; for the numbers came"; but the maturer Menuhin touched the slow movement with a pretty, but not prettyfied, sentiment that a child even of genius, might hardly know. Light and clean went the accents and turns of the final rondo. Throughout there was reason to marvel at the musical perception with which Mr. Menuhin maintained the spontaneity of the concerto; the musical sensibility with which he answered to every detail; the young grace that he infused into the whole. Freshly across a concert-hall of the twentieth century sounded this music of a salon in the eighteenth. To him, thus early, has come the sense of style that assimilates, characters and projects a given music in its life and in its image. Usually it is the last gift of the muses.

Between Mr. Menuhin and Dr. Koussevitzky, the performance of Beethoven's Concerto was as remarkable as that from Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck in another heyday of the Symphony Concerts, as that from Mr Heifetz and the present conductor within more recent memory. For the hundredth time, as it seemed, Dr. Koussevitzky was unfailingly sensitive in the adjustment of the background of the orchestra to the foreground of the violin; in the mellowing and the shading of euphonies, in the keeping of a just balance through a concerto that is neither wholly symphonic nor wholly displayful.

As for Mr. Menuhin, at the outset of the first movement he struck out a bold, vitalizing, searching tone; for the second theme subdued it into meditative beauty. His rhythm animated every measure of the finale where not a few need such exhilaration. Phrase into phrase, period into period, rose the first movement. No labored intricacy, no uncertain progress hindered the lordly flow; no obscurity once clouded the course. In turn the exactions of the cadenza became a glow of rhapsody. The ornament with which, in the slow movement, the violinist must decorate the dreamful orchestral song, ran light and luminous; while a measured loveliness filled the violinist's brief moments with the melody.

Everywhere technique and intonation were flawless; but they remained the means by which Mr. Menuhin would work Beethoven's will with the music, while in his own image he also disclosed it. He played not only in clear understanding and warm imagination but with rare self-devotion. In the maturities of Kreisler in prime, in the luminous purities of the present Heifetz, Bostonians have known Beethoven's Concerto. Now they heard it from Mr. Menuhin in youthful rapture.

H. T. P.

126

Mar 24

STON POST, SATUR

BOY OF 17 SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Menuhin Plays Work of Ten-Year-Old Mozart

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Unusual enthusiasm was aroused by Yehudi Menuhin's playing of the Violin Concerto of Beethoven at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Yet the real high point of the concert had come earlier in the initial disclosure hereabouts of the long overlooked, newly published "Adelaide" Concerto of the 10-year-old Mozart.

DAY OF CONCERTOS

This was an afternoon of concertos. Before Mozart's had come Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, in B minor, last of the 12 composed in London in 1739 and first introduced to Symphony Hall by Dr. Koussevitzky. As final respite from so much classicism the conductor offered the three familiar excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps, the Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March.

The story of Mozart's Concerto as engagingly told in Mr. Burke's programme note is a romantic one. It was composed in Paris for the Princess Adelaide, eldest daughter of Louis XV., herself a violinist. The only copy of this charming, surprisingly mature work was entrusted by the princess to her lady-in-waiting, Mme. Montmorency, when the French Revolution caused the ladies of the court to flee to Italy in 1791. Thorugh generations this Concerto was preserved in the Montmorency family and only recently has it been made public property. Originally in skeleton form, the Concerto was scored for strings, oboes and horns by Marius Casadesus, supplied with three cadenzas by Paul Hindemith and published by the house of Schott.

Mature Work of a Child

In this form it came to Boston yesterday. Making due allowance for the editing it has received and for M. Casadesus' felicitious quasi-Mozartean orchestration, the Concerto remains a remarkable production for a child composer. The slow movement has rare melodic charm, even for Mozart; the final Rondo is captivatingly tuneful and sprightly. Indeed, many a full-grown composer of Mozart's day would have been proud to sign the work as it now stands.

Soloist but 17

Mr. Menuhin, who is but seven years older than was Mozart when this Concerto was written, played it flawlessly, with fine appreciation of its content and style. For a young man of 17 the ensuing performance of Beethoven's Concerto was a remarkable achievement. Almost did it cause the listener to forget the violinist's tender years. The first movement had breadth and dignity, the second its proper tranquil beauty. Over its measures Mr. Menuhin, and Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, too, shed a luminous tone.

The last movement was played with a sturdy energy that largely redeemed the triteness of its chief theme. Only in this finale, however, was Mr. Menuhin's playing truthfully to be described as having full mastery and authority. With the two preceding movements, especially the Larghetto, came the suggestion of a serious and sensitive young man a little awed and abashed in the presence of greatness. Such reverence becomes Mr. Menuhin; it speaks well for his future. But it was hardly conducive to revealing performance of the music. That will come, no doubt, in due time.

Handel and Berlioz

The performance of Handel's Concerto with its noble Larghetto was of the high order that we have come to expect from Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, as was in turn that of the music of Berlioz. The latter again reminded one of the highly personal quality of Berlioz's orchestration, which in nearly a century has found many emulators but no successful imitators.

Properly the Hungarian March belongs to the Pops, but yesterday's audience heard it delightedly.

MUSIC

Her. Mar 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Mozart, Violin Concerto in D ("Adelaide Concerto"); Beethoven, Violin Concerto; Berlioz, Three Excerpts from the Damnation of Faust: Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs, Hungarian March (Rakoczy). Conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Yehudi Menuhin.

Boston turned out in great numbers for yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Through the generous co-operation of Dr. Koussevitzky, two violin concertos, instead of one, made Yehudi Menuhin the chief attraction of the afternoon. He played, besides the Beethoven Violin Concerto, the so-called "Adelaide Concerto" by Mozart. It was the first orchestral performance of the latter work in the United States. This concerto was written when Mozart was but 10 years of age, and dedicated to Princess Adelaide, eldest daughter of Louis XV. The manuscript was found in unplayable form and has been orchestrated with almost uncanny cleverness by Marius Casadesus. Schott has recently published it with three cadenzas by Paul Hindemith.

The gods have been good to Yehudi Menuhin. Besides giving him great musical gifts they have carefully watched over his career from his earliest boyhood. He has had the good fortune to come under the influence of people of vision, among whom Louis Persinger is by no means the least. Under his guidance young Menuhin's talents were started in the right direction and most carefully nurtured. Since then his other masters have been Adolf Busch and Georges Enesco, both of whom have had much to do with his remarkable development. He has had, besides this, the guidance of wise and thoughtful friends and has proved entirely worthy of their devotion.

This reviewer has watched his career with unusual interest, having heard his first appearance with orchestra, when he played—if our memory is not at fault—Lalo's Violin Concerto, with the San Francisco Symphony. Today this same Yehudi Menuhin is on the threshold of manhood and at a point in his career that will be a time of the greatest testing. He will soon leave the prodigy class. What he accomplishes in the next few years will determine his future artistic status. His friends have little to fear. All signs point to a completely successful weathering of this critical period. He comes before his public sound and virile in mind and body and with an attitude towards his art that proclaims him a musical aristocrat.

There are features in Mozart's "Adelaide Concerto" that are incredibly mature, even for young Mozart. To hear Menuhin play it with his unfailing sense of proportion, and with the beautifully balanced accompaniment provided yesterday, is an experience at once delightful and touching. Menuhin's tone is of such beautiful quality, his appreciation of the youthful spirit of the work so sure, his technical and dynamic resources so wonderfully controlled, that the result is little short of perfection.

The Beethoven concerto disclosed an entirely different Menuhin, one whose astonishing discernment of the significance of that great work made one forget, for the most part, that a boy of 17 years was playing. There are perplexing moments in the first movement that have not yet yielded all their secrets to Menuhin, but that is as it should be. If he played the Beethoven at 17 as other violinists (who also were prodigies) have played it at 40, it would be distinctly unwholesome. The slow movement is one of the most heavenly episodes in all music. The purity and serenity of Menuhin's reading of it were entirely worthy of the movement. And the final movement had such rhythmic verve and technical and tonal facility as to make the ovation given Menuhin at the end seem the most natural thing in the world.

To all his musical qualities Menuhin adds the charm of manly courtesy and unspoiled character. He rightly insisted on Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra sharing honors with him. With complete self-abnegation, Dr. Koussevitzky devoted his own great gifts to the success of his young colleague.

The concert opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra. In this work the elements of concerto style are carried out by tuttis for all the strings, and alternating sections devoted to a solo group. When Handel writes at the top of his form, the result is music of great nobility. As an interpreter of Handel, Dr. Koussevitzky has some of his happiest moments.

Three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz, brought this unusual concert to a brilliant conclusion.

Next week's program is of miscellaneous character. Walter Piston will conduct his Concerto for Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," d'Indy's "Istar," Variations, and the Second Symphony by Brahms.

Mar
24, 1934 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After Handel of the 12th Concerto Grosso, in B minor for string orchestra had supplied a lengthy and somewhat dull introduction to yesterday's Symphony concert, there was a manifestation of the remarkable powers of two youths. The one was Yehudi Menuhin, now a stocky lad of 17, making his first appearance with the orchestra in this city. The other was the 10-year-old Mozart, whose violin concerto in D, composed at that age for a daughter of Louis XV, Mr Menuhin played, together with the violin concerto of Beethoven.

Dr Koussevitzky altered his previously announced program midway in the week, substituting Handel's Concerto Grosso for three pieces of Domenico Scarlatti in a transcription by Alfredo Casella. The Mozart concerto took the place of Randall Thompson's Second Symphony, whose first local performance has been set ahead to April 13.

The little concerto of Mozart was written at Versailles in 1766 for Princess Adelaide, while little Wolfgang and his father were stopping in France on a concert tour. In 1791, when the Princess fled France and the Revolution, the manuscript was given into the care of Mme Montmorency, a lady-in-waiting to Marie Antoinette. The concerto remained in Mme Montmorency's family for generations. It has lately been published, and Mr Menuhin has played it in Europe. Yesterday's performance was the first with orchestra in this country, according to the program book. Written upon only two staves, the concerto was given its present orchestral dress of two horns, two oboes and strings by Marius Casadesus. Paul Hindemith composed a cadenza for each movement upon Mozart's material.

It goes without saying that the mere fact that a 10-year-old boy could have written a concerto is astonishing. But one marvels at the clear grasp of formal symmetry and of harmony which the boy Mozart possessed, and at the genius which enabled him to preserve on paper such perfectly turned melody. The subtlety that Mozart later developed is, naturally, missing, and the grace of this concerto is occasionally touched with angularity. Had one heard it just after it was written, there might have been no indications that its composer was to become the creator of the G minor, the "Jupiter," and the E-flat symphonies; yet listening to it today, there seem to be prophesies of achievement that was to come. Certainly it has throughout a distinctly Mozartean flavor. This concerto was, incidentally, far more worth playing than many an example which has been heard here of what fashionable persons of the 20th Century put on paper.

Mr Menuhin, favored by the power which controls our destinies, was gifted above most mortals; that gift, fortunately, has been tenderly and wisely developed until its possessor is no longer a prodigy of startling manual skill, but an artist whose sensibility and musical intellect equal his technical resources. He has had excellent instruction in style and in expression, and plays in the best of taste. The beauty of his tone is truly unusual—and this is said advisedly, for it is a beauty different alike from the purely sensuous tone of the Auer school and from that of Kreisler, for example. Not every virtuoso violinist of more years than he can play chords so well. Above all, Mr Menuhin is now capable of delving behind the notes and the indications of nuance to bring out whatever deeper emotional implications there may be.

He was greeted with prolonged applause after the Mozart concerto, and with stamping and cheers after that of Beethoven. For him, a typically conservative Friday audience commendably banished its restraint.

Dr Koussevitzky concluded the concert with three excerpts—the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs," and "Rakoczy" march from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz. This music Dr Koussevitzky reads superlatively well. At its conclusion, there were cheers for him and for the orchestra.

The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday, since the following day is Good Friday. The program—Walter Piston: Concerto for orchestra conducted by the composer; Debussy: "Prelude [illegible] the Afternoon of a Faun," D'Indy: Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Brahms; Symphony No. 2 in D major.

C. W. D.

The Mated Hands Of Two Masters

Prelude to the Revival of Beethoven's Music to Goethe's "Egmont"

Trans. Mar 24

Next Tuesday afternoon the overture and various incidental numbers that Beethoven wrote in 1810 for performances in Vienna of Goethe's tragedy, "Egmont," will be played and sung at Symphony Hall for the first time in nearly fifty years.

TO PROVIDE original music for Goethe's tragedy, "Egmont," was a project offered to Beethoven apparently in cold-blooded business fashion. The theater-manager, Hartl, having already introduced to Vienna the plays of Schiller, proposed, to produce his "Tell," and at the same time Goethe's "Egmont," at the Court Theater, with incidental music composed for each drama. Czerny insists that Beethoven preferred the richer musical possibilities of Schiller's play. Beethoven's traditional disappointment, however, seems unlikely in view of the composer's boundless admiration for Goethe's poems in general, and for the tragedy of "Egmont" in particular. He wrote to Bettina von Arnim, confident that his praise should sooner or later reach the ears of the poet's.

"If you write to Goethe, hunt out all the words to express my deepest reverence and admiration of him. I am about to write him myself concerning 'Egmont' for which I have composed music, and indeed, purely out of love for his poems which make me happy. But who can sufficiently thank a great poet, the most precious jewel of a nation." Two months later he wrote to Goethe himself: "You will receive the music to 'Egmont' from Leipsic through Breitkopf and Härtel, this glorious 'Egmont' which I read so ardently, thought over and experienced again and gave out in music. . . . I would greatly like to have your judgment on it, and your blame, too, will be beneficial to me and my art, and be accepted as gladly as the highest praise."

It seems probable that Beethoven intended to send the score of "Egmont" to Goethe when completed, as he had previously done with his settings of poems. His publishers, however, were reluctant to comply, and the score remained in their possession unseen by Goethe. Nearly two years after the first performance, in 1810, Beethoven wrote a second letter to Breitkopf and Härtel urging immediate response to his request. "I therefore again beg of you humbly to take care of these letters—and with the letter to Goethe to send the 'Egmont' (score), but not in the customary way with here and there a piece wanting, etc., but properly. This cannot be postponed longer. I have pledged my word and am the more particular to have the pledge redeemed when I can compel somebody else, like you, to do it—ha, ha, ha! You deserve that I use such language to you, to such a sinner who if I had my way would walk in a hair-shirt of penance for all the flagitiousness practiced on my works."

Since Goethe's tragedy cannot be played or read in the concert-hall, a long narrative poem is sometimes recited to elucidate the dramatic significance of the music. Narrators read J. S. Dwight's English translation of the connecting poem by Grillparzer and Mosengreil at the two Boston performances of Beethoven's music, the first in 1872 under Carl Zerrahn; the second by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke in 1885. According to the score in the library at Symphony Hall selected parts of the poem are sometimes read. Selections of the poem, varying from fifteen to fifty lines in length, are heard before each of the four entr'actes. Egmont's brief soliloquy is read during the quiet music of the "melodrame." Clärchen's two songs, "Die Trommel gerühret" and "Freudvoll und leidvoll," follow the overture and the second entr'acte respectively. The music for Clärchen's death precedes the melodrame. The final "Triumphal Symphony" is identical with the end of the Overture.

The dramatic interest of Goethe's "Egmont" is twofold. It recounts the romantic love of a nobleman for a peasant girl—subject-matter easily adaptable to musical treatment. Far more it is concerned with a political situation—the revolt of the Netherlands against the Spanish tyranny—and its effect upon an heroical and historical figure. This aspect of the drama is hardly conducive to the birth of musical ideas. Beyond the heroism of Egmont, his love and triumphant death, what is there which music can express or suggest? The indispensable characters—the Queen Regent, William of Orange, Machiavelli—remain untouched and unwanted by the composer.

The limitations of music as an expression of events remain as long as the method of interrupting music for drama and drama for music is employed. Liszt indicated this difficulty when he discussed the music to "Egmont." "It was soon evident to him," he writes about Wagner, "that the musical share which Beethoven had given to the drama was insufficient, and far from accomplishing the desired end, in that the musical interest was confined to the entra-'actes, when the audience, fatigued with their attention to the anti-musical part, had only listless ears."

J. H. F.

Boy Prodigy Symphony Soloist

Trav. Mar 24

Yehudi Menuhin, boy prodigy and distinguished violinist, was the guest soloist at the 20th of the regular Friday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon.

The rare distinction of being permitted to play two concertos during a Boston Symphony program was bestowed upon this young man and he performed better, perhaps, than he ever had before during the 17 years and two months of his existence. At the conclusion of the second work Beethoven's violin concerto in D, he was given a near ovation by the audience that filled every available seat. For hundreds had been turned away by the time the concert began.

But the most notable selection to be given during the afternoon was Mozart's violin concerto in D ("Adelaide Concerto"), played with an orchestra for the first time in these United States. This concerto was composed by Mozart when he was no more than 10 years old, in 1766, and has remained in manuscript form in a private collection until very recently.

The title page bears the following inscription: "Violin Concerto in D (Adelaide Concerto); W. A. Mozart, Versailles, 1766. Published for the first time and arranged by Marius Casadesus with three cadenzas by Paul Hindemith." The "Adelaide" refers to Princess Adelaide, eldest daughter of Louis XV, a pupil of the noted Guignon, and reputed an excellent violinist.

According to the publishers of this concerto, it was discovered by the arranger when he tried to identify notes of music shown on a portrait, painted by the artist Nattier of the princess with her violin and with the manuscript in her lap. Previously its existence had been known to a few persons but not to the world in general.

The score was published in 1933 and first played anywhere last Nov. 13 by Jelli d'Aranyi at a London concert. Menuhin performed it with piano accompaniment at a New York recital last Sunday. Yesterday he received the magnificent assistance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, for as orchestrated in Mozartean style by Casadesus, the concerto required a reduced stringed orchestra, two oboes and two horns.

In playing this Mozart child music, Menuhin chose a way that was simplicity itself, making no attempt to add a depth and character not to be found in the writings. The result was a charmingly fresh presentation, in perfect proportion and balance, and bearing unmistakably the mark of Mozart's style. Every measure sang with a beauty that is Mozart at his best.

Contrastingly, in the Beethoven concerto the violinist found and made the most of every opportunity to display his virtuoso skill. The embroidered and elaborate cadenza passages near the close of the first and third movements, with difficult double and occasionally triple stopping, flowed swiftly and smoothly from his practiced bow. There was throughout a maturity to his playing not in evidence during his Symphony hall recital last year.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra formed a marvelously fine background for Menuhin in both concertos, and then of themselves gave stirring interpretations, at the beginning of the concert, of Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra in B minor, and at end, of three excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust."

Next week, due to Good Friday, the regular Friday afternoon concert will be given Thursday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock.

W. T. C., Jr.

With a Bow to the Memory of Dr. Eliot

[illegible] Mar. 23

TO HONOR the memory of Charles William Eliot, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra, in G major, Schubert's Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor. It was explained in the program book at Sanders Theater that these were favorite composers of Harvard's illustrious president, the hundredth anniversary of whose birth is being celebrated this month. Though the world changes rapidly in respect to music as well as education, the atmosphere surrounding last evening's concert implied that as President Eliot builded for permanency so he preferred music of enduring character. What pleased President and Mrs. Eliot as they attended these Cambridge concerts pleases those who attend them today and will continue to delight succeeding listeners for many years to come. Such was the evidence, at least, of applausive response and listening attitude. The audience was notably attentive during the performance of Schubert's Symphony; then clapped steadily until conductor and musicians stood to bow acknowledgment together. Even more insistent was the applause after the Symphony of Beethoven.

Again it appeared as especially fortunate that in the music of Bach, Schubert and Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky reveals his distinctive discernment as a conductor. Although Dr. Koussevitzky has been, on other occasions, more free and imaginative in the interpretation of music by these composers; has, indeed, placed upon their compositions the clear imprint of his own personality as is his right as a conductor; has even at times electrified his listeners—he seldom has conducted with more intense application to the task or with greater consideration for unanimity of attack and firmness of tone. His concentrated manner was first disclosed in the Bach's Concerto. Each choir of the strings produced its compact contrapuntal line. The mounting climax of the final movement gave an effect both delightful and impressive; delightful for its paradoxical mixture of the complex and the simple; impressive for its sense of power and the stubborn persistence of point against point, from sharp violin to solid double bass.

Refinement of tone and delicacy of line characterized the performance of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony to an unusual degree, particularly in the second movement. Dr. Koussevitzky demanded in the pianissimo passages a reduction in dynamics beyond what would ordinarily be thought possible without impairing tone production. Yet every solo player was equal to the occasion and all were responsible for a finely shaded and beautifully proportioned performance.

The Fifth Symphony was played with a similar concentration and also with a fervor to match the nobility of the music. Here Dr. Koussevitzky avoided every non-essential and let the composer speak for himself. The iterating figures of the opening Allegro were terse but not too sharply broken; tones were firm. Every phrase in the Andante came clear-cut and fully rounded. With an easy yet masterful command of the virtuoso orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky brought the final movement to its triumphant close.

N. M. J.

Concert-Chronicle

Well Placed Honor

IN the program-book, above the list of pieces played at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, stood this inscription: "The program of this concert honors the memory of Charles William Eliot, born March 20, 1834." Below the list stood this note:

> President Eliot was the trusted friend and counsellor of Henry L. Higginson during the formative years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to their co-operative planning we owe the long series of the Cambridge Concerts. Mr. and Mrs. Eliot were constant attendants at the concerts, and the compositions of Beethoven, Bach and Schubert, which are placed on the program tonight, were among their favorites.
>
> President Eliot's interest in music, both as a source of enjoyment and as an educational influence, was noteworthy. He first gave to music a definite place and standing in the curriculum of an American university. The department of music at Harvard, initiated by the president and led by Professor John K. Paine, was a pioneer.

Ourselves and Others

The event at the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow is the first hearing in Boston of Yehudi Menuhin with orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky has ordered the program accordingly, viz.:

Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 12, in B minor	Handel
Concerto, No. 1, in D major for Violin and Orchestra	Mozart
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra	Beethoven
(Violinist: Mr. Menuhin)
Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of Sylphs, Rákóczy March from "The Damnation of Faust"	Berlioz

Mr. Toscanini again absents himself from the Philharmonic Concerts in New York. The assistant conductor, Mr. Lange, takes them over with this program:

Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 5, in D major	Handel
Symphony, No. [illegible] in D	[illegible]
Intermezzo and Scherzo in B minor	Musorgsky
Tone-Poem, "The Ocean"	Hadley
Two Dances from the Opera, "The Bartered Bride"	Smetana

In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski is also on holiday—fortunate these "geniuses of the baton"—while Mr. Ormandy leads the orchestra through these numbers:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Nocturne and Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Bulgarian Suite	Vladigerov
Symphony, No. 4, in E minor	Brahms

In Chicago Mr. Stock continues at work with this program:

Prelude to a Drama	Schreker
Suite, "Ruralia Ungarica"	Dohnányi
"Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Knightly Theme	Strauss
Concerto in A minor for Violin and Orchestra	Dvorák
(Violinist: Mr. Milstein)

No More Schönberg

Edmund [illegible]

Fiedler and his chamber orchestra were to be heard with Mme. Dusolina Giannini is definitely abandoned. The program included Schönberg's "Chamber Symphony" to be played for the first time in Boston. Again any hearing of his more individual music recedes into dim distance. No one seems to mind, least of all Schönberg himself. Tranquilly in Brookline he goes about his work.

Peace Restored

The audience at Mr. Stokowski's concert for youth in Philadelphia last evening, stumbled in broken French through one stanza of the "Internationale," said to be "the mildest"; then passed to more interesting matters. And that was all that came of an incident in which, by the foamings of sundry Philadelphian mouths, the existence of the Government of these United States might have been at stake.

Timely Feat

Arnold Bax, the English composer, has tried his hand at the violoncello-concerto that symphony concerts, the world over, sorely need. The other day the piece was heard approvingly in London. The Morning Post thought well of the "rhapsodical" first movement, "the lyrical beauty" of the second, "the effectiveness" of the third. It would be interesting to hear the concerto at Symphony Hall where Bax has often been favored composer.

After Many Years

Mar. 28

Although the Monday and Tuesday supplementary programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are frequently taken from standard repertory, the concert yesterday afternoon (the next to the last in the current Beethoven Cycle) was an outstanding exception. At least two items had not been heard in Boston for years. Yielding to a mood of adventure, or rather to the spirit of research, Dr. Koussevitzky assembled representative excerpts from Beethoven's music to Goethe's tragedy, "Egmont." The Overture is familiar piece to all listeners. Rarely, however, is it combined in performance with the two songs, the incidental and dramatic music and the concluding and epitomizing "Symphony." Neglected, too, is the so-called "Triple Concerto" for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, "with orchestral accompaniment"; in fact, the Boston players previously had not touched it. As for the Eighth Symphony in F major—not being one of the sanctified odd-numbered symphonies and consequently avoiding excessive repetition, it makes an instant appeal, like springtime itself.

Conductor, musicians and audience found this arrangement unusually fortunate. It might be said that the "Egmont" music stood for mood, the "Triple Concerto" for motion and design, the Symphony for joyous release. In the Overture to Goethe's play, the orchestra established a mood of gravity and high purpose. Dignity, a feeling of latent power, a fierce and righteous energy were implied in the broad measures and decisive accents which Dr. Koussevitzky released. Then came the two songs "Die Trommel gerüht" and "Freudvoll und leidvoll." Avoiding undue exaggeration, Miss Olga Averino sang them simply, with gently penetrating tone.

In English drama, Shakspeare is the nearest approximation to Goethe. As Mr. Richard Hale spoke the soliloquies of Egmont—the questionings of his conscience and his apostrophe to sleep—he called to mind the grand manner of the older school of Shakspearean actors, their aristocratic bearing, their clear enunciation, precise emphasis, their full-round symmetry of phrasing. The orchestra, underscoring and continuing the implications of the words, assisted in the characterization. Particularly interesting, however, was the fact that the playing of these excerpts left a definite impression of continuity of thought and balanced form. The "Symphony of Victory" is a recapitulation of the principal theme of the Overture. Coming at the end, it makes the whole seem logical and complete. Though this incidental music does not represent Beethoven at his best, it is unique and satisfying.

Personalities are a principal pleasure with every Tuesday audience. Consequently, Messrs. Sanromá, Burgin and Bedetti (need we say they played the piano, violin and 'cello, respectively?) received their rounds of applause. Surely they deserved them for the clean, clear expositions of clean, clear tones in motion. Here again, we do not have Beethoven in his loftiest mood or most characteristic manner; but we do take pleasure in his engaging patterns of sound, in the neat balance of solo instruments. At this portion of the program, indeed, began a brighter, possibly a lighter, Beethoven.

There was universal admiration for the concise energy with which Dr. Koussevitzky played the Eighth Symphony. Likewise memorable was the deftness, the spiciness and delightfully insinuating monotony with which the players ran through the Scherzando.

The solo instruments were responsible for many engaging passages, particularly the horns in the Minuet. The audience by its prolonged and vigorous clapping clearly attested that this spirited Eighth Symphony ranks higher in popular favor than is generally admitted.

N. M. J.

SYMPHONY IN UNUSUAL BEETHOVEN

Post Mar. 28

Novel, Little Heard Works at Fifth Tuesday

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Unfamiliar, even novel music by Beethoven was heard at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, the fifth of the series this year dedicated to the works of that master. For beginning the programme offered the music to Goethe's tragedy "Egmont," without the entr'actes, of which only the Overture is familiar; the other portions had not been played here since 1885. Next came, in its first performance by the Symphony Orchestra, the so-called Tripple Concerto for piano, violin and violoncello, with Messrs. Sanroma, Burgin and Bedetti of the orchestra as solo performers on the respective instruments. The remainder of the programme was devoted to the Eighth Symphony.

SINGER AND READER

Soloists again were required for the music to "Egmont." Olga Averino, resident soprano, sang the two songs of Claerchen. Richard Hale, to provide suitable background for the music, read excerpts from the play and, accompanied by the orchestra, gave the melodrama of Egmont in prison just before he is led to execution. The orchestra played the music that accompanies Claerchen's death, and the final Symphony of Victory which is, in its essence, the familiar conclusion of the overture.

The first of Claerchen's songs, "Die Trommel Geruehrt," with its military flavor, is inspiriting; the second, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," voices none too convincingly Claerchen's ecstasy and rapture. The music of the melodrama is not too impressive. In short, all we really need to know of "Egmont" is comprised in the Overture.

Mr. Hale in the Manner

Mme. Averino sang her music sympathetically and expressively. Mr. Hale declaimed Goethe's stilted and pompous phrases, for so they seem today, in a manner wholly appropriate to their nature. A more casual, less rhetorical recital of them must surely have fallen flat.

The Triple Concerto, dating probably from 1804, is distinctly of less worth than other compositions of that period.

Admirably Played

As Mr. Burke's note reminded us, Beethoven was engaged about that time on "Leonore," the "Waldstein" and the "Appassionata" Sonatas and the "Eroica" Symphony, yet this Concerto might easily belong to the composer's tentative and imitative first period. There is some showy writing for the soloists, some pleasant melody in the Largo. The final Rondo is singularly empty.

The Concerto was admirably played yesterday by the three soloists and the orchestra, but many in the audience must have rejoiced when Dr. Koussevitsky and his men turned their attention to the Eighth Symphony.

VETS TO STAGE SHOW

West Roxbury Post, American Legion, will stage a combination vaudeville and minstrel show at Highland Club Hall on the evenings of April 5-7, inclusive, according to announcement yesterday.

AT YOUR NEIGHBORHOOD THEATRES TODAY
BROOKLINE
COOLIDGE Corner Cont. 2-11 BEA 3600
PALOOKA with JIMMY DURANTE
Lew Ayres
DISNEY CARTOON
CAMBRIDGE
PORTER 4580 UNIVERSITY
JIMMY DURANTE "PALOOKA"
"SEARCH FOR BEAUTY"
Cont. Daily 2-11

Globe Mar. 28

THE B

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven's Triple Concerto for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, and his incidental music to Goethe's play, "Egmont," were heard within the precincts of Symphony Hall for the first time yesterday afternoon. The concert was the last but one of the Tuesday series, and otherwise included the master's Eighth Symphony. Messrs Sanroma, Burgin and Bedetti were respectively the soloists in the concerto, which had been played only twice before by the Boston Symphony, in 1882 and 1889.

The "Egmont" music was a product of Beethoven's 40th year and comprised the overture; two songs allotted to Claerchen, Egmont's beloved; a "Melodrama" accompanying lines in which Egmont, in prison awaiting execution, spoke poetically of sleep somewhat after the fashion of Macbeth (who, however, did so in far nobler speech); passages depicting the death of Claerchen; four Entr'actes, and a concluding "Victory Symphony" based upon the material of the latter part of the overture. The Entr'actes were omitted yesterday. This incidental music as a whole had received but one previous performance by the Boston Symphony, in 1885, though the fragment "Claerchen's Death" was heard here a decade later.

Claerchen's songs were sung agreeably by Olga Averino, soprano. Richard Hale read from speeches of Egmont lines which bade citizens of Brussels keep the peace, which make clear his love for Claerchen, and the "Melodrama" passage. It is easy to understand why, of the music performed yesterday, the overture has remained in the symphonic repertory and why the rest, tame and uninspired, have found oblivion. Like the "Leonore" overture No. 3, which so perfectly sums the drama in Beethoven's opera "Fidelio," the "Egmont" overture performs a comparable service for the play by Goethe.

The Eighth Symphony bears in the style of its first movement, and in general mood, striking similarity to the Seventh Symphony, which was composed in the same year of 1812. The Eighth now seems lesser Beethoven, though sparkling and exuberant. The Symphony was played much better than the "Egmont" overture, which Dr Koussevitzky overdramatized, bringing out the inner voices until the chief melodic line was sometimes obscured.

Messrs Sanroma, Burgin and Bedetti played excellently their parts of a prolix and but sporadically interesting work. All too often Beethoven seemed to be forcing invention to compensate for the counsel of his muse, who apparently was taking a rest after the composition of the "Eroica" Symphony and in preparation for work upon the "Apassionata" sonata. One remembers seeing in childhood upon faded paper in age-dulled ink and the prim handwriting of a long-deceased New England matron, a recipe for "good, plain cake." This Triple Concerto is good, plain cake of the symphonic pantry.

C. W. D

MUSIC

Her Mar. 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. M'MANUS

Beethoven Program—Music to Goethe's "Egmont"; Overture, two songs, Claerchen's Death, melodrama, Symphony of Victory; Concerto for piano, violin and violoncello; Symphony No. 8 in F major.

This season's Beethoven cycle is drawing to a close. The fifth program drew a large audience to Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra were assisted in the Egmont music by Olga Averino, soprano, and Richard Hale, reader. In the Triple Concerto the soloists were Jesus Maria Sanroma, Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti.

To present Beethoven's incidental music to Egmont—which is, except for the overture, a novelty here—and the Triple Concerto, was a worthwhile, if not grateful, task. It was an interesting experiment, one that most of the audience found to their liking. Curiously enough, the concerto had never before been played by the Boston Symphony.

Goethe's "Egmont" is practically unknown to theatre audiences outside of Germany, and it is strongly hinted that even there it is kept in the repertoire because of the music. Yesterday's procedure was the only practical way to do justice to Beethoven as a theatre composer, except in a theatre. Historical report gives out that when Egmont was on the scaffold, his farewell speech was drowned by the deliberately planned gesture of Duke Alva—fanfares of a military band. These fanfares have been brought to us by Beethoven as a "Symphony of Victory." This symphony ends the play, as well as the overture, and is supposed to represent the vision of freedom, in the form of Claerchen, as Egmont goes to his death.

Here Egmont says "Hark! How often this sound called me to march in freedom to the field of battle and victory. . . I, too, march from this dungeon to an honorable death; I die for the freedom for which I lived and fought and for which I suffer in sacrifice."

Olga Averino was a sympathetic Claerchen, the beloved one of Egmont. Vocally, her first song, "Die Trommel Geruehrt," embodies fewer difficulties than the second, "Freudvoll and Leidvoll." When Madame Averino sings, one can be without uneasiness. Her rhythmic certainly and her musicianship give her vocal resources an added potency that makes for unusual characterization. Schubert's setting of "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" (in his case an incidental song), gives, with simpler means, at least as impressive a reflection of Claerchen's sentiments as does the Beethoven version.

Richard Hale read excerpts from the speeches of heroic Count of the Netherlands, champion of liberty for his people. Mr. Hale's Egmont is dignified and zealous. He portrays the character in definite and varying moods and projects these moods with excellent diction. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in a stirring performance of the overture and in appropriate readings of the rest of the Egmont music.

Beethoven's Triple Concerto has been said to be in some ways a study to his G major and E flat major concertos. He had not been completely satisfied with the opening orchestral ritornello of his earlier concerts. In this work, for three solo instruments and orchestra, he sets about a real solution of the problem. The two later concertos for pianoforte do not do away with the opening ritornello, as has been erroneously opined by some, but of that, more at another time.

The final Beethoven program will be given Tuesday afternoon, April 17. Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared an unusual program: Overture to Leonore No. 3 (one of the greatest of tone-poems) and the Ninth (Choral) Symphony. There will undoubtedly be a capacity audience.

128

Trans Mar 29

Part One

Plays a

Gathering Up The News Of Concert-Halls

Boston According to Wood, From Handel to Wolf At Symphony Hall

THE MAILS come slowly across the Atlantic at mid-winter. A fortnight ago Sir Henry Wood returned to London from his three concerts as guest-conductor with the Boston Orchestra. A "special representative" of The Daily Telegraph was waiting on the doorstep. "What impressed me," Sir Henry told him, "when I conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the discipline of the players. There was, for instance, no fidgetting at rehearsals. You can imagine how thorough these are when I tell you that I had five for an hour and a half's program. A couple for a two-hour program is nearer the London standard."

The conductor noticed the same discipline in the audience: "You never hear a cough. There is such a silence in the auditorium that at times you begin to wonder whether there is anyone there. Yet at all the three concerts there were full houses." The Bostonians immensely enjoyed Elgar's "Enigma Variations," which they had not heard for fifteen years. [Sir Henry's or the "special representative's" memory slips. These variations had been last played at Symphony Hall in 1927.]

To conclude, Sir Henry took the usual exercise of English wits with American extravagance: "There were no signs of depression. Every one spends money in a way that still astonishes the thrifty Englishman. When they told me they were broke, I replied that they would go to the workhouse in their cars."

Back to Handel

At last in the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday the audience will hear music of Handel drawn neither from his Concerti Grossi nor from the "Water" or the "Fireworks" music. In the third part of his oratorio, "Solomon"—virtually unknown in America by public performance—the voice of the Queen of Sheba is heard for the first time. A "sinfonia" or prelude is general introduction. Soon follows the Queen's first air. Hence "Entrance of the Queen of Sheba" is the program-book label for this excerpt. "Solomon" is work of Handel's last years, composed in the spring and summer of 1748, produced in March of 1749. The text is usually attributed to Thomas Morell; but Newman Flower in his biography of Handel has doubts: "If Morell had been the librettist of so splendid a work he would scarcely have refrained from mentioning the fact in the survey of his association with Handel which he included in a famous letter." Whoever made the text of "Solomon" was capable of such rhymes as these for the Queen of Sheba coming upon the scene:

> "From Arabia's spicy shores
> Bounded by the hoary main.
> Sheba's queen these seats explores
> To be taught thy heavenly strain"

The "Sinfonia" itself is an Allegro, four-four time. It is scored for two oboes and four string-parts, plus harpsichord. The strings are divided, as in the concerti of the day, into "Concertini" and "Ripieni." The entire movement is a rapid one, mostly sixteenth and eighth notes. There is considerable answering back and forth between strings. The two oboes occasionally play alone.

A. H. M.

Re-Enter Hugo Wolf

Besides this fragment from Handel Dr. Koussevitzky's program also includes Hugo Wolf's setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Goethe's poem, "Prometheus." It will be heard for the first times at Symphony Hall and Mr. David Blair McClosky will be the singer.

spectacle with which Zeus has presented him, but makes a mockery of it. This is all the more provoking since it issues from one who is fearless and has unlimited confidence in himself. After this introduction, which grows out of an extremely realistic view of Goethe's poem, Wolf proceeds to the monologue itself. According to the thought, he groups the poem into three parts. Each is treated with great breadth and each is charactered by a particular rhythmic motif; first flowing eighth notes; then syncopations in livelier rhythm; finally, agitated, stormy triplets. Each group is separated from its neighbors by the motives of Zeus hurling his lightning.

"Thus the god and the giant contend for domination of the world. In the final words of Prometheus [where he is telling how he will teach men]

> And thee not to respect
> Even as I!

Wolf accompanies the word 'thee' with a last, ironically conceived, peal of thunder from the angry god. Prometheus remains unshaken. . . . The piece, in D minor, is cast in a form which is as perfect as the conception is gigantic. A Beethoven mocking the Titans, speaks through it."

A. H. M.

---

been large enough to establish a tren and their position as a group may b termed fairly steady. Strength was greatest in the hog, lamb and dressed pork markets which reached new high levels, despite ample supplies. Prices of other livestock also tended mainly upward. Prices of wool held firmly, but hides and calfskins sell slightly lower. Grain markets were dull without sharp changes. Cotton, despite sharp day to day changes, has held prices well at highest levels in years.

Butter and eggs showed unsettled or downward trend since milder weather promised increasing supplies. Potato markets were firm in the East but weakened a little in the West. Other vegetable markets were irregular. Apples followed the firm trend of the past month or more, with a few further price gains. Weather changes have been a leading market influence on many farm products, and prices have shifted mainly according to resulting temporary shifts in output, shipments and demand. The rising trend of general commodity markets has helped the farm markets to hold and strengthen their position.

Grain Markets Dull

Domestic cash wheat markets have held about steady since the middle of February. Marketings have been only moderate. Canadian spring wheat markets are barely steady and prices have declined slightly at Winnipeg. The rye market has remained dull as a result of a slow cash demand for the moderate supplies. Prices are nearly unchanged. Corn markets also have been dull and steady, reflecting the continued light shipping and feeder demand this season. Nearly 70,000,000 bushels of corn were in store on Feb. 10 at the principal markets, com-

---

Mar 30 Traveler

Brahm's Work Played by Symphony

Once again Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation of Brahms dominated a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was the 21st of the regular series of concerts and because of Good Friday was given Thursday afternoon in Symphony hall instead of Friday.

In addition to Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, the program included Walter Piston's recently composed Concerto for Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Piston, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and d'Indy's Symphonic Variations "Istar," opus 42.

The Brahms of sunshiny days in Vienna, the Brahms of an easy going nature, only occasionally touched by a haunting sadness, was brought in full-toned simplicity to the concert hall yesterday afternoon in Dr. Koussevitzky's masterful performance of his second symphony. There are today some conductors who find in this tuneful, rhythmic, pleasant work a deep set feeling of stress and storm. Dr. Koussevitzky apparently does not, and is content to keep the symphony's Mendelssohn flavor as it is, neither adding nor detracting.

Thus was his way yesterday. The D major symphony came from the orchestra delightfully lyrical, sparkling with warmth and color. But briefly in the adagio and the allegro final movement was there a dipping into the melancholy, a definite hinting of sadness. Such things were forgotten in the breadth and height of the finale. There was cause enough for the roar of applausive, stamping appreciation.

As conductor in his latest work, a Concerto for Orchestra, Walter Piston, now a member of the music department of Harvard, proved an able musician, a composer of modern mind and ability. For several years he led the Pierian Sodality Orchestra at Harvard and this experience was evident in his leadership of the Boston Symphony.

With but few gestures he conducted the orchestra through his concerto, modeled in 18th century form after the ancient concerto grosso. Unlike many of the 18th century scores however, Mr. Piston's work was short, running through three movements in somewhat less than 15 minutes. His themes were presented in spirited and often rhythmic form, were developed and contrasted in a manner that clearly indicated a full knowledge of the uses to which a modern virtuoso orchestra may be put.

Judging from one hearing of this concerto it seemed as if mere technical skill, the effective use of counterpoint dissonance and modern harmonies, had been the only reason for its being composed. To some that is just cause There are others, though, who would have a depth and a feeling to their music, not to be found in Mr. Piston's most recent writing.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," was beautifully and sensatively read by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. D'Indy's "Istar" was likewise finely interpreted. This selection, in many respects a symphonic poem, was last performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra the week after the death of the composer in Paris, Dec. 2, 1931. Curiously the customary method of composing a symphonic poem has been reversed in it. Involved themes are introduced and then become simplified at the close.

There will be no regular concerts by the orchestra next week as it will be in Baltimore, Washington, New York and Brooklyn. The next pair of concerts will be given April 13 and 14.

W. T. C., Jr.

TYDOL
We Are the Men at the Pumps
ask us
United Stations,
Inc.

247 Albany St., Boston
938 Columbus Ave., Boston
250 Dorchester Ave., South Boston
1 Harvard St., Corner Mystic Ave., Medford
600 Main St., Watertown
1765 Centre St., West Roxbury
121 Somerville Ave., Somerville
1420 Massachusetts Ave., Arlington
80 Hampden St., Roxbury
Trapelo Road, Corner Flett Road, Belmont
Cor. Broadway and Stuart St., Boston
Kneeland St., corner South Street, Boston
968 Massachusetts Avenue, Boston
Everett Auto Station, 1970 Revere Beach Parkway, Everett
See Page 29

Afternoon of Piston and Koussevitzky

The Composer Conducting His Own Concerto — Debussy, D'Indy and Brahms

IN deference to the many who take the calendar of their church year seriously, the symphony concert which would normally have taken place on Good Friday was this week placed a day earlier. Thus by exception the week's concerts are falling on Thursday and Saturday rather than in the usual sequence of two consecutive days. That the change made any difference in attendance, the casual eye could not discover. The program, too, for the most part, was such as must have produced complete harmony in the mind of the devout with the contemplation of the events and moods of Holy Week. That program compassed Walter Piston's new Concerto for Orchestra, heard only once previously, at Cambridge, a few weeks ago; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; d'Indy's "Istar" variations; Brahms's Second Symphony, in D major.

Ingeniously, scholarly, in the mood of the period, Mr. Piston had contrived his concerto. The centuries when great counterpoint was written gave him his forms, the day in which he lives gave him his idiom, a good head and sound instruction have given him the ability to carry to realization the combination of the two. An inherent, natural fertility of mind brought novel treatment of the old forms. Not more than one movement, the first is cast into the form of the old eighteenth century concerto,—and even that with a change. For unlike the old contrapuntists, Mr. Piston's "concertino" or solo group, changes constantly. First it is a group of double-reed wood-winds, then it is a combination of three brass instruments, then a string quartet, finally the full brass choir. The second movement brings an ancient contrapuntal device, too difficult for frequent use among composers, but pregnant with novel melodic ideas and rhythmic combinations, —the so-called "retrograd motion" of the last section. The crescendo of the first division is matched by the decrescendo of the last. Between, songful measures give a moment's relief from the swift scherzo figures of the other two. For final movement, Mr. Piston uses another ancient form, that of variations over a ground-melody. Twice Bach wrote masterpieces in the form, in the Passacaglia for organ, in the Chaconne for violin solo. A tuba sings the slow theme, brass first varies it, then a flute gives further grave variation, then in the rapid tempo of the finale, it is subjected to all the contrapuntal ingenuities which its composer can bring to it, and that is a considerable number.

Mr. Piston conducted. As a youth he has had much experience in conducting student orchestras. As a composer he has occasionally stood before the Boston Symphony Orchestra as their leader. Ably and with a sense of certainty he led the men through the intricacies of his music. Believably he got from them exactly what he wanted. And to the ear the spirit of the day in which the music was written triumphed over the forms which it used. There was much applause.

But there was more applause when Dr. Koussevitzky appeared, to take his place on the podium to conduct Debussy's piece about a faun's afternoon. It has been said times without number that with every new repetition of an old repertory piece Dr. Koussevitzky brings something new to it. This cannot in any sense be taken to mean that he adds one piece of conductor's baggage even while he discards another. It means that with each new repetition he tries, and tries hard, to distill from the notes and the instruments something increasingly nearer that quintessence which is the ideal that stands far, far behind those notes. Yesterday's performance of the "Faun" was a notable case in point. It is more than historic cliché to talk about Debussy's work as impressionistic. The more vaguely and delicately the lines of this music can be drawn the better the music sounds. And yesterday the conductor reached a new high point for the fragility, the tenuousness, the evanescence which he brought to this music. For the moment one could not imagine that a greater sublimation of graceful delicacy would humanly be possible Every trace of grossness had been distilled out of it. The ideal it surely approached.—In this state it approached also that spirituality which is appropriate mood for the present season of the religious year. Disregarding the pagan poem which was its inspiration, the music, particularly in this rarefied form, might easily be thought to have such connotation.

So also with d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." In form this piece is a set of variations reversed, the theme not occurring until the final unison near the end, the variations growing less complex as they approach that theme. The occasion for that form is the legend of the Assyrian goddess Istar, who, in the composer's own words, "In order to deliver her lover from captivity in Hades, was obliged to divest herself of one of her ornaments or of one of her garments at each of the seven doors of the somber abode. Then, triumphantly nude, she entered the seventh door." Thus the principal theme, which is Istar, is revealed in its full glory only at its last appearance. D'Indy has contrived for her also a marching theme, which is interlude between variations, but which is also Istar's march from door to door in her approach to Hades.

After an introductory phrase for horn, suggesting the Istar theme, the march begins. Gravely Dr. Koussevitzky paced it yesterday. It might have been a solemn march to any solemn objective as well as a march to Hades. With the composer, gradually and clearly, the conductor caused the theme to unfold; until finally, the beautiful line stood fully revealed. When with a sudden influx of light into the music, Istar, transfigured, passes through the seventh door, the piece ends, and d'Indy himself stands revealed as a greater composer than in life he was ever given credit for being.—

Does this piece fit into Passion Week? Vincent d'Indy is known to have been the most spiritually minded composer since César Franck, whose chief disciple he was. In his critical and expository writings he occasionally gave spiritual interpretations to older music which was beyond a doubt unprogrammatically conceived. His "Istar" is so perfectly formed that it could easily stand, in its perfection, as a piece of absolute music. But if it had been so written, many an expository commentator would work his fingers to the bone to write an explanation which should find in it something more than an exercise in reversed variation form. And Vincent d'Indy, who was given to such expositions would, by his own religious nature, be far more likely to try to explain such a piece, especially in view of its luminous ending, as a march up to the Mount of Transfiguration than as a descent into Hades. Thus the music, per se, fits the occasion.

Completely in the picture also was Brahm's Second Symphony. A mood of contemplative cheerfulness is central to it. After all, how better bring to conclusion a Holy Week program? And, instinctively, while one may respect or stand in awe of this or that or the other of the Brahmsian symphonies, one simply likes this one. One likes it for what it is not, as much as for what it is. It is not epic, or tragic, or monumental, or a feat of scholarly writing. All these one admires, one respects, one bows to. But how often one prefers the work that is mellowed by its essential, normal humanness to the work which is vast and titanic! Here one has it. Of a quiet, inner joy the melodies sang wondrously. In loveliest of colors, unbrilliant and yet somehow radiant—typical Brahmsian coloration—the instruments sounded. The performance of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, in its clarity, in its revelation of the essence of the music, was nothing short of superb.—But to come back to the mood of the piece, a better choice could hardly have been made with which to anticipate Easter.

A. H. M.

Globe MUSIC Mar 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Piston conducted his concerto for orchestra at the symphony concert yesterday. The afternoon program this week was set back a day to avoid playing on Good Friday. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the three remaining numbers, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; the "Istar" variations by the late Vincent d'Indy, and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Mr Piston's concerto was first played, under his direction, at a symphony concert in Cambridge, March 8. It had not before penetrated to this bank of the Charles, however The composer made no attempt in this short, crisp piece to startle with unusual instrumental or harmonic ideas, but set himself to write somewhat after the 18th Century concerto grosso form, one which has survived today chiefly in the Brandenburg Concerti of J. S. Bach and the concerti grossi of Handel.

The first movement especially is so influenced, for Mr Piston has engaged small groups of instruments in a sort of dialogue, interspersed with passages for full orchestra. This is, of course, an approximation of the "concertino," the tutti, and the concerted portions of the concerto grosso. But whereas the 18th Century writers selected a specific group for their concertino, Mr Piston changes his instruments from time to time, resulting in variety of tone color and wider scope of expression.

The slow movement and the concluding section vary in form and, to one who had not heard the Cambridge performance, are not so easily comprehended as the first. Full of rhythmic vitality, striking in themes, the first movement is in mood peculiarly comparable with the symphonic allegros of Brahms. The seriousness with which Mr Piston writes is obvious, and so, too, is his agreeable lack of pretense and pedantry. Only one exception might reasonably be taken after a single hearing, and that is the impenetrable quality of his instrumentation. But of all the new music heard this season, up to now, the symphony of Roy Harris and Mr Piston's concerto best deserve to be heard again.

D'Indy's variations are indubitably effective in their fine-textured, light-stepping Gallic way. Most ingenious is the fashion in which he presents the most ornate variation first, to represent the fully adorned Istar, setting forth at the very end after Istar's passage by the seven warders, the bare theme itself. Yet if the work were to be heard without knowledge of the literary program, would it prove as interesting, or would it be regarded as a lengthy retrogression from instrumental opulence over the hill to a tonal poorhouse? One inclines to the second view.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading were thoroughly in his customary vein. Yet after an hour of new music, of ineffably delicate impressionism, and Babylonian legend in terms of 19th Century Paris, Brahms had the last word to say in his D Major Symphony. Those who like to put music into convenient mental pigeonholes, generally call this Brahm's "lyric" symphony, and with a degree of justification. For here the composer's habit of emotional repression was temporarily abandoned and Brahms literally revealed what was in his heart. True, he was heard under Dr Koussevitzky's ministrations in accents more fervid than the brusque Johannes would have thought of employing in life, but after he had spoken there was no answer to make. Nothing but to wonder at the genius within him and to reflect that after Beethoven came Brahms.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. For the concerts of April 13 and 14 the following program stands: Beethoven: Incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" (Olga Averino, soprano, and Richard Hale, reader); C. P. E. Bach: Third Symphony for String Orchestra; Randall Thompson: Second Symphony (first times in Boston).

C. W. D.

Post

AY, MARCH 30, 1934

MUSIC OF SPRING BY SYMPHONY

Piston's Concerto for Orchestra Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In deference to Good Friday the first of this week's pair of Symphony concerts took place yesterday afternoon. The programme, to be heard again tomorrow evening, called neither upon "Parsifal" nor upon the "Russian Easter" overture of Rimsky-Korsakov. Its general flavor was spring-like, and it might even be described as pagan.

PISTON'S CONCERTO

In order, the four pieces that make Dr. Koussevitzky's more than usually enjoyable list are Walter Piston's Concerto for orchestra, conducted by the composer; DeBussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun;" d'Indy's "Istar" Variations, and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Mr. Piston's Concerto, heard at Sanders Theatre three weeks ago, is highly creditable to him. It is modern in its complete objectivity and impersonality, in its adherence to the lately revived form of the Concerto Grosso, in its contrapuntal texture, in its free treatment of dissonance and tonality. But unlike many another piece of its kind it teems with salient and arresting ideas. It is a piece that after a second hearing one would gladly hear again, not—like so many others—a piece to be dismissed on a first hearing with a relieved "That's that!" As at Cambridge Mr. Piston conducted easily and with authority and was warmly applauded by the audience.

Debussy and d'Indy

Debussy's Prelude came at a fortunate time in his career. At the beginning of the 'nineties he was finding his own voice; but his harmonic feet, so to speak, were still more or less firmly on the ground. It is conceivable that his later, more individual, more idiosyncratic compositions may not endure as long as the exquisite Prelude to the Eclogue of Mallarme in which musical impressionism had its birth. The performance yesterday was one of rare euphony, of exceeding sensibility, one that gave fresh appeal to familiar measures.

Again the Variations of d'Indy that tell of the Assyrian goddess' descent into the underworld disclose a ripened mastery which had not yet hardened into formalism as in the Second Symphony, which "dates" far more than do the Variations, more even that does the First Symphony. Unless the "Summer Day on the Mountain," unheard here in many years, might be found to surpass it, "Istar" would lay strong claim to being its composer's orchestral masterpiece. It, too, received a glowing performance yesterday, while in the Symphony of Brahms conductor and orchestra quite surpassed themselves.

Brahms' Second

If the Fourth Symphony of Brahms is autumnal, surely the Second is vernal, a music of bursting buds and running sap. The coda of the first movement is the most poetically beautiful passage that Brahms ever wrote. The Allegretto—which yesterday's programme in unconscious humor labelled Adagietto grazioso—was rightly likened by the anti-Brahmsian Runciman to a wild rose.

The finale is Brahms at his most exuberant. And the gravely musing Adagio supplies the needed foil.

Herald MUSIC Mar 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Piston, Concerto for orchestra (conducted by the composer); Debussy, Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune; d'Indy, Symphonic Variation, "Istar"; Brahms, Second Symphony, D major. Conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

As soon as a musician is known to be on the teaching staff of a university his efforts, creative or executive are quite certain to be called "academic," "cerebral," and other terms of such nature. Walter Piston has written a concerto for orchestra that exemplifies the 18th century meaning of the word. Mr. Piston has been very wise in keeping the three movement of his piece within just bounds. Occasionally one has the impression that this composer is emotionally more of an onlooker than a participator in his own music. There is, however, a strong sense of the coherent, almost the inevitable, in the works unfoldment. One may not like the piece; one may wish that Mr. Piston would express himself in a language less dissonant, more original.

Mr. Piston's Concerto gives abundant evidence of unusual contrapuntal skill used to far more serious purpose than mere academic ends. There are passages of singlarly attractive sonorities; there is interesting and varied treatment of concertante groups in the first movement, and there is, withal, an intelligent vitality that command the listener's interest. There are, in this world,, varying standards of beauty which speak in terms of direct understanding to persons, or groups, on different planes of reaction. It is not wise, nor is it just, to dismiss Mr. Piston's language as unpleasant. It may be said to result in a restlessness that is not prophetic of permanency. Many of these things resolve themselves into matters of taste. Further hearings of such a work as Mr. Piston's Concerto are likely to increase one's respect for the composer.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" has been played here too many times by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky, to need more than passing comment. Yesterday's performance seemed to us to surpass previous readings by the same group. Mr. Laurent and Mr. Gillet played the flute and oboe solos with radiant charm.

Interesting contrast in French music came with Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" Variation. Istar, daughter of Sin goes to the land of No-Return in quest of her lover. She leaves a garment at each of seven gates, finally being displayed in the "full splendor of nudity." d'Indy has treated each one of the disrobing episodes as a variation, the sequence becoming simpler in each instance. The eminent follower of Cesar Franck was not exactly the person to portray the sensuous or the sensual in music—perhaps such a thought is irrelevant in regard to "Istar"—but his art is one of great dignity and reflects a mentality steeped in true cultural values.

There seems to be a curious tendency in some parts to look upon the Brahms D major (second) Symphony as an symphonic. Is it the old story of unimportance because it is full of sunshine? A new realization came to us yesterday of its value as a vehicle for a great orchestra. We can think of no "virtuoso" orchestra piece that shows a great instrumental body to better advantage. Boston had, again, reason for pride in her orchestra. Beyond outward evidence was the success of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the response of the orchestra to his every desire. It was a distinguished achievement and the audience knew it.

Next week, Boston will be listening to the Metropolitan Opera Company, April 13 and 14, the Boston Symphony will play the following program: C. P. E. Bach, Symphony No. 3 for string orchestra; Randall Thompson, Symphony No. 2; Beethoven, Music to Goethe's "Egmont."

N.Y. EVENING POST

MAR 3 1 1934

BOSTON CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final concerts of its New York season at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

N.Y. EVENING POST

MAR 3 1 1934

KOUSSEVITZKY OFFERS HINDEMITH AND STRAUSS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the final concerts of its New York season next Thursday evening, April 5, and Saturday afternoon, April 7.

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the evening concert: Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments, which was composed for this orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary and first performed in New York on March 5, 1932; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor.

The closing matinee program includes Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, Opus 6, No. 12; Loeffler's "Evocation," and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor. Charles Martin Loeffler wrote his "Evocation" for orchestra, with a final chorus and speaking voice. It was dedicated to the Cleveland Orchestra, by which it was first performed at the dedicatory concert of Severance Hall, Cleveland, February 5, 1931. This will be the first performance in New York.

"H. T. P." Dies, Notable Figure in Journalism

Member of the Transcript Editorial Staff for Forty-Two Years

Trans Mar 31

Henry Taylor Parker, musical and dramatic editor of the Transcript for the last twenty-nine years and a member of the editorial staff for forty-two, died last evening at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital. Death was due to pneumonia. Although his illness first made itself felt a fortnight ago, it was characteristic of the man that he remained at his desk for a week, working, as was his custom, through most of every night. On Saturday last he was forced to take to his rooms at the Vendome. On Wednesday it became necessary to move him to the hospital. By yesterday morning his illness had taken a sharp turn for the worse, and the end came quickly.

The funeral of Mr. Parker will be held Tuesday noon at Eastman's Funeral Parlors, 896 Beacon street, Back Bay.

Parker, known in theater and concert-hall more simply as "H. T. P.," was born in Boston, April 29, 1867, the son of William Fisk and Susan Sophia (Taylor) Parker. Educated in Boston and in England, he studied at Harvard College from 1886 to 1889. As an undergraduate he participated with George Santayana, Robert Herrick, the novelist, and George Pierce Baker in founding the Harvard Monthly. He also had a hand in writing one of the Hasty Pudding shows of the late 'eighties.

Continued on Page Five

"H. T. P." Dies, Notable Figure in Journalism

Continued from Page One

The years 1889-91 Parker spent studying in Europe. On his return he became New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript, a position which he held until 1903, with the exception of three years during which he was London correspondent for the Transcript and the New York Commercial Advertiser, later the New York Globe. During the years 1903-05 he became dramatic critic, and later music critic, of the New York Globe. In 1905 he returned to Boston to take up the work which was to be the consuming interest of his life.

Indefatigable in his attention to the job at hand, it was Parker's fixed habit of mind never to permit introspection, never to betray an interest in personalia. During his lifetime he never encouraged the collection of more than the most summary information about himself. His occasional reports to the secretary of his Harvard class of 1890 seldom extended to more than a sentence or two. A dozen lines comprise the information about himself which he prepared for "Who's Who." For the rest, he preferred that his daily work should speak for itself.

One exception he made to this rule. This was when he gave friendly consent to an article about him which David McCord wrote for The Theater Arts Monthly in October, 1932. By permission of the author and the Monthly, the Transcript reprints this article in another column, as being a friendly, vivid and not uncritical impression of an unusual figure in American journalism.

By One of "His Boys"

Brooks Atkinson, Dramatic Critic of the New York Times, in Today's Times

EVEN to those of us who learned our trade at his knee, H. T. P. was almost a legend. He could do no wrong. He knew everything. His judgment was final. I have always been proud to be known as one of his men. For his mind was full, his artistic integrity was above reproach and his enthusiasm was volatile. When anyone was unguarded enough to refer to him as "the dean of American critics," he impatiently sputtered. That seemed to him in some odd way to be a reflection upon the age of his mind. What he wanted above everything was to be mentally fresh and emotionally spontaneous. He hated trvial comment and empty cleverness, but what he hated with something approaching virulence was tired criticism. That was unforgivable. To him criticism was a stimulating, highly honorable profession, and he was always trying himself by the highest standards. During the heat of the season nothing seemed to him quite so important as a job of criticism in which the play was understood, the judgment disinterested and the expression distinguished, and he did not care who wrote it.

He prided himself upon being a newspaper man. Once his associates belabored him into collecting some of his musical reviews into book form, but that was a project for which he had vast distaste. He respected newspapers, and as a newspaper man his capacity for work was prodigious. Being both music and dramatic critic he had plenty to do, but he loved it, especially when he was working under pressure. In the old days he could do everything at once. Bustling into the office at about eight in the morning he would edit his assistant's notice, lay out his page, collect news notes and write, in long hand, his own review at formidable length, all in the course of the day's work. By the time the last edition went to press his own review was written and corrected and his page briskly made up—a joy to look at and to read. In recent years, when he had an assistant whom he trusted, he wrote his reviews in the early hours of the morning in his room at the Vendome Hotel and sent them by messenger to the office. To those associated with him his technique for work was fabulous.

He went out of his way to find work. Although he practiced his profession in Boston he hurried to New York to see every play of even the most casual note, and then hurried back to Boston with an armful of copy. He had time for all promising dramatic enterprises, but no time for pretenders. In the course of his regular work he read innumerable newspapers, weeklies and magazines from Europe as well as America, and kept his readers abreast of all the drama and music news of the world. He despised provincialism. Nothing put him into a temper quicker than the New York brand of provincialism. It infuriated him. In addition to all his other work, he had time to maintain a voluminous correspondence with his colleagues, and he wrote letters with the same care and grace that informed his reviewing.

Although music and dramatic criticism absorbed him so thoroughly during the season that he refused to make social engagements until well into the spring, he found time somehow to read all the new books with gusto. He would have been distinguished in any field. In the summers he went abroad, generally to Germany, and sent home informal essays that had the most captivating leisurely flavor; he was always seeing topics for books everywhere he went, and urging other people to write them. As for himself, he was too busy for solid literature. He liked newspapers. He wanted to see the proofs of what he had written instantly. He liked the excitement and pungent odors of the composing room, and the smell of a paper fresh from the press room. The theater and the concert-hall were to him vivid topics for writing, and he was ready to turn out beautiful copy on the spur of the moment. Everything he needed was in his head.

Anyone else would have been burned out and exhausted from all those years of pen-scratching. But not H. T. P. He was never tired. He never felt comfortable without a bundle of copy paper at hand. He was legendary. Those of us who had left his school for critics never felt sure that we were right unless H. T. P. agreed with us. A great critic? I think so. I never knew a better one.

A PORTRAIT of H. T. P., the best appreciation extant of the man and his manner of work, appeared in the following sketch by David McCord, in the Theater Arts Monthly:

Every so often through the winter there is transient, at the Murray Hill Hotel, usually in an inside room on the fifth floor, a small, fierce-eyed individual of graying mustache and adequate age, tweedish clothing, Habig fedora, huge bent bamboo cane, and a German cavalry overcoat, made for him with belt and saddle-split by a military tailor in Wiesbaden. A gentlemen of New York, who would prefer residence in Munich or Vienna, this is H. T. Parker, dramatic and music critic of the Boston Evening Transcript. At home, he lives within gunshot, which he would be too busy to hear, of Beacon Hill. He used to favor its apex, at 132 Bowdoin street; but for as long as it is now important to remember he has taken rooms at the Vendome—respectable, Puritan and the excellent haven of neo-elderly ladies. The third hostel on his list is the equally Victorian Langham, in Portland place, London. Ahead of the times for sixteen of every twenty-four hours, he is behind them only in residence and sleep.

Since late in another century, when he became an harmonious initial, he has been known, read, feared, damned and praised as H. T. P. In Boston, these are letters insidious as G. B. S.; and many a New York manager's complexion has suddenly paled or freshened at what was abundantly said in type above them. It is hardly enough in two fields to call him dean of American critics. One can be dean and intellectually dead. Parker was never more alive. He writes today with the same gusto he once employed for Bernhardt, Caruso, Terry, Coquelin, Marlowe, Modjeska and other artists towering in his time. He knew them all. Of recent years he has paid a farewell tribute to Pavlowa, Diaghileff, Duse and Mrs. Fiske. For Duse indeed ("the glance that pierced to an opposing soul") he printed an epitaph finer poetically than Amy Lowell's sonnets. But his columns still know more of debut than of death. For every figure he has written out he tracks a dozen in. Critics with his over-experience are normally dangerous to moderns, yet Parker never queries the new in terms of the old. Young men and women, O'Neill, an Argentina, a Coward, a Copland, a Cornell, Astaires, Ponses, the Lunts and Moissis arise and pass under the same pen, the same savage enthusiasm that blasted or extolled their predecessors.

+ + +

He lives and writes with a fearful urge, though he always claims to do things leisurely. If Roosevelt was strenuous, Parker is devastating. Thirty years of the Transcript; a column and a quarter to a two-column review, a daily page to edit, two pages of magazine material for Saturdays, monthly ventures to New York, and a vast amount of reading have left him, in the season, time for nothing but more work. Prolific, he belongs with Sainte-Beuve, Mrs. Trollope and Edgar Wallace. Friends who are interested once calculated that in these thirty years he has written and printed the equivalent of 300 full-sized novels, or close to a novel a month. Work is his medicine, and for the loafer he has the artisan's contempt.

Although he never rises before eleven, his day is longer than most men's. At two o'clock he arrives at the office, having walked some twenty blocks to get there, climbed three dismal flights of stairs past Dunne's the clothiers, on the second floor and the telegraph room on the third rather than submit to the doubtful mechanic of an old sweet-smelling hydraulic elevator. Three steps down to the "coop," as he calls it, a den the size of a good linen closet, which he shares with his assistant, who has been there since nine o'clock. There are no cheery "good-mornings." If he says anything at all, it belongs back in the middle of yesterday's conversation. "You know, it never occurred to me then . . . " and he hangs up his coat beside a schoolboy blazer in the Harrow colors. From two until 6.30, unless there is a concert, he slaves with cigarettes, scissors, pen and paste. Anxious exits to the composing room, two flights up, by foot, to find and collar the culprit who got Vandamm's name down Vandamn. Sudden imprecations, followed by personal visits to editors and proof readers, none of whom is visibly pleased to see him. A grunt for the unfortunate office boy who lately fled the scene of his crime, the furious Parker pursuing to the doorway, gesticulating and shouting eagerly, "You cur!" The make-up of his last page in the last edition he rearranges himself. His dinner he usually eats alone. On Mondays he takes the most important play or concert for himself; the next goes to his assistant; the others—quite often as many as seven—he assigns to what he labels "various hands." New shows in Boston usually open on Monday, but he has always concerts, revisits, plays which others have reviewed, and such, to absorb his week. On Wednesdays he prepares a Boston letter for the dramatic page of the Sunday New York Times. He writes all notices religiously locked in his room at the Vendome. He goes to bed, on the average, at four A. M.

Friday mornings from October until June begins a weekly ritual. Roused at 11.30 by a messenger with the proofs of his last night's work, he spends an hour correcting these carefully and penciling private remarks to the proofreader, such as, You idiots, can nobody down there read English?" Breakfast over at two o'clock, he rushes in a taxi to an afternoon symphony, prodding the driver in the back with his cane. At five he is in the office, where he glances at the press notices, throws them all in the wastebasket, and writes his own. It is curiously true that Parker knows more about a play coming to Boston than any of the advance agents. If he hasn't actually seen it, he has clipped, read and digested every New York or London review, and printed portions of them in the bargain. At seven, on Fridays, he departs to a monumental dinner; in the old days at Young's, but more recently at Locke's or the Parker House. Once it was tripe and beefsteak a cheval; now more usually mock turtle soups, planked steaks, no dessert, no cigars, and black coffee. Back at the office, he has cleaned up the Saturday magazine pages by 12.30. Supper at one, at the Vendome, of Westphalian ham and Gouda cheese. After that he writes two columns on the symphony, finishing often as early as six in the morning. He sleeps till eleven, races through the Saturday papers, attends an afternoon concert, hears the identical Friday symphony repeated in the evening, retires to his room and writes two or three more columns. By then he is really spent, and liable to sleep twelve hours. On Sunday afternoon his week's work begins.

His office, like the rest of the ancient Transcript building, is "something out of Fleet street and the imagination. It holds two desks, three chairs, a table and hatrack, and looks out of a single window upon a disreputable courtyard which Parker obliviously never sees. On a high, inaccessible shelf a long line of dusty scrapbooks contain Parkeriana from the beginning until 1916, when the vicious practice of preservation was abandoned. There are no other files. The office walls and the door he has decorated with caricatures of Shaw, Stravinski, movie stills, suspicious irreverences, and Roth's cartoon of a Rotarian on the way to convention. Except for dictionaries and waiting review copes, there are no books. Visitors are never welcome, but every day the slow stream of paid reviewers, press agents, photographers, messenger boys, late copy and people sponging for tickets steadily wears an already well-worn temper. Parker is generous with tickets—to a point. One of the points was passed when a printer's devil, after being what was called ominously pleasant for two weeks, finally sidled up and said: "Mr. Parker, how's that show, 'Bunty Pulls the Strngs' at the Cort?" It's good," said H. T. P., "and well worth two dollars of any man's money."

+ + +

Here in the coop, as at home, he writes entirely in long hand, a practice probably not tolerated on any other American paper. Only a dozen people can decipher his writing, though he argues with some truth: "I always make the same letter in the same way." One says: I read French, German, Spanish and Parker. Fortunately, besides his linotype man, proof readers, assistant, and a few patient friends, this number includes the owners of the paper. Every so often an undertone of talk about a typewriter ends with a sample of Parker's worst sent up to the chief. But he looks at it and, without reading it, says, "Anybody can read that," and there's an end to it.

Cigarettes, in his waking hours, are a kind of fuel. He prefers cork tips, but will frequently light and smoke the wrong end. Once lit, the thing is never out of his mouth until he throws it away. If he talks, he talks straight through it; and in moments of impassioned speech a shower of sparks accompanies each sibilant. When Bowker, last of the fire-eaters, was city editor, he and H. T. P. often warred over policy or makeup. One day, having stormed the citadel, Parker uttered his opinion with a fine volley of sparks, many of which fell on Bowker. "Damn it, Parker!" said the editor (or is supposed to have said), "when you talk to me take that rocket out of your mouth."

Because he creates it, he is always in his element. Again the short, bowed, impatient figure; now in a cutaway of astonishing cast, occupying only one of his two seats at the play or symphony, constantly talked about and pointed out, but almost never spoken to. He does not visibly desire friendship. Sometimes in the lobby, to which he repairs with the agility of a cat, you will find him conversing in sudden heat with another of his staff, or possibly with the manager. But you may be sure, in the second case, that it was the manager who began. Barrie, writing to William Archer, accused him, between the acts, of sordid conference with "two bearded ruffians," A. B. Walkley and G. B. Shaw. Mr. Parker is publicly alone. If you should dare to address him, he will answer briefly, cigarette in mouth, his head bobbing emphatic emphasis behind a cloud of volcanic ash. His manner does not suggest long interviews. An infallible ability to make his first comment sound like his last produces an awkward silence not easily broken by anything short of departure.

Once in his seat, he cleaves to the stage. Negligible wits who refer to H. T. P. as Hell-To-Pay and lash him for the chronic grouch he never was, would be shocked to find him, under the strain of competent drama (particularly when it deals with fallen women in distress), more emotional than a debutante. Lacriae rerum. His breathing, hard as all great smokers,' when quickened betrays him too. He never makes a note, but if he has been honestly moved his columns next day will cross the high meridian of art.

A week of repertory, particularly from England, Ireland, Germany or Moscow, finds him in the fifth row each night in prop. persona. His own phantom, after Lesoux, in a red lined opera cloak or Parker sack, he covers annually a large part of the Chicago Opera Company's visit, describing critically, at magnificent length the Boston society it entertains, for which he writes, which he otherwise ignores, and down whose aisles he has arrogantly walked, untouched as Moses crossing out Egypt. Dramatic and musical enterprises, at Harvard and Radcliffe, if they make any sort of artistic pretence call for an out-of-town visit and full honorable mention, greatly prized. He has gone to Worcester for festivals and to Quincy for "Strange Interlude." He loves the ballet, and detests the movies. He has seen only one talkie and that was in Russian.

At the symphony his seats are in the first row of the first balcony, just to the right and above the orchestra, where he perches, a small and bitter gargoyle above the Brahmin sea. He has a Continental method, and rather objectionable, of applauding by bringing his cane into sharp contact with the floor. An accurate myth relates that once he brought it down on the toes of Mrs. Jac

By One of "His Boys"

Brooks Atkinson, Dramatic Critic of the New York Times, in Today's Times

EVEN to those of us who learned our trade at his knee, H. T. P. was almost a legend. He could do no wrong. He knew everything. His judgment was final. I have always been proud to be known as one of his men. For his mind was full, his artistic integrity was above reproach and his enthusiasm was volatile. When anyone was unguarded enough to refer to him as "the dean of American critics," he impatiently sputtered. That seemed to him in some odd way to be a reflection upon the age of his mind. What he wanted above everything was to be mentally fresh and emotionally spontaneous. He hated trvial comment and empty cleverness, but what he hated with something approaching virulence was tired criticism. That was unforgivable. To him criticism was a stimulating, highly honorable profession, and he was always trying himself by the highest standards. During the heat of the season nothing seemed to him quite so important as a job of criticism in which the play was understood, the judgment disinterested and the expression distinguished, and he did not care who wrote it.

He prided himself upon being a newspaper man. Once his associates belabored him into collecting some of his musical reviews into book form, but that was a project for which he had vast distaste. He respected newspapers, and as a newspaper man his capacity for work was prodigious. Being both music and dramatic critic he had plenty to do, but he loved it, especially when he was working under pressure. In the old days he could do everything at once. Bustling into the office at about eight in the morning he would edit his assistant's notice, lay out his page, collect news notes and write, in long hand, his own review at formidable length, all in the course of the day's work. By the time the last edition went to press his own review was written and corrected and his page briskly made up—a joy to look at and to read. In recent years, when he had an assistant whom he trusted, he wrote his reviews in the early hours of the morning in his room at the Vendome Hotel and sent them by messenger to the office. To those associated with him his technique for work was fabulous.

He went out of his way to find work. Although he practiced his profession in Boston he hurried to New York to see every play of even the most casual note, and then hurried back to Boston with an armful of copy. He had time for all promising dramatic enterprises, but no time for pretenders. In the course of his regular work he read innumerable newspapers, weeklies and magazines from Europe as well as America, and kept his readers abreast of all the drama and music news of the world. He despised provincialism. Nothing put him into a temper quicker than the New York brand of provincialism. It infuriated him. In addition to all his other work, he had time to maintain a voluminous correspondence with his colleagues, and he wrote letters with the same care and grace that informed his reviewing.

Although music and dramatic criticism absorbed him so thoroughly during the season that he refused to make social engagements until well into the spring, he found time somehow to read all the new books with gusto. He would have been distinguished in any field. In the summers he went abroad, generally to Germany, and sent home informal essays that had the most captivating leisurely flavor; he was always seeing topics for books everywhere he went, and urging other people to write them. As for himself, he was too busy for solid literature. He liked newspapers. He wanted to see the proofs of what he had written instantly. He liked the excitement and pungent odors of the composing room, and the smell of a paper fresh from the press room. The theater and the concert-hall were to him vivid topics for writing, and he was ready to turn out beautiful copy on the spur of the moment. Everything he needed was in his head.

Anyone else would have been burned out and exhausted from all those years of pen-scratching. But not H. T. P. He was never tired. He never felt comfortable without a bundle of copy paper at hand. He was legendary. Those of us who had left his school for critics never felt sure that we were right unless H. T. P. agreed with us. A great critic? I think so. I never knew a better one.

A PORTRAIT of H. T. P., the best appreciation extant of the man and his manner of work, appeared in the following sketch by David McCord, in the Theater Arts Monthly:

Every so often through the winter there is transient, at the Murray Hill Hotel, usually in an inside room on the fifth floor, a small, fierce-eyed individual of graying mustache and adequate age, tweedish clothing, Habig fedora, huge bent bamboo cane, and a German cavalry overcoat, made for him with belt and saddle-split by a military tailor in Wiesbaden. A gentlemen of New York, who would prefer residence in Munich or Vienna, this is H. T. Parker, dramatic and music critic of the Boston Evening Transcript. At home, he lives within gunshot, which he would be too busy to hear, of Beacon Hill. He used to favor its apex, at 132 Bowdoin street; but for as long as it is now important to remember he has taken rooms at the Vendome—respectable, Puritan and the excellent haven of neo-elderly ladies. The third hostel on his list is the equally Victorian Langham, in Portland place, London. Ahead of the times for sixteen of every twenty-four hours, he is behind them only in residence and sleep.

Since late in another century, when he became an harmonious initial, he has been known, read, feared, damned and praised as H. T. P. In Boston, these are letters insidious as G. B. S.; and many a New York manager's complexion has suddenly paled or freshened at what was abundantly said in type above them. It is hardly enough in two fields to call him dean of American critics. One can be dean and intellectually dead. Parker was never more alive. He writes today with the same gusto he once employed for Bernhardt. Caruso. Terry. Coquelin, Marlowe, Modjeska and other artists towering in his time. He knew them all. Of recent years he has paid a farewell tribute to Pavlowa, Diaghileff, Duse and Mrs. Fiske. For Duse indeed ("the glance that pierced to an opposing soul") he printed an epitaph finer poetically than Amy Lowell's sonnets. But his columns still know more of debut than of death. For every figure he has written out he tracks a dozen in. Critics with his over-experience are normally dangerous to moderns, yet Parker never queries the new in terms of the old. Young men and women, O'Neill, an Argentina, a Coward, a Copland, a Cornell, Astaires, Ponses, the Lunts and Moissis arise and pass under the same pen, the same savage enthusiasm that blasted or extolled their predecessors.

+ + +

He lives and writes with a fearful urge, though he always claims to do things leisurely. If Roosevelt was strenuous, Parker is devastating. Thirty years of the Transcript; a column and a quarter to a two-column review, a daily page to edit, two pages of magazine material for Saturdays, monthly ventures to New York, and a vast amount of reading have left him, in the season, time for nothing but more work. Prolific, he belongs with Sainte-Beuve, Mrs. Trollope and Edgar Wallace. Friends who are interested once calculated that in these thirty years he has written and printed the equivalent of 300 full-sized novels, or close to a novel a month. Work is his medicine, and for the loafer he has the artisan's contempt.

Although he never rises before eleven, his day is longer than most men's. At two o'clock he arrives at the office, having walked some twenty blocks to get there, climbed three dismal flights of stairs past Dunne's the clothiers, on the second floor and the telegraph room on the third rather than submit to the doubtful mechanic of an old sweet-smelling hydraulic elevator. Three steps down to the "coop," as he calls it, a den the size of a good linen closet, which he shares with his assistant, who has been there since nine o'clock. There are no cheery "good-mornings." If he says anything at all, it belongs back in the middle of yesterday's conversation. "You know, it never occurred to me then . . . " and he hangs up his coat beside a schoolboy blazer in the Harrow colors. From two until 6.30, unless there is a concert, he slaves with cigarettes, scissors, pen and paste. Anxious exits to the composing room, two flights up, by foot, to find and collar the culprit who got Vandamm's name down Vandamn. Sudden imprecations, followed by personal visits to editors and proof readers, none of whom is visibly pleased to see him A grunt for the unfortunate office boy who lately fled the scene of his crime, the furious Parker pursuing to the doorway, gesticulating and shouting eagerly, "You cur!" The make-up of his last page in the last edition he rearranges himself. His dinner he usually eats alone. On Mondays he takes the most important play or concert for himself; the next goes to his assistant; the others—quite often as many as seven—he assigns to what he labels "various hands." New shows in Boston usually open on Monday, but he has always concerts, revisits, plays which others have reviewed, and such, to absorb his week. On Wednesdays he prepares a Boston letter for the dramatic page of the Sunday New York Times. He writes all notices religiously locked in his room at the Vendome. He goes to bed, on the average, at four A. M.

Friday mornings from October until June begins a weekly ritual. Roused at 11.30 by a messenger with the proofs of his last night's work, he spends an hour correcting these carefully and penciling private remarks to the proofreader, such as, You idiots, can nobody down there read English?" Breakfast over at two o'clock, he rushes in a taxi to an afternoon symphony, prodding the driver in the back with his cane. At five he is in the office, where he glances at the press notices, throws them all in the wastebasket, and writes his own. It is curiously true that Parker knows more about a play coming to Boston than any of the advance agents. If he hasn't actually seen it, he has clipped, read and digested every New York or London review, and printed portions of them in the bargain. At seven, on Fridays, he departs to a monumental dinner; in the old days at Young's, but more recently at Locke's or the Parker House. Once it was tripe and beefsteak a cheval; now more usually mock turtle soups, planked steaks, no dessert, no cigars, and black coffee. Back at the office, he has cleaned up the Saturday magazine pages by 12.30. Supper at one, at the Vendome, of Westphalian ham and Gouda cheese. After that he writes two columns on the symphony, finishing often as early as six in the morning. He sleeps till eleven, races through the Saturday papers, attends an afternoon concert, hears the identical Friday symphony repeated in the evening, retires to his room and writes two or three more columns. By then he is really spent, and liable to sleep twelve hours. On Sunday afternoon his week's work begins.

His office, like the rest of the ancient Transcript building, is something out of Fleet street and the imagination. It holds two desks, three chairs, a table and hatrack, and looks out of a single window upon a disreputable courtyard which Parker obliviously never sees. On a high, inaccessible shelf a long line of dusty scrapbooks contain Parkeriana from the beginning until 1916, when the vicious practice of preservation was abandoned. There are no other files. The office walls and the door he has decorated with caricatures of Shaw, Stravinski, movie stills, suspicious irreverences, and Roth's cartoon of a Rotarian on the way to convention. Except for dictionaries and waiting review copes, there are no books. Visitors are never welcome, but every day the slow stream of paid reviewers, press agents, photographers, messenger boys, late copy and people sponging for tickets steadily wears an already well-worn temper. Parker is generous with tickets—to a point. One of the points was passed when a printer's devil, after being what was called ominously pleasant for two weeks, finally sidled up and said: "Mr. Parker, how's that show, 'Bunty Pulls the Strngs' at the Cort?" It's good," said H. T. P., "and well worth two dollars of any man's money."

+ + +

Here in the coop, as at home, he writes entirely in long hand, a practice probably not tolerated on any other American paper. Only a dozen people can decipher his writing, though he argues with some truth: "I always make the same letter in the same way." One says: I read French, German, Spanish and Parker. Fortunately, besides his linotype man, proof readers, assistant, and a few patient friends, this number includes the owners of the paper. Every so often an undertone of talk about a typewriter ends with a sample of Parker's worst sent up to the chief. But he looks at it and, without reading it, says, "Anybody can read that," and there's an end to it.

Cigarettes, in his waking hours, are a kind of fuel. He prefers cork tips, but will frequently light and smoke the wrong end. Once lit, the thing is never out of his mouth until he throws it away. If he talks, he talks straight through it; and in moments of impassioned speech a shower of sparks accompanies each sibilant. When Bowker, last of the fire-eaters, was city editor, he and H. T. P. often warred over policy or makeup. One day, having stormed the citadel, Parker uttered his opinion with a fine volley of sparks, many of which fell on Bowker. "Damn it, Parker!" said the editor (or is supposed to have said), "when you talk to me take that rocket out of your mouth."

Because he creates it, he is always in his element. Again the short, bowed, impatient figure; now in a cutaway of astonishing cast, occupying only one of his two seats at the play or symphony. constantly talked about and pointed out. but almost never spoken to. He does not visibly desire friendship. Sometimes in the lobby, to which he repairs with the agility of a cat, you will find him conversing in sudden heat with another of his staff, or possibly with the manager. But you may be sure, in the second case, that it was the manager who began. Barrie, writing to William Archer, accused him, between the acts, of sordid conference with "two bearded ruffians," A. B. Walkley and G. B. Shaw. Mr. Parker is publicly alone. If you should dare to address him, he will answer briefly, cigarette in mouth, his head bobbing emphatic emphasis behind a cloud of volcanic ash. His manner does not suggest long interviews. An infallible ability to make his first comment sound like his last produces an awkward silence not easily broken by anything short of departure.

Once in his seat, he cleaves to the stage. Negligible wits who refer to H. T. P. as Hell-To-Pay and lash him for the chronic grouch he never was, would be shocked to find him, under the strain of competent drama (particularly when it deals with fallen women in distress), more emotional than a debutante. Lacriae rerum. His breathing, hard as all great smokers,' when quickened betrays him too. He never makes a note. but if he has been honestly moved his columns next day will cross the high meridian of art.

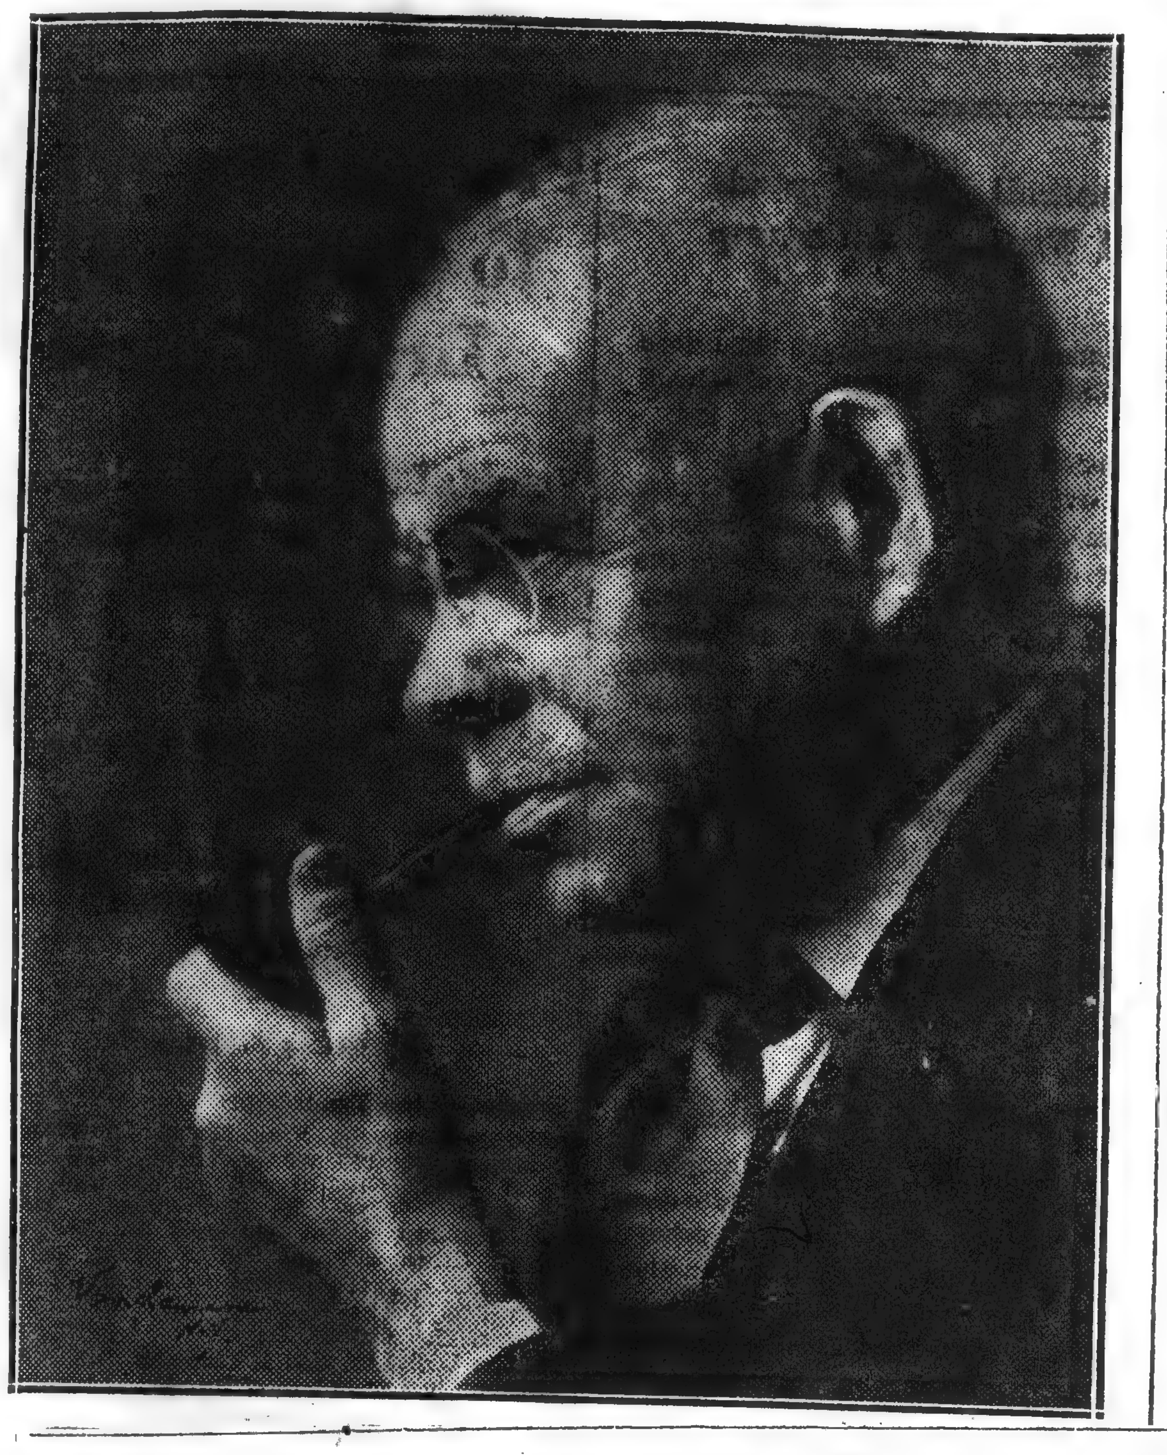
A week of repertory, particularly from England, Ireland, Germany or Moscow, finds him in the fifth row each night in prop. persona. His own phantom, after Lesoux, in a red lined opera cloak or Parker sack, he covers annually a large part of the Chicago Opera Company's visit, describing critically, at magnificent length the Boston society it entertains, for which he writes, which he otherwise ignores, and down whose aisles he has arrogantly walked, untouched as Moses crossing out Egypt. Dramatic and musical enterprises, at Harvard and Radcliffe, if they make any sort of artistic pretence call for an out-of-town visit and full honorable mention, greatly prized. He has gone to Worcester for festivals and to Quincy for "Strange Interlude." He loves the ballet, and detests the movies. He has seen only one talkie and that was in Russian.

At the symphony his seats are in the first row of the first balcony, just to the right and above the orchestra, where he perches, a small and bitter gargoyle above the Brahmin sea. He has a Continental method, and rather objectionable, of applauding by bringing his cane into sharp contact with the floor. An accurate myth relates that once he brought it down on the toes of Mrs. Jack

Trans Mar 31

BOSTON EVENING

H. T. P.



Gardner, with whom he was sharing a box. Echoes of the fireworks which followed will survive them both.

Call him the man who broke the back of English prose. He writes, he says, "a perfectly natural style"; but readers unable or unwilling to follow dismiss it as Germanic or modeled on the dyspeptics of Carlyle. That is quite wrong. In his own opinion, its singular grain goes back to Latin and to the best of Francis Parkman. He was once told in college (by Adams Sherman Hill) that Parkman wrote the English of exceptional gods. Apparently he never forgot it; but this is wrong, too, and the likeness is not there. As to Emerson's friend from Ecclefechan, Parker has scarcely read a line of him. No, as with everything else, his style is very much his own; full of queer tricks with datives, omission of articles and unexpected inversions "as the day upturns them." Architecturally, each review comes smarting to the point. The craftsman in him acknowledges: "I like the slow building up of the argument, bringing the thing into focus." For a small man, the length of his shadow is great.

Many vigorous individuals have served him as assistants or as members of his staff and escaped to their own publics with their own integrities: Forrest Izzard, Hiram K. Moderwell, Kenneth Macgowan and Brooks Atkinson. Parker also published much of the early work of Gilbert Seldes, Isaac Goldberg, Gluyas Williams and John Mason Brown. He is proud of helping anybody or any cause worth while, and is pleased in particular that he had a share in starting the Harvard Glee Club, under Dr. Davison, to fame.

Newspapers are his disease. Although certain things are clipped for him and on his desk every noon when he arrives, he reads with incredible swiftness the essentials of about fifteen papers a day. It used to be twenty. Five are New York, four London, two Chicago, the Manchester Guardian, Berlin Vossische Zeitung, Le Temps and Figaro from Paris. Every week he buys a sheaf of magazines from the New Republic and the English weekly reviews to Simplicissimus, which fall to his own scissors. He uses quantities of photographs, captioned with quotations out of his head or Bartlett's with a special weakness for Shakspeare.

Nobody, not even himself, could write accurately his life. Dave Wallace and Adolph Klauber are reputed the only men in New York who know even his whole name. His days are confounded, it seems, between New England, where he was born; England, where he went to school; Harvard, where he ranked with the class of 1890; New York, where he began as a critic, and Boston, where he lives.

Every summer he goes to Europe, gives up cigarettes and smokes a pipe. By synthetic accident of foreign clothes, tri-lingual facility and the Continental manner he is assumed in London to be a Frenchman, in Paris a German, and in Berlin an Englishman. But people cross the street to him as to a native for direction and advice. He declares that once at Cambridge, England, he was mistaken for an Oxford don. When he can, he books passage on the North German Lloyd, which he fancies to carry the best assorted cheese. On the way over, professors are known to have enticed him into cards, and, once arrived, the vineyards of the Rhine belt to good Rhenish wine. A client of Messrs. Coutts, he always travels in sterling, and was caught with fallen pounds when England went off the gold standard. He has been as high as the Alps and as far north as Christiania. Arizona, which he has visited, and New Hampshire, where he has lived, figure now only in the past. Festivals of music, a week of ballet, Salzburg, Weimar and the great art centers are annual flames to his annual moth. But he avoids crowds as he avoids any contact with actors and musicians, in whose private lives he has, almost without exception, a dead lack of interest. Just to keep his hand in, to remove the damning stigma of "vacation," he does three or four columns each week for the Transcript and writes long, impetuous letters to astonished friends

---

H. T. P., NOTED CRITIC, IS TAKEN BY DEATH

Succumbs in Boston After Week's Illness

Globe Mar 31

Henry Taylor Parker, known on two continents as "H. T. P.," famed dramatic, dance and musical critic of the Boston Transcript, died last night at 7:10 at Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, following a week's illness.

For more than a quarter of a century, H. T. P. had been an outstanding figure in New England—and New York—journalism. Rated by his contemporary critics as one of the five best dramatic critics in the country, and perhaps second to none in scholarship, he wrote in his newspaper lifetime enough copy to fill the equivalent of 300 full-sized novels. Since he became known as an harmonious initial at the turn of the century, he had been one of the most discussed critics in the country and his opinions upon dramatic and musical quality were accepted almost without question by his readers.

He was born in Boston on April 20, 1867, the son of William and Susan Sophia Parker. After studying at Harvard, where he was a classmate of George Santayana, George Pierce Baker and Robert Herrick, he studied and traveled in Europe and then came back to join the Transcript as New York correspondent, in 1892. He later became London correspondent for the same paper and in 1903 became the dramatic critic. He took a similar position with the New York Globe, but returned to the Transcript in 1905.

His particular hobby was the European theatre. He was unmarried and lived at 160 Commonwealth av.

H. T. P.—Ave atque Vale

Always Unbiased

[From the Jewish Advocate]

The name of Henry Taylor Parker ("H. T. P.") is known to thousands who value and appreciate a seasoned and mature—always unbiased—appraisal of the current drama. For twenty-nine years, Mr. Parker catered to the cultivated taste of the readers of our very good neighbor and contemporary, the Boston Evening Transcript. Now death has silenced Mr. Parker and the loss is felt—and will yet be more keenly felt as time goes on—by a legion of admirers.

An equally capable critic says of "H. T. P."—and truly so:

> Few critics in any city in the world enjoyed the Olympian power of H. T. P. On every play and opera and concert in Boston his word was gospel. He seldom wrote less than 1250 words, by his own count, on anything, but his readers knew that his judgment would be mature, sincere and directed by a scholarly acquaintance with the best in dramatic and musical traditions.
>
> There was nothing half-baked or petty about him. He was merciless in his discussion of writing or acting or singing, but he was fair and he was thorough, and his reviews told all that anyone cared to know. The student or connoisseur would find a scholarly essay; the average playgoer, a sane critique.

"H. T. P." was—as the Transcript is—a Boston institution. It will be difficult to replace this student and exponent of the drama. For such men of balanced judgment in their chosen field are rare indeed.

His Waiting Public

[From the Baltimore Sun]

In Boston, if you were taken to the theater on the first night, it was as necessary that you take note of H. T. Parker, of the Boston Transcript, striding to his seat, as to read the cast of characters on the program. Furthermore, it was even more necessary to read his exhaustive criticism in the next evening's Transcript. A review by "H. T. P." appeared forbiddingly long, but when you got through it you knew something about the play, its place in theatrical history, its genealogy, its merits and defects. In a rapid and impetuous style, "H. T. P." tore into his subject, leaving the reader with the breathless conclusion either that it would be a good idea to see that play again or that the author, cast and impresario deserved hanging.

For almost thirty years the Boston Brahmins have waited for H. T. Parker to tell them how they liked last night's performance, and although his enthusiasms and disdains were often criticized it was seldom indeed that anybody had anything on him in point of knowledge. The chances were that he had already seen the piece, in London or New York, before it got to Boston at all, and, if he hadn't he had digested a complete file of all the reviews and notices. Therefore, he was not forced, even if such a thing had been possible with him, to toss off glib personalities and exhibitionistic paragraphs and call the result a play review or a criticism of a symphony concert.

He was sixty-seven when he died, but nobody had reported that he was slowing down, or that his interest in contemporary life, every side of it, was any less acute. He was still working like a helot, filling in his few idle moments with a column on miscellaneous subjects. As his former assistant, Brooks Atkinson, now critic for the New York Times, has written of him, "He was never tired. He never felt comfortable without a bundle of copy paper at hand." An enviable way to live, an estimable way to die.

Her. Apr

H. T. P.

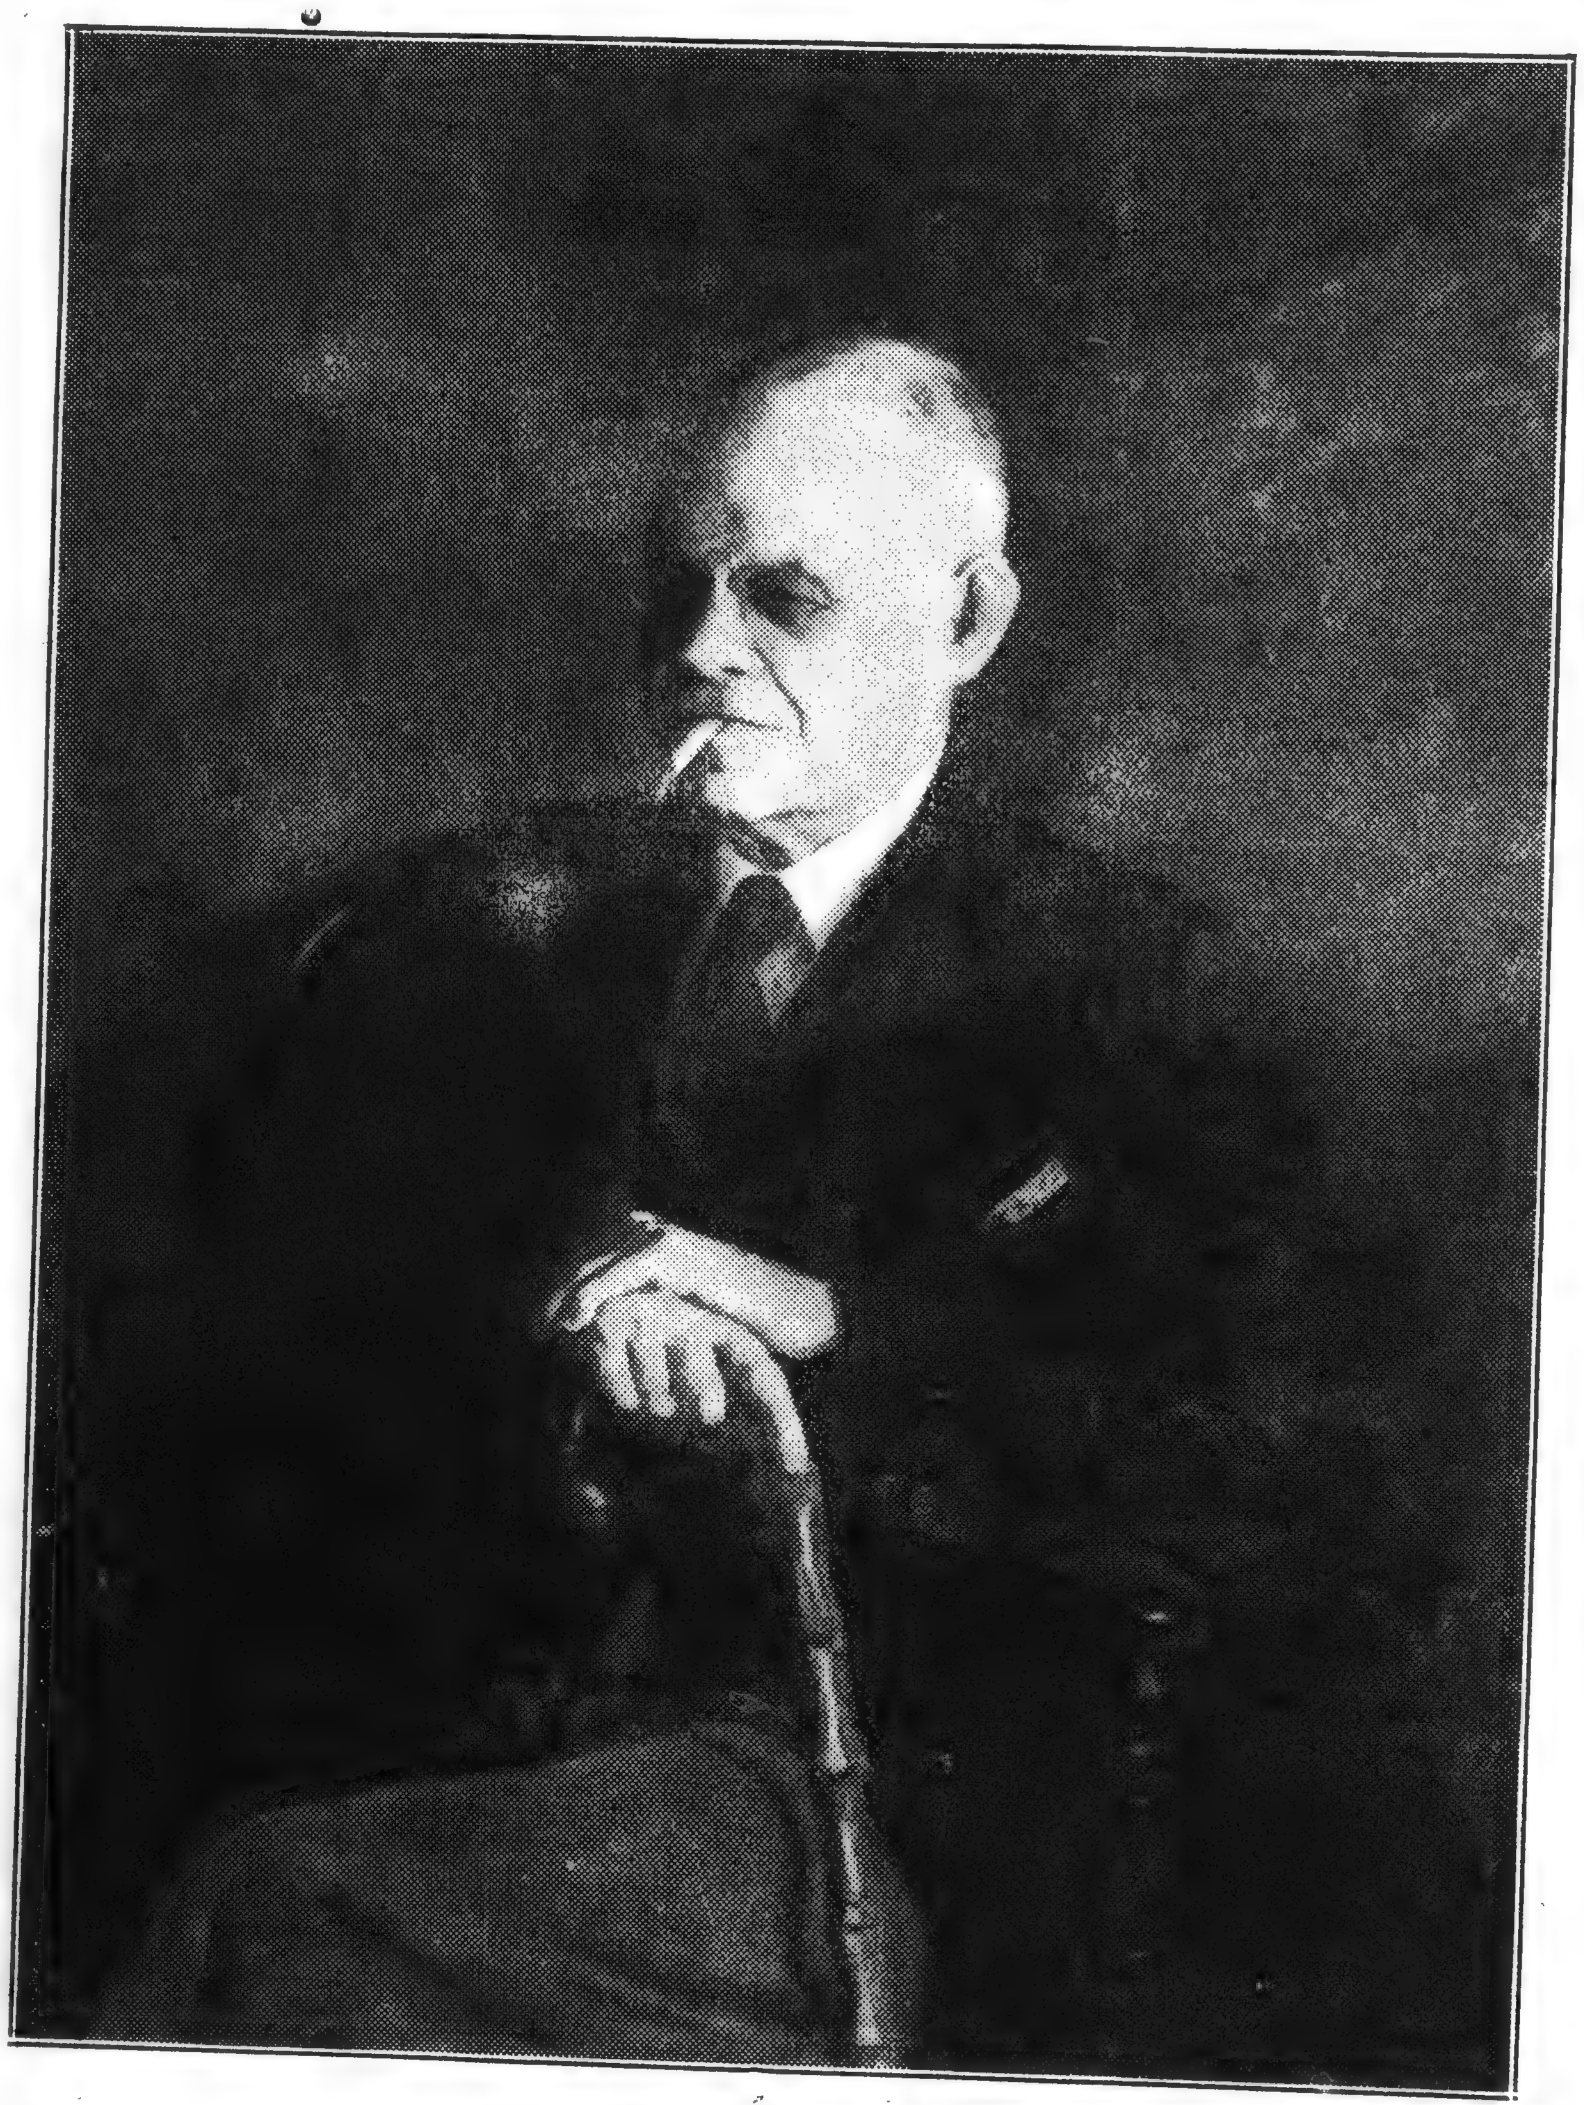
Henry Taylor Parker of the Transcript was the critical spirit embodied. He followed a monkish existence, concentrating his affection on the dramatic and musical arts. These were his gods and goddesses, his law, and his life. On their authentic representatives on earth he could heap no praise too abundantly. On their traducers he could pile no scorn too bitterly. The theatre and the concert-hall were altars for the performance of sacred rites, and his emotions soared and his pen flowed excitedly over the page when the rites were performed correctly.

To the humble layman the occasion may have been merely an evening's entertainment or an evening of boredom. To the little man in the fifth row it was something to be appraised and re-appraised with a searching eye, a sensitive ear, and a feverish hand. Tragedy or farce, opera or soloist, an ideal comparison existed for it somewhere. To this it must be joyously likened or derisively contrasted.

It was this almost fanatical devotion to his work which made Mr. Parker a great critic and also, perhaps inevitably, rather a lonely, legendary figure. He was not, it need hardly be said, an amiable person. His interests were too centered, his standards too ethereal, for him to find much satisfaction in the mundane opinions of his newspaper contemporaries. But within the realm of the theatre his sympathies were broad and all-inclusive. Especially for the younger playwrights and actors, he possessed an understanding which belied his years and his crusty exterior. His death deprives the American theatre of an outstanding personality, who, while never a part of it, lived passionately for it.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1934

. . . The Curtain Falls: The Critic Leaves



"H. T. P.," by Gordon Hansen

A Portrait from Life of the Late Henry Taylor Parker, the Finishing Touches of Which Were Added by Mr. Hansen But a Few Weeks Ago

---

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 1 - 1934

Serge Koussevitky

Who conducts twice at Carnegie Hall

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

APR 1 - 1934

Koussevitzky Music Plan Is Turned Down

By JOHN T. LAMBERT

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY would have Sunday afternoon concerts. By Boston Symphony. At popular prices. For people of moderate means. Who love good music. But the trustees stand against him. On the ground it would be "undignified."

* * *

WELL, MASS.
AY TELEGRAM

APR 1 - 1934

MYSTERY PROGRAMME FOR BENEFIT CONCERT

There are indications of a large audience at the coming concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give for the benefit of the Emergency Relief Fund in Symphony hall, on Wednesday evening, April 11th.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra are planning a programme of entirely unprecedented character. No detail will be disclosed until the concert is actually given.

The patronage of the concert is increasing through the efforts of Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley, Mr. Pierpont L. Stackpole, and a large committee of sponsors.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 1 - 1934

Appearance Tuesday To Be Last

Richard Burgin Will Be The Violin Soloist, Presenting Violin Concerto Of Sibelius

Brahms No. 1 In C Minor Is Symphony Group To Give Three Performances Next Year

BALTIMORE'S orchestral season comes to a close next Tuesday night when the Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and with Richard Burgin as the violin soloist will present the following program.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G. major for string orchestra.......Bach
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D minor, Op. 47...........Sibelius
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor....Brahms

The Brandenburg Concerto is the third of a set of six completed in March, 1721. They were written at the request of a Prussian prince, Christian Ludwig, Margraf of Brandenburg. It was first performed by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck in 1907 and has become a favorite of Dr. Koussevitzky's repertoire.

PREMIERE IN BERLIN

The Sibelius Violin Concerto was published in 1905 and was first played by Halir in Berlin, the fall of that year. It had its United States premiere at a Philharmonic Society concert in 1906, with the late Maud Powell as the soloist. Sibelius was born in Finland in 1865 and is still living in his native land. He is recognized as its greatest composer and his work is in growing demand. The violin concerto has been pronounced impossibly difficult, one reason, it is said, why it is so seldom heard. It has been called, also, a symphony with a violin solo on account of the important and eloquent beauty of the orchestral part. Mr. Burgin, who will play it Tuesday night, is a native of Warsaw, having been born in 1892. At the age of 8 he studied with Lotto, and later became a pupil of Joachim, in Berlin; between 1908 and 1912 he was an Auer pupil. He made his concert debut at 12, with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra and came to New York in 1907. In the fall of 1920 he was made concert master of the Boston Symphony and has held the position uninterruptedly.

FOLLOWED BEETHOVEN

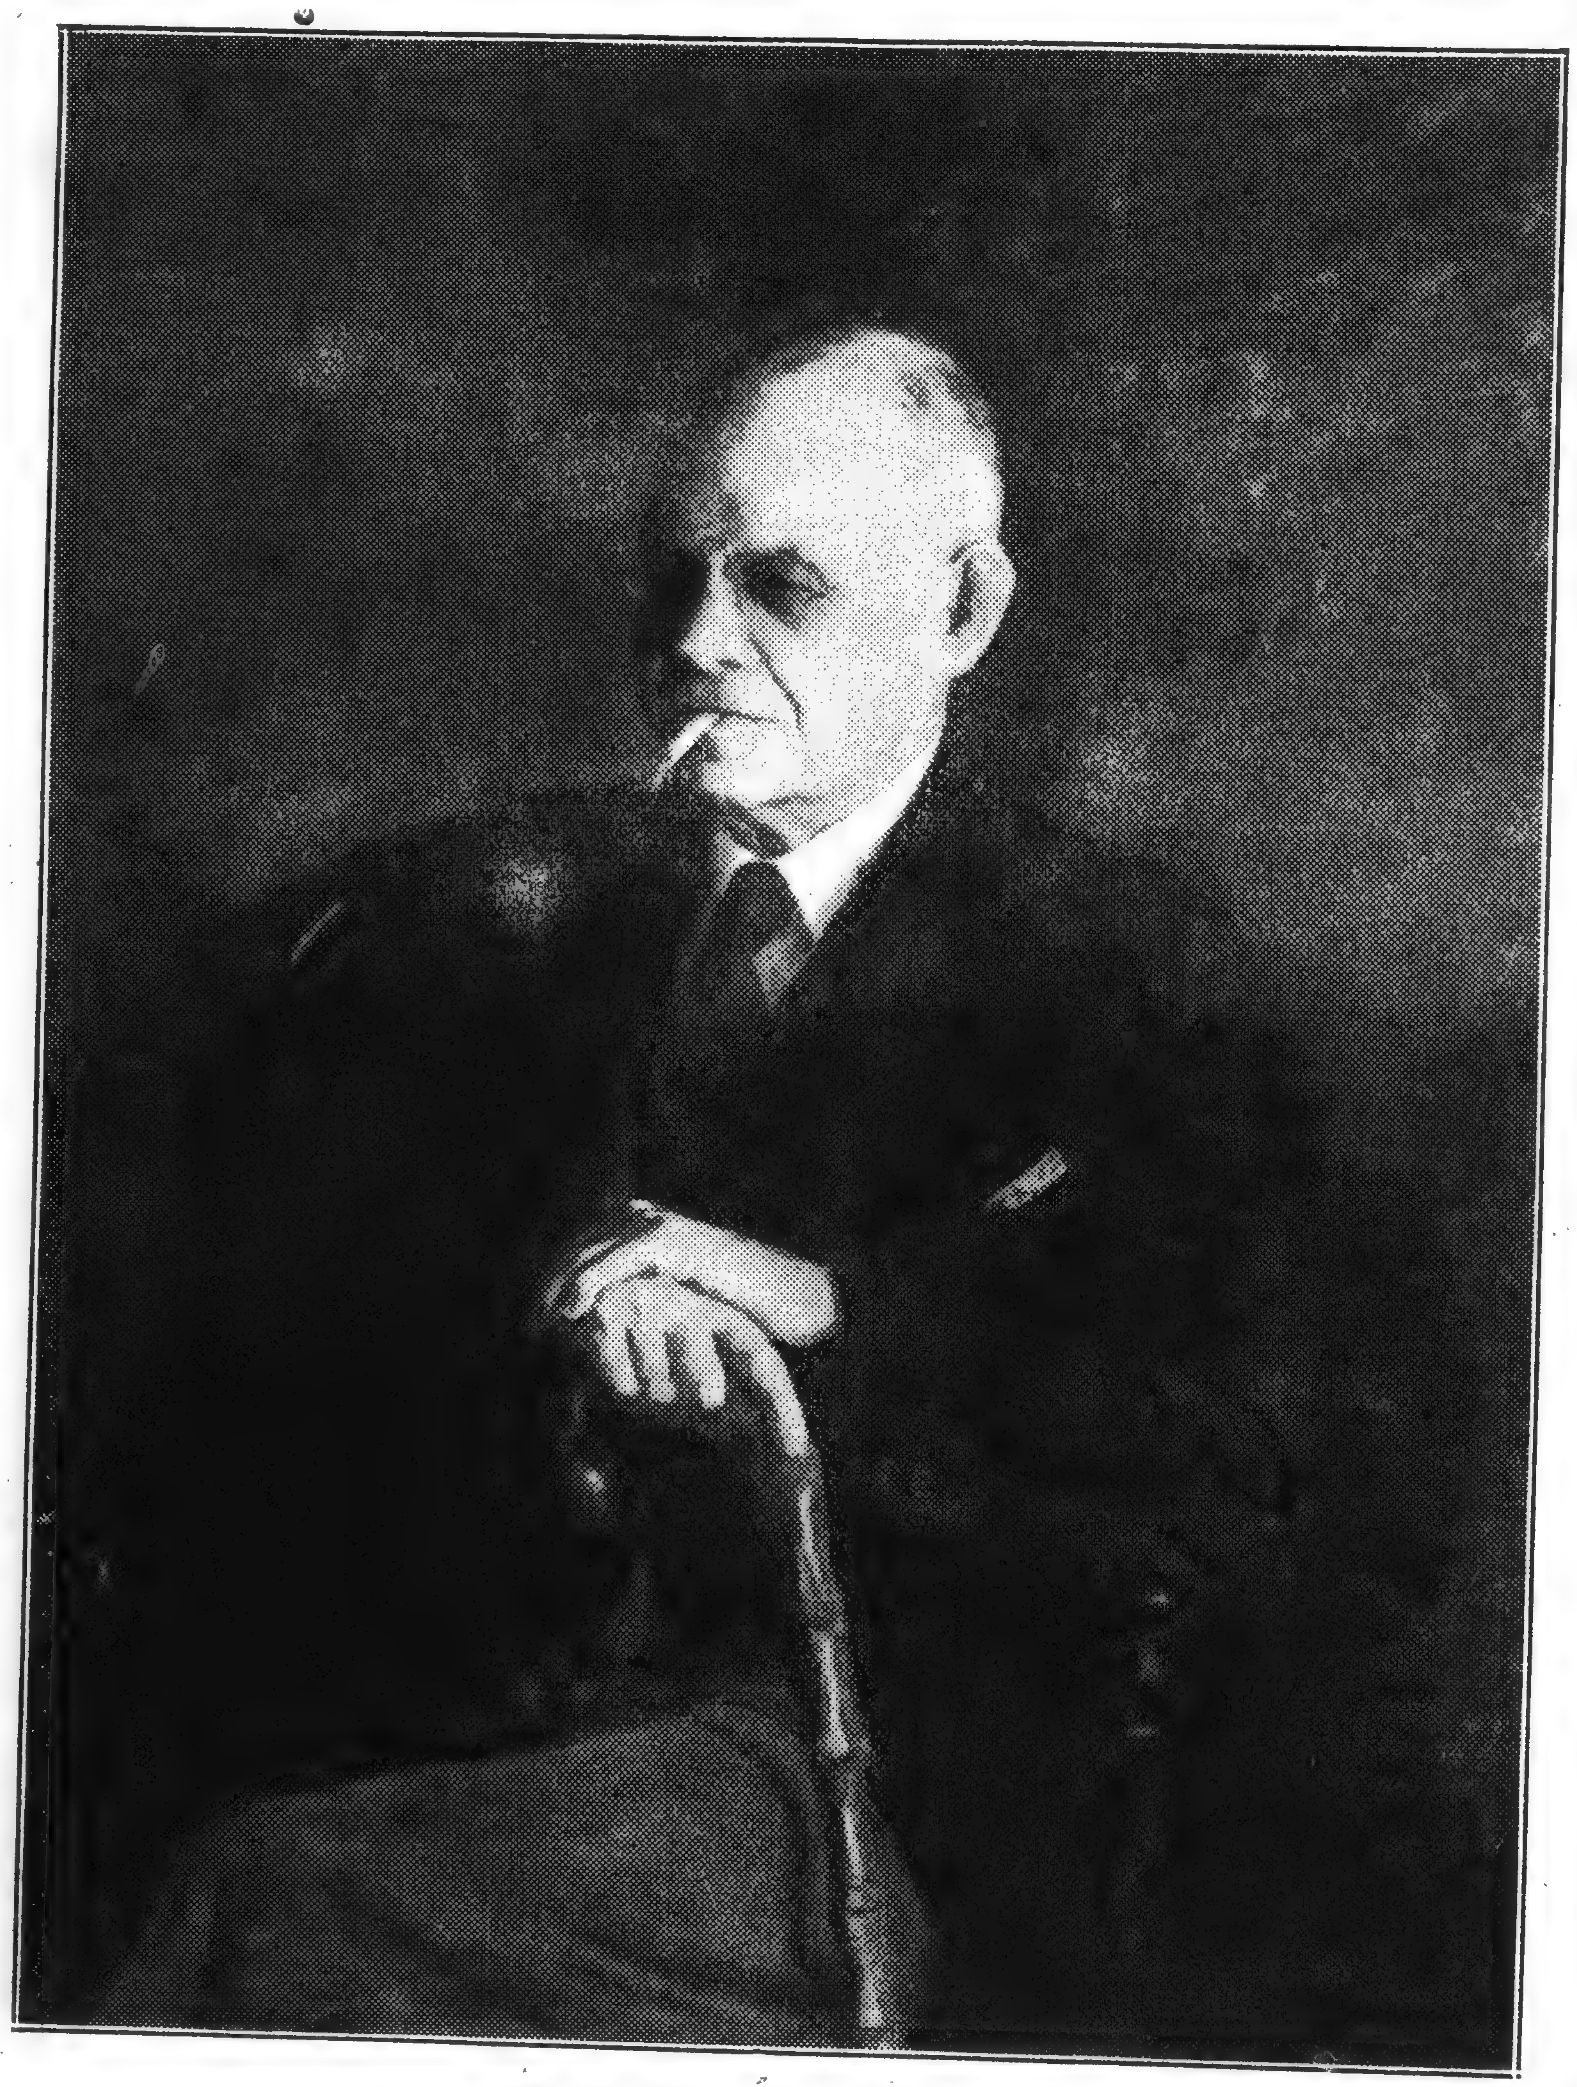
Brahms' C minor Symphony is his Op. 68. It was not until 1854 (he was born in 1833) that he heard Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; he was so impressed that he decided to write a work in the same form and the same tonality. The madness of Schumann and his attempt at suicide had deeply affected him and he was apparently in a receptive mood for the inspiration that resulted in his C minor symphony. Its contents are said to portray his relationship with Robert and Clara Schumann.

Attendance at the Boston Symphony's Lyric concerts this season, which marked its return to Baltimore for a series of engagements, has been steadily growing. The trustees have announced their great satisfaction with the immediate and enthusiastic response to the orchestra's proposal to renew its series of concerts at the Lyric next season. The dates selected are November 13, January 29 and April 2.

132

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1934

. . . The Curtain Falls: The Critic Leaves



"H. T. P.," by Gordon Hansen

A Portrait from Life of the Late Henry Taylor Parker, the Finishing Touches of Which Were Added by Mr. Hansen But a Few Weeks Ago

---

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
PR 1 - 1934

Appearance Tuesday To Be Last

Richard Burgin Will Be The Violin Soloist, Presenting Violin Concerto Of Sibelius

Brahms No. 1 In C Minor Is Symphony Group To Give Three Performances Next Year

BALTIMORE'S orchestral season comes to a close next Tuesday night when the Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and with Richard Burgin as the violin soloist will present the following program.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G. major for string orchestra	Bach
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D minor, Op. 47	Sibelius
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor	Brahms

The Brandenburg Concerto is the third of a set of six completed in March, 1721. They were written at the request of a Prussian prince, Christian Ludwig, Margraf of Brandenburg. It was first performed by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck in 1907 and has become a favorite of Dr. Koussevitzky's repertoire.

PREMIERE IN BERLIN

The Sibelius Violin Concerto was published in 1905 and was first played by Halir in Berlin, the fall of that year. It had its United States premiere at a Philharmonic Society concert in 1906, with the late Maud Powell as the soloist. Sibelius was born in Finland in 1865 and is still living in his native land. He is recognized as its greatest composer and his work is in growing demand. The violin concerto has been pronounced impossibly difficult, one reason, it is said, why it is so seldom heard. It has been called, also, a symphony with a violin solo on account of the important and eloquent beauty of the orchestral part. Mr. Burgin, who will play it Tuesday night, is a native of Warsaw, having been born in 1892. At the age of 8 he studied with Lotto, and later became a pupil of Joachim, in Berlin; between 1908 and 1912 he was an Auer pupil. He made his concert debut at 12, with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra and came to New York in 1907. In the fall of 1920 he was made concert master of the Boston Symphony and has held the position uninterruptedly.

FOLLOWED BEETHOVEN

Brahms' C minor Symphony is his Op. 68. It was not until 1854 (he was born in 1833) that he heard Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; he was so impressed that he decided to write a work in the same form and the same tonality. The madness of Schumann and his attempt at suicide had deeply affected him and he was apparently in a receptive mood for the inspiration that resulted in his C minor symphony. Its contents are said to portray his relationship with Robert and Clara Schumann.

Attendance at the Boston Symphony's Lyric concerts this season, which marked its return to Baltimore for a series of engagements, has been steadily growing. The trustees have announced their great satisfaction with the immediate and enthusiastic response to the orchestra's proposal to renew its series of concerts at the Lyric next season. The dates selected are November 13, January 29 and April 2.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 1 - 1934

Serge Koussevitky

Who conducts twice at Carnegie Hall

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

APR 1 - 1934

Koussevitzky Mu Plan Is Turned

By JOHN T. LAMBERT

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY would have certs. By Boston Symphony. At popular pric erate means. Who love good music. But th him. On the ground it would be "undignified."

* * *

in the ard a s s it was s the dr uddenly lown wit lled a gre
the morr
the Deac

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 1 - 1934

MYSTERY PROGRAMME FOR BENEFIT CONCERT

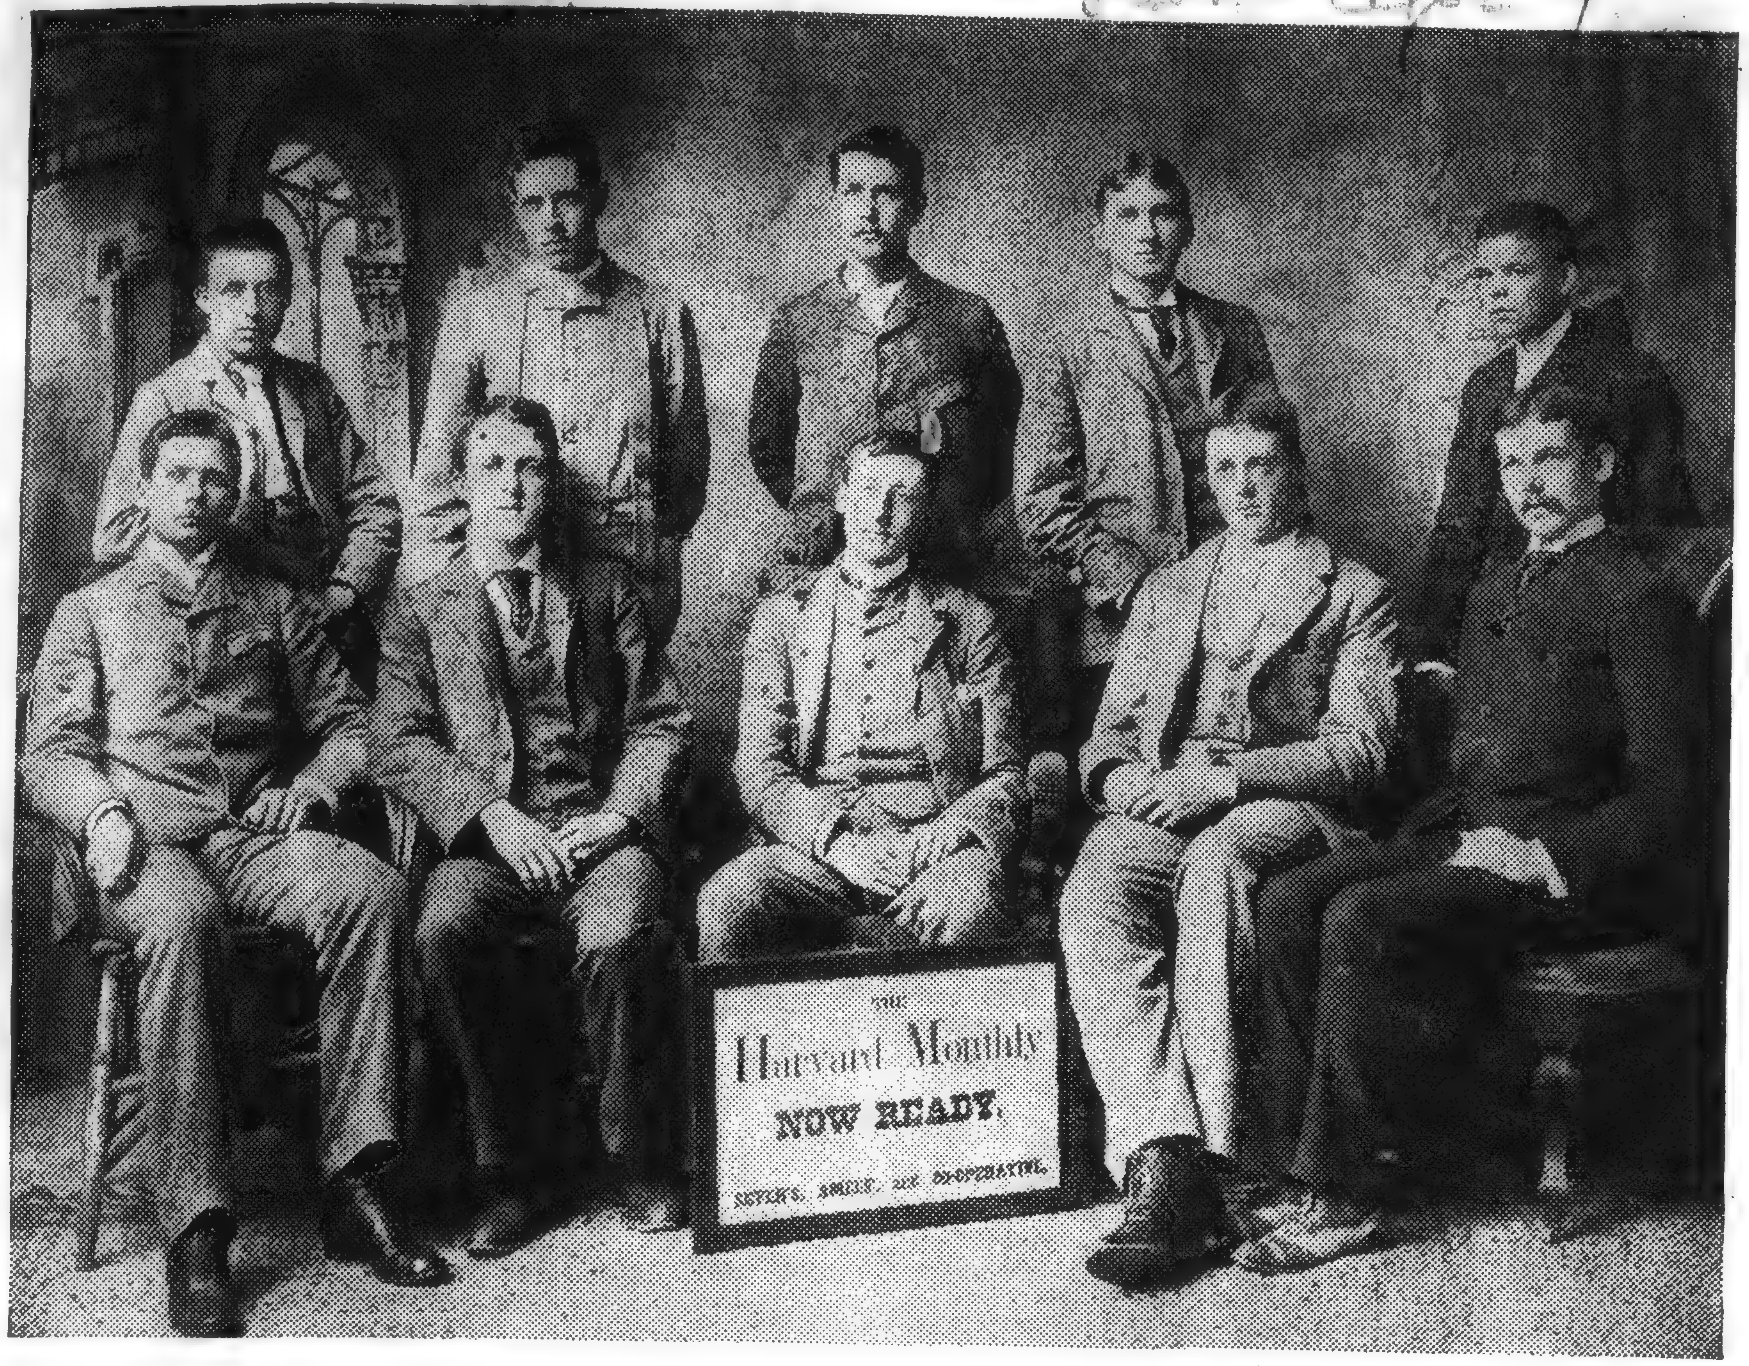
There are indications of a large audience at the coming concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give for the benefit of the Emergency Relief Fund in Symphony hall, on Wednesday evening, April 11th.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra are planning a programme of entirely unprecedented character. No detail will be disclosed until the concert is actually given.

The patronage of the concert is increasing through the efforts of Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley, Mr. Pierpont L. Stackpole, and a large committee of sponsors.

H. T. P. at Harvard—The Beginnings of a Distinguished Career

Tran. Apr 4



(Pach Bros.)

H. G. Bruce — Herbert Bates — R. E. Neil Dodge — Robert Herrick — H. T. Parker
C. H. Moore — W. A. Scahy — H. S. Sanford, Jr. — W. D. Bancroft — M. A. DeW. Howe

By M. A. DeWolfe Howe

A STATEMENT in the Transcript and other newspapers is to the effect that the late H. T. Parker was associated with George Santayana, George Pierce Baker and Robert Herrick in founding the Harvard Monthly. Of these four, Santayana was the only founder. Baker became an editor when the second volume began in March, 1886. Parker's name appeared first in the list of editors in March, 1888 (Vol. VI, No. 1), and Herrick's in June, 1888. In a group photograph of the two editorial boards of the year 1887-1888, saved from the days of my own editorship, a smallish youth stands at each end of the line in the rear. They were H. G. Bruce, at the left, and H. T. Parker at the right. Bruce, who afterward wrote lives of General Oglethorpe and General Houston in the "Makers of America" series, was the son of a missionary in India, and astonishingly learned—or so it seemed to all of us—in the literature of the East. The articles Parker had submitted to the board in the hope of winning his election to the "Monthly" were written in a vein of elaborate scholarship to which Bruce took vigorous exception. Should Parker be asked to join the board? Bruce was emphatic: "Not till he shuffles off his pedant's cloak!"

Yet Parker was elected and was represented, in the issue of March, 1888, by "A Study of Swinburne," having already contributed to Volume V articles on "The Heroic Couplet in English Verse" and "Mr. Howells and the Realistic Movement."

Bruce, who died long before Parker, would probably have gone on to the end objecting to his "pedant's cloak." I believe, however, that the survivors of Parker's earliest editorial colleagues must share my feeling that they did the "Monthly," and later journalism, a good service in disregarding the fears of Bruce.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 1 - 1934

Conductor ar

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

APR 2 - 1934

Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky (above) will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last concert of the season to be given at the Lyric April 3.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 1 - 1934

OUTSTANDING SYMPHONIES ON PROGRAM

Boston Orchestra to Play Tchaikowsky's Fifth and Schubert's Unfinished

WITH A PROGRAM that is one of the most interesting of the year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its third and last concert of the season on next Wednesday afternoon, April 4, at 4:40, in Constitution Hall, under management of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor, as the major composition. This emotional score of the conductor's fellow-countryman has long been considered one of the outstanding achievements of Koussevitzky's career as an interpreter. In addition to notable performances of the work by the Boston orchestra in various cities visited, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this symphony as guest conductor in London last summer and in Vienna the summer before. On each occasion a sensation was created.

In this symphony the principal theme recurs throughout the work, undergoing transformations according to the character of the four movements. The first theme of the Andante Cantabile of the slow movement, first stated by the horn, is one of Tchaikowsky's most famous melodies. The third movement is in waltz rhythm. In the finale, the theme before mentioned rises to its culmination in a great flood of sound.

Schubert's famous "Unfinished Symphony, in B minor, will also be given. The opening number will be Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto, in G minor, for strings.

NEW YORK TIMES

PR 3 - 1934

ORCHESTRA BUYS HOME.

Boston Symphony Takes Over Title to Symphony Hall Building.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 2.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., today took title to the Symphony Hall property at 249 Huntington Avenue, assessed for tax purposes on $800,000.

Ever since the site was acquired and the building erected in 1900, through the generosity of the late Major Henry L. Higginson and other leading citizens, the property has been held in the name of the New Boston Music Hall. There were issued to the generous subscribers some 4,000 shares of stock.

Practically all of the stock has been acquired by the orchestra and it was deemed best to buy the equity and actually take over the property.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 4 - 1934

Final Concert Today By Boston Symphony

Under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzki, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third and last Washington concert of the season today at 4:40 p. m. in Constitution Hall. The program will contain Chaikovski's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Schubert's B minor ("Unfinished") symphony, and Bach's third Brandenburg concerto in G major for string orchestra.

Through the local representative, Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, the Boston Symphony management announces that this famous orchestra will present three concerts here next season in Constitution Hall, with Dr. Koussevitzki conducting. The dates selected are November 14, January 30 and April 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

PR 34

Final Concert Of Boston Unit Set Wednesday

Symphony Orchestra Coming to Feature Schubert, Bach, Chaikovski.

Boston sends its Symphony Orchestra to the National Capital this week for the third and last concert of the 1933-34 season, which will be given in Constitution Hall on Wednesday, beginning at 4:40 o'clock. Conductor Sergei Koussevitzki has arranged for this occasion a program of Bach, Chaikovski and Schubert.

Of the six Chaikovski symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzki has chosen the fifth in E minor for this Washington concert. His reading of this work is considered by many critics one of his finest achievements in interpretation, and he received great acclaim for it in Vienna and London when he appeared in those cities as guest conductor in 1932 and 1933.

The symphony has a motto, first intoned in a mournful minor key and later proclaimed triumphantly in the major tonality. The principal theme of the first movement is also in minor, with a contrasting melody that soars aspiringly up the scale. The slow movement (Andante Cantabile) has a long and sentimentally appealing melody as its main theme, followed by an optimistic strain that is occasionally interrupted by ominous mutterings of the motto.

The third movement is a lovely waltz—one of the rare uses of this dance form in a symphony—under which one again hears the low warnings of the minor motto. In the last movement the motto appears both as introduction and as coda, this time in a major key and a conquering spirit. After a final struggle between despair and hope, the symphony closes in sonorous exultation.

Schubert's beloved B minor ("Unfinished") symphony will also be played at this concert. The program will open with Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto, a work in two movements for string orchestra.

134

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 4 - 1934

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Offers Program Of Works Of Bach And Sibelius At Lyric

Making its last appearance here of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Lyric presented one of the most interesting and delightful concerts heard in Baltimore in a long time.

Of the three works presented, the Sibelius "Violin Concerto in D Minor" probably created the greatest interest, partly because of the extreme difficulty of the solo part, which was played by Richard Burgin, concert master of the organization, and partly because of the very clear way in which it shows the nationalism of the composer's music.

Mr. Burgin, who has played the concerto under the supervision of Sibelius himself, demonstrated not only a high degree of technical skill in the way he met the most exacting demands of the solo part but displayed also a marked feeling in his interpretation.

—o—

Perhaps No Piece of music ever written shows so clearly as does this concerto the diverse racial background of the Finns. From the cold and rugged first movement, which in its general effect is not unlike the same composer's "First Symphony," to the rhythmic allegro ma non tanto, the concluding movement, which suggests the Oriental origin of Sibelius' fellow-countrymen, the work is intensely nationalistic and just as intensely Sibelius.

The orchestra was kept well in the background by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, but gave the soloist well-balanced support throughout.

This piece was doubly interesting, following as it did the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3," which opened the program. The juxtaposition of the two concertos, one in which a group of instruments are set off against the orchestra and the other in which one musician is accompanied by the ensemble, showed most clearly the change which has taken place in this form of composition since the days of Bach.

—o—

The Bach Work was given a full, clear and charming interpretation and set a high standard for the rest of the program, a standard which was fully sustained.

The reading given the concluding selection, Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," was an answer to those who feel that the Brahms symphonies are given too frequently in Baltimore by visiting orchestras.

It would be a waste of words to attempt to describe the effects which Dr. Koussevitzky drew from his musicians. The ovation given the orchestra by the large audience at the end of the concert clearly demonstrated what the hearers thought of it.

J. P. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 4 - 1934

DR. CHAPMAN TO TALK ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Will Give Last in Series of Lectures Sunday Afternoon.

Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, will give the last in the series of lectures on the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock at the Providence Public Library. The orchestra's final concert of the season will be given April 10 at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Dr. Chapman will discuss the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, illustrating his lecture at the piano and on other instruments. He will speak on the lives and on the particular works of the composers, Handel, Debussy, Ravel and Tchaikovsky, represented on the program.

The lectures have become well established, this being the end of their fourth season. They are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and are free to the public.

Seats have necessarily been limited owing to the size of the hall. The library committee of the club is in charge of arrangements.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

APR 5 - 1934

Society

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained members of the Hasty Pudding Club at tea yesterday afternoon in the White House. She also acted as patroness for the presentation of the club's musical extravaganza "Hades! The Ladies!" at the Belasco Theater last evening.

Yesterday afternoon, Mrs. Roosevelt occupied a box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. Her guests were Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Joseph T. Robinsor and Miss Mary Patton.

At midnight, Mrs. Roosevelt left for Columbus, Ohio, where today she speaks at a conference on "Nation-Wide Crisis in Education." Her subject will be "What the Public Expects of Its Teachers."

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

R 5 1934

Boston Symphony in Last Washington Appearance

Concert Yesterday Was a Finale of Tonal Glory, Received Enthusiastically by a Large Audience at Constitution Hall.

BY ALICE EVERSMAN.

WITH an emotional and dynamic reading of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded their Washington visits for this year yesterday at Constitution Hall in a blaze of tonal glory. The audience, following the superb interpretation with rapt attention, was roused to the highest pitch of enthusiasm at the sweeping finale and rewarded Dr. Koussevitsky with the type of applause that bespoke its deep appreciation. No better ending could have been planned for this series, and the masterly interpretation left the auditors with a renewed sense of pleasure in the announcement of the resumption of these concerts next season.

Dr. Koussevitsky's reading of his compatriot's score was a triumph of conductoring art. Understanding thoroughly and in complete sympathy with the varied elements which form the foundation of Tschaikowsky's musical individuality, Dr. Koussevitsky balanced the component parts with the rare vision of an interpreter who has penetrated to the depths of the composer's thought. The poetic longings that are so powerful as to recur again and again in each movement of the symphony were lifted from any banality to a plane of rich beauty with an accentuation of the human note that could not leave an audience untouched. Under Dr. Koussevitsky's directing there was neither hysteria nor morbidness, but a healthy vitality that gave a glowing color to the temperamental rush or the passionate questionings which alternate with such force throughout the composition.

Although the technical effects were subordinate to the idea and sentiment inescapably predominent, there were moments when the expert manner of achieving the nuances arrested the attention. The carefully developed phrases, the slight broadening of tempo and the building up of tonal power stood out with rare charm as evidence of intellectual and artistic unity of the directing mind. Dr. Koussevitsky has the subtle ability to transmit his own comprehension to his men, and they responded yesterday with individual inspiration that awakened an answering enthusiasm in the listeners. The exquisite andante cantabile, the delicate dance measures of the third movement and the full throated expression of the finale could not have been achieved without the whole hearted co-operation of the entire orchestra. It was a glorious rendition and one deserving of the ovation accorded both conductor and players at the end.

The program opened with Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3," played with a marked rhythmic feeling that brought out its youthful and happy character. The second number, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony in B Minor," was given a highly artistic reading, but it failed to reach the convincing spontaneity of the Tschaikowsky. At bit heavy in their manner of visualizing the content of the symphony, the orchestra men, particularly in the violins, were not as successful in adjusting the tonal quality to the character of the composition. One missed something of the tender beauty of this Schubert work, but the presentation of the celebrated "Fifth Symphony" of Tschaikowsky was of such superlative excellence that any regret for the preceeding work was forgotten.

The Boston Symphony will come to this city again next season for a series of three concerts.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

APR 5 - 1934

Symphony Gives Final Concert Of Season

By RONALD THORNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, can uniformly be counted upon for distinguished performances, at yesterday's concert in Constitution Hall, its last of the season, almost surpassed itself in a brilliant program which comprised a Bach concerto, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Tschaikowsky's marvelous Fifth Symphony, by some critics regarded as his greatest work.

The concert was given under the local management of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, who announces that the Boston Symphony will make three appearances in Washington next season, on Wednesday afternoons.

The Bach work played was Concerto No. 3 of the Brandenburg group, a composition in G major for string orchestra. It has two movements only, allegro moderato and allegro. It reveals the hand of Bach throughout. Reasonably familiar to concert-goers, it is an admirable and interesting composition of its type.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony is one of the best known works in orchestral literature, for it possesses an extraordinary appeal to the emotions. It has achieved marked popularity in recent years, both in concert programs and on the radio. Dr. Koussevitzky gave it a remarkably fine interpretation yesterday which was thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

The final work, the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, is one of the titans of modern symphonic achievement, and although the composer himself was at first disappointed with it, in recent years it has come to rank with, or perhaps even ahead, of the "Pathetique." Its tremendous finale is the chief glory of this masterpiece, though the second movement, the andante cantabile, is extraordinarily popular and has enjoyed a radio vogue of almost unexampled proportions.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

APR 4 - 1934

Boston Symphony To Play Here Next Year

An accentuated pleasure was added to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening by the definite announcement heading the program that the great ensemble would return to Baltimore next season.

Relieved from that uncertainty, it was an easy matter to set aside "the cares that infest the day," and abandon the spirit to the refreshment of noble art.

BURGIN SOLOIST

The soloist was Richard Burgin, concert master and first violin of the orchestra. Doubtless, in complete sympathy with the Sibeliusian leanings of his director and friend, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Mr. Burgin chose to play the Finnish composer's violin concerto in D minor.

This is a work whose tone color and psychology are completely expressive of that master, using a palette ranging from the black-green of firs, to the silver-green of ice. It is nature, seldom man, who rages in these stormy blasts, or laughs in these sparkling waters, and there are numerous passages of arresting beauty, notably in the first and second movements, yet the pattern is seemingly incomplete, and the last movement comes to an abrupt ineffectual end.

Not a thing to be completely assimilated or classified at one hearing, however, and set down in terms of incredible difficulty for the solo instrument.

Mr. Burgin proved to be technically equal to the unrelenting demands of the opus, though his tone is not of great volume, and he was enthusiastically recalled numerous times.

Strongly contrasted was the solid substance of the opening Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, of Bach, as gorgeous in design, in substance and in wearing quality as the silk and gold brocades of its time.

BRAHM'S SYMPHONY

Dr. Koussevitsky hereby displayed the virtuosity of his men in the magnificently sustained tempo, and the fine assurance of the polyphony.

The second half of the program was occupied by the glories of the first symphony of Brahms, a circumstance that demands no further comment on the masterpiece itself, and but a phrase on the consummate beauty of its presentation by the ensemble.

The orchestra will return for its first autumn concert on November 13, and reservations are now being made. H. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

APR 4 - 1934

The Passing of "H. T. P."

With the retirement of Philip Hale musical criticism in Boston lost something of its pungency and flavor. Now comes another loss in the death of "H. T. P." for many years musical and dramatic critic of the Boston Transcript. He took his duties seriously. And no writer on the drama and music in Boston has been more industrious. Doubtless condensation of his reviews would have been easier for him, but he liked to do more than to sketch an outline of his reactions to the music he heard. He had little patience with mediocrity, but often encouraged those in who he saw promise. And while he could be caustic in his criticism, he was always to be relied upon for support to any development that made for musical progress in Boston. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the opera found in him a most helpful ally, as Dr. Koussevitzky has testified. He did much to bring into wider prominence Dr. Davison's interesting experiment with the Harvard Glee Club or the similar development of the Radcliffe chorus. And his writing was by no means confined to the drama and music, but to the Transcript he frequently contributed essays on various themes that had marked literary flavor and often a somewhat tart wit. In all his writing he had a style as distinctively his own as is that of Joeseph Hergesheimer in the field of fiction. Henry Taylor Parker is going to be missed from his accustomed haunts in the Boston he loved.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 4 - 1934

DR. CHAPMAN TO TALK ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Will Give Last in Series of Lectures Sunday Afternoon.

Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, will give the last in the series of lectures on the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock at the Providence Public Library. The orchestra's final concert of the season will be given April 10 at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Dr. Chapman will discuss the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, illustrating his lecture at the piano and on other instruments. He will speak on the lives and on the particular works of the composers, Handel, Debussy, Ravel and Tchaikovsky, represented on the program.

The lectures have become well established, this being the end of their fourth season. They are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and are free to the public.

Seats have necessarily been limited owing to the size of the hall. The library committee of the club is in charge of arrangements.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 5 - 1934

Boston Symphony Superb In Season's Final Concert

By DR. KURT HETZEL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its last concert this season yesterday afternoon at Constitution Hall.

It was a beautiful concert. Serge Koussevitzky led his men again with the dynamic power that distinguishes him from others in his class. The orchestra gave its very best and the program was well balanced.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major was given with careful attention to the smallest detail in design, remarkable unity of the various sections of the string orchestra and the essential grandeur of outline.

The "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, is often considered an easy task for any orchestra. One needs to hear it played with perfection, such as at this occasion, to come to the realization that it contains much more than suspected. This opus holds more inspiring pages than many a finished symphony. The performance of the Boston Orchestra, as well as Koussevitzky's interpretation, will linger on for a long time in our memories.

The tremendous Fifth Symphony, by Tschaikowsky, filled the second part of the program. Its rendition was the best that Koussevitzky and his orchestra have offered during the last season. An occasional over-emphasis of thematic detail did not impair the general impression nor did the surprisingly slow tempo of the Andante Cantabile. All that the composer compiled in this work under the dictation of his genius was brought to life in its full glory. Notably the last movement rose in all its majesty and came to a gigantic climax.

Conductor and orchestra were enthusiastically applauded, once even in the wrong place in the middle of the last movement. Washington should know this symphony better by this time.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

APR 5 - 1934

Boston Orchestra Plays Again, and Beautifully

THERE was another of those delightful and quite perfect concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, the last this season. And somehow, it was just the program for the day. One seldom hears a more beautiful and less pretentious playing of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" than yesterday's; it was all spring, all delicate beauty, all promise of fuller things. In a performance perfect for playing detail and atmosphere, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky did not attempt to add anything to the already sufficient music, nor to enlarge upon the simple, yet far from naive beauties of the work.

This piece was the delicate rose between two thorns of heavier, tho certainly as fine music—Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, for strings, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. This particular Bach work probably imparted very little to non-students of Bach; its straightforward presentation may have made it monotonous. Here again Koussevitzky did not dress up the music, and for those who revel in the strength and clarity of the master's work, it was a delight.

The trimmings of the concert were left to the Tschaikowsky, where decoration belongs. One of the fine Tschaikowsky interpreters, Koussevitzky, left little to be desired in his reading of this work, and the superb orchestra left nothing, except a horn note here and there, to be desired in the playing. It was not played with too much heaviness nor undue sonority; but it did not lack grandeur, nor somberness, nor delicacy, nor gaiety.

It is entertaining to watch Koussevitzky in front of his orchestra. Much of the time he does not conduct it, having done that, obviously, in rehearsals; his motions are rather symbols of what he wants the music to express. And as the orchestra played it yesterday, it expressed satisfying things. Going up the street afterward someone called the second movement of the Tschaikowsky "cute." Well, hardly that. But it was fine to hear it so well played.

They tell us the Boston Orchestra will be back next year. Something to look forward to. R. H.

A possibility that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky may play his bass viol and that the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may forsake their traditional black and white attire for colorful costumes heightens speculative interest about the Mystery Concert which will be given Wednesday evening for the benefit of the emergency campaign

---

NEW YORK SUN

Trav. apr 5

APR 5 - 1934

Lange Offers Sibelius Work

Also Includes Berezowsky Sinfonietta and Debussy Rhapsody in Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has preempted Carnegie Hall for this evening and therefore the Philharmonic-Symphony Society concert customarily given on Thursday took place last night.

Mr. Toscanini retired again for a brief period and the baton passed into the hand of Hans Lange. This gentleman has a way of offering programs of interest and variety and that of last evening was according to his habit. He even found a symphony of importance which had not previously delivered its message to Philharmonic audiences. This was the third of Sibelius. Indeed the work had not been heard here at all since the Boston Symphony performed it on March 10, 1929. It is one of the most uncompromising of the scores of Sibelius in its sustained somberness of mood. It has no outburst of good cheer or even of spiritual contentment. It is strong and brooding and calls for almost tragic sympathy on the part of the listener. It is the Sibelius of whom so much has been written, and so little understood until lately.

Perhaps the Sinfonietta, opus 17, of Nicolai Berezowsky, a novelty, and the rhapsody of Debussy for clarinet and orchestra invite more immediate consideration. Debussy wrote his clarinet rhapsody, and also a "Petite Piece" for clarinet and piano, in 1910. The former was first performed here by Henri Le Roy with the Philharmonic on December 12 and 13, 1912. The title printed on the score is "First Rhapsody for Orchestra with Solo Clarinet in B Flat."

Much music has been heard since the composition confused some of us twenty-two years ago. It is all so simple now and we find that while it echoes faintly but audibly the "Afternoon of a Faun," it is a characteristic woodland sketch with the peace and mystery of the forest transformed into life and sunshine by the awakening of all the secret living things which hide in the thickets. It is music with mood and picture and it keeps the clarinet in its place as a principal instrument, not parading it as a prima donna. The solo player was Simeon Bellison, first clarinetist of the orchestra and an artist of high skill, excellent taste and sound musicianship. He played admirably.

Mr. Berezowsky is already known to local music lovers by his two symphonies, Hebrew suite, sextets, violin concerto and other works. The Sinfonietta was composed in 1931 and won a prize offered by the National Broadcasting Company. It had been disseminated by radio, but last evening's was its first concert stage performance. Like Mr. Berezowsky's other works it demonstrated the presence of a real musical talent, possibly not of the first order and also perhaps not yet fully matured. The Sinfonietta contains good thematic material, laudable workmanship in the construction, and skill in the orchestration. The composer handles the latest devices in harmony with ability and without making them appear to be ends rather than means.

His Sinfonietta was naturally not planned with too serious intent, but was apparently designed as a demonstration of the adaptability of modern music to the receptive powers of the great miscellaneous radio audience. There is spirit and ingenuity in the first movement, melodic purpose and achievement in the second and a vivacious treatment of thematic subjects in the final presto. The principal motive in this movement sounds like a glorification of the German "A B C Bundeslied" and is worked up to a sonorous climax. The orchestra played the piece exteremely well and the audience received it with polite applause.

Mr. Lange began his concert with Weber's "Preciosa" overture, which has rested in peace for a prolonged period and which will probably return to the repose and seclusion which its merits have earned.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 5 - 1934

Music's Kinship With Literature

From article by Andre Maurois, reprinted from the Chesterian in the program of the Boston Symphony Concert.

I was 16 when I went to a concert for the first time. This might seem strange, but I lived in a provincial town and orchestras hardly ever traveled in those days. It was during a holiday in Paris that a friend took me to the Concerts Lamoureux, and I fell at once under the spell.

I remember that, among other things, the Fifth Symphony, the Pastorale and the overture to "Tannhäuser" figured on the program. I had already determined to be a writer, and Beethoven and Wagner made me realize what a work of art should be. Themes took shape, merged with each other, struggled against each other, and then became reconciled. At times, when a single instrument rang out, everything seemed delightfully clear, in the same way that the voice of a sage or of a loved friend gives meaning to life and to the world.

I left the concert hall in a state of rapture. Whether my appreciation of the music was technically correct I do not know, but I do know that my first contact with it brought more to me perhaps than my acquaintance with Tolstoy, Stendhal and Balzac. It has never ceased to cause me greater and deeper emotion, and even now I find it difficult to think of literary works otherwise than in terms of music.

—o—

Here I should like to explain more clearly what I understand by a parallelism of music and literature.

It seems to me that the main object of any art (and I follow here in the doctrines of my teacher, Alain) is to bring a human and intelligible order into the chaos of reality. That is why rhythm—the recurrence, at given intervals, of images or beats—plays such an important part in the fine arts. A steady rhythm calms the mind, just as a rhythmic caress puts a child to sleep or soothes pain.

The opposition of two great themes in a symphony, their fading away, their reappearance, their final blending, offer the listener an understandable conflict comparable to the scene in "Madame Bovary" when the passionate love-making of Rudolph alternates with the inane speeches of the rustic deputation, or again to the sway of the two great themes of "Eugénie Grandet"—love and money.

—o—

Yet, though the object of all the arts, and particularly of music, is the creation of an intelligible universe, the world created must never be obvious in its simplicity. When the universe to which the artist has given life is too stiff and unyielding, too intellectual, it cannot take the place of reality.

In a great poem there is madness as well as rhythm. We must be able to foresee the sequence of a work of art, and yet it must have the element of surprise; our expectation must be at once frustrated and satiated, the solution brought by the artist to the conflict of the themes must be unexpected, yet logical—logical, above all, in its irrelevancy. A chaos dominated by a thought; of such is made a great symphony or a great novel.

Thence, I believe, comes the craving of our intellectual, rhythm-wise epoch for more inaccessible harmonies, more hidden compositions. To such a need a Marcel Proust in the realm of literature, or a Stravinsky in that of music, ministers with marvelous and unerring skill.

NEW YORK TIMES

AUDIENCE HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Demonstration Greets Boston Conductor at Opening of Carnegie Hall Concert.

COMPOSERS SIGN TRIBUTE

Testimonial Lauds Service to American Music—Loeffler's 'Evocation' Performed.

Public appreciation of courage shown in a trying situation was demonstrated when Serge Koussevitzky came on the stage yesterday afternoon to conduct the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The salutation of the audience in the form of long-continued applause was in part acknowledgment of the brilliant performances that the conductor and the orchestra have given in their New York series this season, but the memory was fresh and vivid of the manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men continued their performance last Thursday night when smoke suddenly appeared over the stage and only the presence of mind of the performers averted a panic. Dr. Koussevitzky had finally to signal the orchestra to rise before the concert could proceed.

The concert offered a novelty in what was listed as the first New York performance of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra, with chorus of women's voices and a speaking voice. The speaker was David Blair McClosky and the chorus was that of the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Evocation" was composed for the opening of Severance Hall, the permanent home of the Clevelnad Orchestra, Feb. 5, 1931. The preface of the composer, printed in the score, is the most concise index to its intentions.

Builds Temple of Muses.

"The imagined form of this music," this preface states, "is to tell the building of a beautiful temple of the muses; of the god Pan's rhapsodic lay and the nymphs' love for him; of their vain endeavors to fetter him to their beloved sunny fields whence Echo is listening, listening for the pure fun of answering; of Syrinx, Pan's most beloved naiad, whom Artemis metamorphosed into a reed to save her from Pan's amorous pursuit; of the strange account given by the Singing Stone of itself; awed by solemn wonder at it, we now seek the little stream running down the hills to meet us, the reeds bowing to us in the breeze. The nymphs are still calling, 'Pan, abide here on these sunny greens.' "

Mr. Loeffler wrote Nikolai Sokoloff, then conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, of his score; of the fugue, out of which grows the one most important theme of the work; of the beginning, intended to suggest "the matter which in confusion marked the beginning of the fine temple of music which the architects had in mind"; of the clarification of the fugue theme and the motive of the Singing Stone which is later referred to in spoken though hushed words from an old Greek epigram; of the song theme of the enticing nymphs, and the transition to the introduction of the lines uttered "in a hushed and mysterious voice"—"Remember me the Singing Stone."

At the end there are reminiscences by chorus and by orchestra, as from far off, of previous themes, with the last words of the epigram.

The audience responded with exceptional warmth to Mr. Loeffler's music, music of extraordinary texture and of fastidious workmanship; music of poetic evocation and an echo, in modern terms, of the classic spirit of the poem that Mr. McClosky recited.

The other compositions of the afternoon were the Handel concerto grosso in B minor and, at the end, the Brahms C minor symphony. Handel's noble and vigorous music was played superbly by the strings. The epic world of Brahms's imagining lost none of its grandeur at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. This familiar and stirring work of monumental proportions came as the worthy capstone of the achievements of orchestra and conductor in New York in the season now coming to an end. Again there was fervent and long-continued applause from the audience.

Testimonial Is Presented.

In the green room back of the stage, after the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky received another testimonial from those who hold him in high honor. He was presented a paper signed with the names of over twenty-five American composers, and signatures of others interested in American creative art. The list was considered to constitute the most striking evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's tireless curiosity and interest in American music, because the composers who signed it were young men and old, conservatives and radicals, all of whom united in thanking the conductor for his labors in the cause of native music. The paper read as follows:

"It is the desire of the undersigned to convey to Dr. Koussevitzky on the completion of his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their appreciation of his interest in and his services to the cause of American music. During his years in Boston he has amply demonstrated his conviction that the musical life and culture of a people cannot answer that people's deepest needs until it has become in the truest sense productive as well as receptive in character. We feel it, therefore, to be fitting at this time to express our admiration for Dr. Koussevitzky's distinguished accomplishment in the interests of American musical development, through the energy, courage, and understanding which he has devoted to the performance of American compositions."

The testimonial was signed by the following:

Joseph Achron, Marion Bauer, Nicolai Berezowsky, Ernest Bloch, John Alden Carpenter, Israel Citkowitz, Frederick S. Converse, Aaron Copland, Carl Engel, Arthur Foote, George Gershwin, Rubin Goldmark, Louis Gruenberg, Henry Hadley, Richard Hammond, Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, Edward B. Hill, Werner Josten, Daniel Gregory Mason, Harold Morris, Walter Piston, Carlos Salzedo, Roger Sessions, Alexander Steinert, Randall Thompson, Emerson Whithorne, John Erskine, Alvin Johnson, Alfred A. Knopf, Dorothy Lawton, Minna Lederman, M. D. Herter Norton, W. W. Norton, Claire R. Reis, Paul Rosenfeld, Theodore Steinway and Alma M. Wertheim.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 5 193

Conductor Averts Panic at Concer

Auditorium of Carnegie Hal Filled With Smoke.

NEW YORK, April 6—(INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke came from an incinerator chute on the south side of the building which had become choked with smoldering refuse.

The smoke drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women shrieked and numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the center of the stage and shouted roughly, "Sit down, everything is all right."

A moment later he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing.

The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

136

N.Y. EVENING POST

APR 6 - 1934

Orchestra Plays On, Halts Carnegie Hall Fire Panic

Koussevitzky of Boston Symphony Calms Women as Smoke Fills Auditorium

The old "show must go on" tradition, in its symphonic aspect, found a new exponent last night in Sergge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky averted a panic at Carnegie Hall when swirling clouds of heavy gray smoke sent several hundred of the 2,000 in the audience scurrying for exits directly after opening of the second part of the program.

The smoke was from a burning incinerator chute on the fifty-sixth Street side of the building.

Calms Shrieking Crowd

The stage of the auditorium is on that side.

The conductor, appearing in the Thursday night series for the last time this season, had begun a few moments before to direct the orchestra in Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. The first movement had begun to communicate its peaceful message.

There was a stir behind the conductor.

A woman shrieked. A door banged.

He continued to conduct.

More shrieks. Seats slammed up. The conductor had to take notice. He wheeled around and saw the incipient panic. His right hand shot toward the audience.

"Evvvverytheeng ees all right! Seet down!" he commanded.

It was obvious he did not know anything about it, as far as some in the audience were concerned. They continued to rush for the exits. More hardy souls, however, set up a "shushing." The rout turned into a trickle and then stopped.

Few Leave, Show Goes On

Koussevitsky turned again to the orchestra, and paid not the slightest attention to the smoke which continued to pour down, apparently from the top of the stage, until just before the end of the fourth and last movement.

Only one of the bass players seemed unduly perturbed, such was Koussevitsky's power over orchestra as well as audience.

At the pauses between movements, several persons made hasitly for the exits. But the panic had been averted.

At the end of the concert there was an ovation for the conductor.

Firemen were still at work on the chute when the concert ended, forty minutes after the original alarm.

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 6 - 1934

Koussevitzky Averts Carnegie Fire Scare; Conducts Symphony on Smoke-Filled Stage

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky while smoke hovered over the musicians, stilled the fears of an audience of more than 3,000 in Carnegie Hall last night, when a fire started in a rubbish chute on the Fifty-sixth Street side of the building.

Neither the audience nor the orchestra knew whether the fire was a minor one. All that could be seen was menacing wisps of white smoke curling across the stage. Dr. Koussevitzky led his men through the four unbroken movements of the great symphony, and at its close the members of the audience cheered themselves hoarse for the coolness of the conductor and the orchestra and their interpretation of the music.

This orderly scene could easily have been replaced by a wild stampede, according to those in the auditorium.

The orchestra had just begun the first movement of the symphony when a puff of smoke from a smoldering fire in the clogged rubbish chute on the Fifty-sixth Street side was seen hovering over the stage.

A man in one of the front seats hastily arose and made for a door. Several others in the audience started to follow his example. In a moment all was hubbub, the restlessness spreading throughout the large audience.

The conductor stopped his orchestra and the girl ushers shouted to the audience to keep still. Dr. Koussevitzky finally obtained near-silence and said to his listeners: "Just keep quiet; everything is all right." Then rapping his baton against the stand, he began the symphony again and played it through without a stop. Just as his men were finishing the second movement, about twenty-five minutes later, the smoke gradually disappeared.

Meanwhile, fire crews pushed the rubbish in the chute down into the subcellar of the building, where other firemen wetted it down with hose lines before bundling it into the incinerator there. The damage was slight.

The applause that greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and his men at the close of the symphony swelled to an ovation. Some one later remarked to the conductor that throughout the fire danger he had not increased his tempo.

"No, indeed," laughed the conductor. "Tempo is tempo and tranquillity is tranquillity."

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 6 - 1934

Koussevitzky Averts Panic at Carnegie Hall

Conductor Calms 2,000 When Smoke Disturbs Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nipped an incipient panic last night when smoke filled the auditorium in Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had assembled for the final evening concert of the orchestra.

The smoke was from an incinerator chute, on the Fifty-sixth Street side of the building, which had become choked with smoldering refuse. It became noticeable just at the end of the intermission and drifted across the hall in eddies and waves which caused a good many of those in the audience to stare aloft nervously. A woman or two gave half-stifled shrieks as they caught sight of the growing clouds and several persons began to leave their seats. Mr. Koussevitzky turned around, facing the audience with the air of a man vexed at an interruption.

"Sit down!" he commanded sharply. "Everything is all right."

He swung about briskly and signaled the musicians to start. With the first bars of music, those who had been on the verge of making for the aisles sank back in their seats. The program went forward smoothly.

At the close of the concert the audience remained for several seconds applauding the cool and decisive conductor who had saved them from panic. When they left the hall at 10:40 o'clock firemen were still at work at the incinerator chute.

N.Y. TELEGRAM

APR 6 - 1934

Bostonians Allay Fear at Concert

Smoke Cloud Startles Big Carnegie Hall Audience.

By PITTS SANBORN.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY in his quality of conductor to the modernists has often fired an audience with his communicative enthusiasm, but last evening he had to inspire with confidence a crowd that feared Carnegie Hall was in for a conflagration and persuade them to listen to Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony instead of rushing out to the safety of the streets.

Fortunately the smoke that began to pour over the stage during the intermission had nothing more serious for origin than a misbehaving incinerator. But, whatever the cause, the orchestra behaved with admirable presence of mind, and Mr. Koussevitzky's ringing appeal to keep quiet and sit down produced the desired result on all who had not got beyond reach of his voice.

Uses Hindemith Dedication.

As it was, the fifth symphony of the Russian master started off twice, the second time to reach a successful conclusion as the smoke screen gradually abated.

With Tschaikowsky to provide the latter half of the program, Mr. Koussevitzky gave over the earlier half to Hindemith, Debussy and Richard Strauss. The Hindemith was the "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass which the composer wrote for the semi-centenary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was introduced to New York by the Boston orchestra a little more than two years ago. Now as then, its downrightness and acerbity produced a certain impression, though not a very pleasurable impression, to judge from the scant applause at the conclusion of the excellent performance.

Contracts Are Emphatic.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel," however, delighted their hearers, as they had habitually done in the past. Both were played with noteworthy technical skill, though Mr. Koussevitzky's dynamic contrasts in the Strauss piece were more emphatic than is usual.

This was the last Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season except tomorrow afternoon's.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

APR 6 - 1934

Koussevitzky Again Plays Hindemith

By HENRIETTE WEBER.

This week is bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York for the last time this season. They played at Carnegie Hall last night before the usual distinguished audience, and will play another program for their last matinee tomorrow afternoon. Meanwhile they will be heard at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, tonight.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presented a fine example of program making at last night's concert, which naturally won the warm approbation of the audience. First came Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music," written for string and brass instruments, which the Bostonese consider quite their special property since this modern German composer wrote it for this orchestra on its 50th anniversary, and which they played here on March 5, 1932.

Hindemith is one of the moderns you must know about, if you consider yourself up with the times in music. In this work he reveals some of his more pleasant musical thoughts, and he is more restrained in the seeking after effects than is the case with much that he has composed.

Sheer delight was the delicacy and poesy of Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy. Then came a stunning performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss, in which every detail of the complicated score was brought out with the rare insight into the composer's intentions which Dr. Koussevitzky, almost beyond all other conductors, has.

The ever popular Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky brought the concert to a close. The Saturday matinee will bring forward one of the Handel "Concerto Grosso," Loeffler's "Evocation" (first time in New York), and the Brahms C Minor Symphony.

* * *

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 6 - 1934

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Debussy, and a Fire at Carnegie Hall

The mild excitement attending the discovery that Carnegie Hall might presently be burning down over their heads doubtless effaced from the memory of last evening's Boston Symphony audience the really superlative performance of Debussy's "L'apres midi d'un faune" which, along with performances of music by Hindemith and Strauss, preceded the intermission at this last of Mr. Koussewitsky's Thursday nights in New York. The smoke which billowed into the auditorium from somewhere offstage sent a few of the cautious in search of the nearest exit.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At Carnegie Hall last night.

THE PROGRAM

Hindemith .... Konzertmusik
Debussy.."L'apres-midi d'un faune"
Strauss ...."Till Eulenspiegel"
Tschaikowsky ......Fifth Symphony

It emanated, one learned later, harmlessly from a receptacle for rubbish back stage, which had been ignited, probably, by a cigarette carelessly tossed away. Mr. Koussewitsky and his hundred-odd men preserved their poise (they had just reassembled on the stage) and the audience was assured that everything was all right. This was confirmed presently by the music; the smoke continued for a time to seep into the house, but little trace of it was left at the conclusion of the first movement of Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony.

The first half of the program included the Konzertmusik composed by Hindemith for the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's jubilee year, back in 1931-32, the debussy ecologue, and Strauss's "Till." The Hindemith Mr. Kousewitsky introduced here a season or two ago, at one of his Saturday matinees; its revival last evening served no purpose but that of confirming those with any opinion at all on the subject that Hindemith possesses every essential of a composer but the gift of significant utterance. The Konzertmusik is a piece d'occasion and its mediocrity might, under other circumstances, be attributed to the fact. But the bulk of Hindemith's music yields, we know, too few pages of real distinction, and the Konzertmusik is thus typical rather than exceptional. The conclusion of the first movement (there are two) expounds a variant of the chief theme in a long, sustained unison melody, scored for strings and wind and accompanied by irrelevant harmonies in the brass. The device was not new when Meyerbeer employed it in the prelude to the last act of "L'Africana"; all Hindemith has added is the polytonal punctuation that only spoils the effect of the unctuous singing of strings, woodwind and horn. The finale, a fugue, includes an interlude or trio that is perhaps the best thing in the entire piece.

Mr. Koussewitsky progressed from Hindemith to Debussy. His "L'apres midi" is slower paced than most, more subdued, drowsier, dreamier. Thus it seems more closely to approximate the ideal performance of this incomparable little masterpiece. On the technical side, one could admire last night the virtuosity and musicianship of the Boston orchestra's woodwinds, the exquisite balance of strings and winds, the soft, sunlit clarity of the instrumental texture. Afterward, Mr. Koussewitsky and his men made noise that was good to hear in "Till." Humor and sentiment and vigorous life were in this performance.

Brooklyn Times Union

APR 6 - 1934

CONDUCTOR AVERTS CARNEGIE PANIC

Koussevitzky Calms Audience With Music During Fire.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nipped an incipient panic last night when smoke filled the auditorium in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, where more than 2,000 persons had assembled for the final evening concert of the orchestra.

The smoke was from an incinerator chute on the 56th st. side of the building, which had become choked with smoldering refuse. Mr. Koussevitzky swung about briskly and signaled the musicians to start. With the first bars of music those who had been on the verge of making for the aisles sank back in their seats.

When the audience left the hall at 10:40 o'clock firemen were still at work at the incinerator chute.

BOSTON PLAYERS CHEERED IN N. Y.

Coolness of Koussevitsky Averts Panic at Fire in Carnegie Hall

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

NEW YORK, April 5—Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony," as played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, while smoke hovered over the players stilled the fears of an audience of more than 3000 in Carnegie hall tonight, when a fire broke out in a rubbish chute. Neither the audience nor the orchestra knew whether or not the fire was a minor one. All that could be seen was menacing wisps of white smoke curling across the stage. Dr. Koussevitsky led his men through the four unbroken movements of the great symphony, and at its close the audience cheered themselves hoarse for the coolness of the conductor and the orchestra and their interpretation of the music.

This triumph could easily have been replaced by a wild stampede, according to those in the auditorium, and it was due principally to the coolness of conductor and orchestra and also to the obedience of the orchestra.

The orchestra had just begun the first movement of the symphony when a puff of smoke from a smoldering fire in the clogged rubbish chute on the West Fifty-sixth street side was seen pouting over the stage.

A man in one of the front seats hastily arose and made for the doors. Several others in the audience started to follow his example. In a moment all was hubbub, the restlessness spread throughout the big audience.

The conductor stopped his orchestra and the girl ushers shouted to the audienceto keep still. Dr. Koussevitsky finally obtained near silence and said to his listeners, "Just keep quiet; everything is all right." Then rapping his baton against a violin desk he commenced the symphony again and played it through without a stop. Just as his men were finishing the second movement, about 25 minutes later, the smoke gradually disappeared.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 6 - 1934

Koussevitsky's Calmness Ends Incipient Panic at Carnegie

With long queues of white smoke drifting over his head, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky stood up on the platform of Carnegie Hall in front of a vast audience of more than 3,000 persons and calmly conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the four unbroken movements of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

His coolness "under fire" last night was said by many in the audience to have averted an almost certain panic and the audience gave him a thundering ovation when he laid his baton down at the conclusion of the great symphony.

Started in Rubbish Chute

The fire originated in a rubbish chute on the 56th St. side of the buiding and the smoke had just started to seep out across the stage as the orchestra swung into the first movement of the symphony.

Alarmed at the sight of the smoke, a man near the stage hopped up and bolted for a door, several others following in his wake, and in another instant all was confusion in the hall.

Taking in the situation at a glance, Dr. Koussevitsky brought his orchestra to an abrupt stop and, after a group of girl ushers shouted to the audience to be calm, he stepped to the front of the stage and said:

"Just keep quiet. Everything is all right."

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 6 - 1934

SYMPHONY PLAYS ON DESPITE FIRE IN CARNEGIE HALL

New York, April 5.—[Special.]—Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony" was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight while smoke hovered over the players. The courage of the musicians stilled the fears of an audience of more than 3,000 in Carnegie hall when fire broke out in a rubbish chute.

Neither the audience nor the orchestra knew whether or not the fire was a minor one. All that could be seen was menacing wisps of smoke curling across the stage. Serge Koussevitsky, the leader, led his ~~men~~ through the four unbroken movements of the symphony, and at its close the audience cheered themselves hoarse for the coolness of the conductor and the orchestra.

When the smoke first blew in a man in one of the front seats arose and made for the doors. Several others in the audience started to follow his example.

The conductor stopped his orchestra and the girl ushers shouted to the audience to keep still. Dr. Koussevitsky finally obtained near silence and said to his listeners, "Just keep quiet; everything is all right." Then rapping his baton against a violin desk, he commenced the symphony again and played it through without a stop. Just as his men were finishing the second movement, about 25 minutes later, the smoke gradually disappeared as the fire was extinguished.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

APR 6 - 1934

KOUSSEVITZKY'S COOLNESS PREVENTS A PANIC

NEW YORK, April 6—The coolness and courage of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~prevented a~~ panic last night at Carnegie hall when smoke filled the auditorium during the performance.

The smoke, pouring from a choked incinerator chute appeared at the end of the intermission. Some of the 2000 listeners began to leave their seats, when Koussevitzky shouted

"Sit down! Everything is all right!"

Playing was resumed and no one left. At the end of the concert he was applauded for several minutes.

SYMPHONY HEAD STOPS FIRE PANIC

Post — April

Koussevitzky's Calm Act Saves Many From Injury

ORCHESTRA PLAYS AS SMOKE ROLLS UP

Audience of 3000 on Feet to Cheer Conductor

In a scene of amazing drama Serge Koussevitzky and the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra prevented a possible fire panic in Carnegie Hall, New York, last night. But for their magnificent coolness many of the audience of 3000 music lovers might have been injured, if not killed.

Continued on Page 18—Sixth Col.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY PREVENTS FIRE PANIC

Continued From First Page

With smoke pouring up from scenery at the back of the stage, the entire orchestra—the most famous in the world—kept their eyes fastened on the baton of their great leader and calmly went through two numbers of the programme in what appeared to be perilous circumstances.

Dr. Koussevitzky himself, suave, calm, and dignified, had previously called back to their seats frightened auditors, who started to flee when smoke first began to roll up from the back of the stage.

The fire started in a restaurant below Carnegie Hall. The orchestra had finished playing the first part of the programme, and had halted for an intermission.

Black smoke suddenly began to lift upward from the wings of the stage.

The huge audience, including some of the leaders of society and the world of finance and art, stared. A few women screamed. Some started precipitately from their seats.

The famous conductor, one of the most dignified in the world of music, sensed the situation and the danger instantly. He had stepped down from his platform. He stepped back. He turned to the audience:

"Everything is all right!" he told the audience in a calm, commanding voice. He invited those who were leaving to return to their seats. Held by the voice and its obvious control, most of the flight was stopped.

Orchestra Responds

The leader motioned to his men, who were relaxed. They picked up their instruments. The leader raised his baton.

In a moment, as though pre-arranged, the majestic strains of the second movement of Tschaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony" swelled up from the orchestra, a mighty voice of a mighty musical organization.

The audience, fascinated by the drama of the play, stood or sat spellbound. As the music welled up to fill the great cavern of the hall, they were as if glued to their seats.

The smoke, heavy and dull, sifted up through the scenery.

The orchestra, held by the baton of its leader, moved not an eye nor a muscle, except in playing. Like a great machine, it played in perfect unison, perfectly controlled by the conductor, though none knew, at the time, what the rolling smoke might mean.

In the great hall, taking their cue from the men of the orchestra, not a soul moved.

The musicians with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting smoothly, magnificently, moved from one great piece to another.

The smoke continued to rise, lazily.

The music filled the hall. The audience sat and stared.

The smoke stopped. The orchestra paused at the leader's command.

A moment of silence, then—as one man—the great audience rose and cheered the conductor and the orchestra.

Investigation proved that the fire in itself was not serious. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, and his men, and the audience as well, had no way of knowing this till the concert was over.

Apr. 6

BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN

Koussevitzky Hailed as Fire Scare Hero

New York, April 6 (INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today. The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke came from an incinerator chute on the south side of the building which had become choked with smoldering refuse.

The smoke drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women uttered shrieks while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitsky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the center of the stage and then shouted roughly:

"Sit down, everything is all right."

moment later he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing. The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

Conductor Kousevitzky and his accomplished players seem to be in vernal and springhtly mood, to judge by their melodious program and its scintillating performance.

Well they might feel festive, for the good news was spread last week that the Boston orchestral organization, by purchasing Symphony Hall, in that city, now owns a home of its own. Several other American symphonic bodies are similarly housed in their cities.

The jubilant concert of last evening began appropriately with a jubilee composition — Hindemith's "Konzertmusik," for string and brass instruments. The work was written by that composer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to commemorate its 15th anniversary season in 1931-2. "Konzertmusik" had its premiere in Boston April 3, 1931, and was first heard in New York on March 5. 1932.

On the latter occasion, Hindemith's fluent score found favor for its pithy expressiveness, its agreeable even if thin lyrical line, and its cleverly facile orchestration. Those impressions were renewed at this fresh hearing, and an added joy was the immaculate playing under the spirited urging of the Bostonian conductor.

Unabashed melody reigned after the slightly cynical Hindemith had finished his say. First we had the languishing delights of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; then followed the propulsive "Till Eulenspiegel," by Strauss; and as a conclusion came the passionate proclamations of Tschaikowsky in his E Minor (fifth) symphony.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

APR 5 - 1934

Symphony Plays on Despite Fire; Coolness of Artists Calms 3,000

Special to The Journal

New York, April 6.—Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony" was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra while smoke hovered over the players. The courage of the musicians stilled the fears of an audience of more than 3,000 in Carnegie Hall when fire broke out in a rubbish chute.

Neither the audience nor the orchestra knew whether or not the fire was a minor one. All that could be seen was menacing wisps of smoke curling across the stage. Serge Koussevitsky, the leader, led his men through the four unbroken movements of the symphony and at its close the audience cheered themselves hoarse for the coolness of the conductor and the orchestra.

When the smoke first blew in a man in one of the front seats arose and made for the doors. Several others in the audience started to follow his example.

The conductor stopped his orchestra and the girl ushers shouted to the audience to keep still. Dr. Koussevitsky finally obtained near silence and said: "Just keep quiet; everything is all right."

Then striking his baton against a violin desk, he commenced the symphony again and played it through without a stop. Just as his men were finishing the second movement, about 25 minutes later, the smoke gradually disappeared as the fire was extinguished.

ROME, GA.
NEWS TRIBUNE

APR 6 1934

FAMOUS LEADER OF ORCHESTRA IS HERO OF FIRE

Conductor Halts Panic Among 2,000 Persons As Smoke Fills Carnegie Hall

NEW YORK, April 6.—(INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smkoe came from an incinerator chute on the south side of the building which had become choked with smoldering refuse.

The smoke drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women uttered shrieks while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the centre of the stage and then shouted roughly, "sit down, everything is all right."

A moment later he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing.

The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

BERLIN, WIS.
JOURNAL

APR 6 - 1934

PLAY SYMPHONY IN FIRE

NEW YORK—Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony" was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night while smoke hovered over the players. The courage of the musicians stilled the fears of an audience of more than 3,000 in Carnegie hall when fire broke out in a rubbish chute.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

APR 6 - 1934

MUSIC MASTER HERO IN 'FIRE'

NEW YORK, April 6.—Serge Kossevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke from a choked incinerator chute suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered. Several women shrieked while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitzky strode to the center of the stage and shouted:

"Sit down; everything is all right."

Then he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing. The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

BOWLING GREEN, OHIO
SENTINEL-TRIBUNE

APR 6 - 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR PREVENTS RIOT AT CONCERT

NEW YORK, April 6. (INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke came from an incinerator chute on the south side of the building which had become choked with smoldering refuse.

The smoke drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women uttered shrieks while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the center of the stage and then shouted roughly, "Sit down, everything is all right."

A moment later he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing.

The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

OTTAWA, CAN.
CITIZEN

APR 6 - 1934

Smoke Got In Their Eyes And It Wasn't Only Name Of Song

2,000 Customers at Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Threatened With Panic As Incinerator Became Choked But Band Played On And Audience Kept Seats.

Associated Press Despatch.

NEW YORK, April 6.—As concerns the 2,000 customers at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, smoke got in their eyes, but the band played on.

An incinerator became choked with smoldering refuse and smoke backed into the auditorium where Serge Koussevitzky was conducting the orchestra. A woman cried out, and several persons arose to leave.

Koussevitzky turned on the podium to face the audience and called out sharply:

"Sit down! Everything is all right."

He swung about quickly, raised the baton and the orchestra resumed playing.

Firemen were still struggling with the balky incinerator when the audience left the hall at the end of the performance.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

APR 6 - 1934

AVERTS PANIC IN CARNEGIE HALL

By International News Service.

NEW YORK, April 6.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke came from an incinerator chute. Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, shouted:

"Sit down; everything is all right!"

A moment later he swung briskly around and signaled the musicians to start playing. The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

APR 6 - 1934

Koussevitzky Prevents Concert Fire Panic

International News Service.

NEW YORK, April 6. — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2,000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke came from an incinerator chute on the south side of the building which had become choked with smoldering refuse.

The smoke drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women uttered shrieks while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the center of the stage and then shouted roughly:

"Sit down, everything is all right."

A moment later he swung briskly around and signalled the musicians to start playing.

The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughout the remainder of the concert.

SO. BEND, IND.
NEWS-TIMES

APR 6 - 1934

Symphony Orchestra Quiets Fire Scare

NEW YORK, April 6.—(Special)—Three thousand music lovers, held by the spectacle of the Boston symphony orchestra playing while smoke swirled about their heads, refused to leave Carnegie hall last night, despite their ignorance of how serious a fire was raging beneath the stage.

Only a few persons left the hall when the first wisps of smoke appeared. Others rose from their seats, startled and ready to run, but Director Serge Koussevitsky, raising his baton, led the orchestra into Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony."

A moment later he stopped the orchestra and turned to the audience. "Just keep quiet," he said. "Everything is all right." And the symphony began again, to continue for 25 minutes.

By that time the smoke had disappeared, a small fire in a rubbish chute had been put out, and the audience recognizing the coolness of the leader and musicians, rose and cheered them to a man.

NEW YORK SUN

APR 6 - 1934

Paul Hindemith Work Heard

'Konzertmusik' Included in Concert Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last Thursday concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last evening. Echoes of the famous fiftieth anniversary celebration of 1931 were still to be heard, for the opening number was Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass and strings, written for that festival.

This composition has surely caused some confusion to advanced thinkers. It is almost according to their creeds, but with occasional genuflections before the altars of Bach and Beethoven. There is much dissonant counterpoint, which is approved by all progressives, but there is also some bending of the line of march backward toward the sugary tonalities of the primitives. And there is a near fugue which might easily have developed itself into something descended from the "Well Tempered Clavichord."

This piece is well made music. It has structure well knit and melodic ideas which flourish in the midst of determined instrumentation and purposeful shattering of the Hogarthian line of beauty reverenced by the ancients of the art. This music lover accepted it with pleasure when it was first performed here on March 5, 1932. He found no reason for altering his view when he heard it again last night. Hindemith was one of the first of the progressives who demonstrated that the new thought in music could also be good thought. Most of the rest have seemed to believe that modernist music, as it is clumsily called, must be good simply because it is modernist. The Bostonians performed Mr. Hindemith's composition with virtuosity. An inferior orchestra would probably make the work sound merely modernist, but the purity and beauty of tone of the Boston organization and the nice adjustment of balance and dynamics are precisely what such music requires to present it with justice.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," with its "flute enchantee," served to disclose Mr. Koussevitzky in a triumph of delicate analysis. Perhaps the subtleties of the score would have been more magical had they been a trifle less exposed, but perhaps there are many music lovers who like to know just how the wheels go around. It was a very polished and clarified performance that the Boston players gave and its translucent charm evoked long and loud applause from the audience.

It is a leap from this Debussy brevity to the "Til Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, but Mr. Koussevitzky took it in his stride. In this work, which exhibits the inspiration of Strauss in highest flight, the visiting orchestra became a company of brilliant virtuosi cooperating in a performance which for splendor and nobility of tone, infinite gradation and elastic style could not be excelled. The humor, the braggadocio, the reckless venture, the pitiful death and the epilogue of tender benediction were sung with glories of utterance and with compelling eloquence. The audience again found itself aroused to demonstrations of delight. The concert came to its end with the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, which has not been idle this season. It has even been danced. So let it rest. It is a hard-lived work and will probably emerge next autumn with well-preserved power.

PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR-NEWS

APR 6 1934

Musician Halts Smoke Panic at Concert Event

NEW YORK, April 6. (INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was receiving a hero's plaudits today.

The famous conductor halted an incipient panic last night when smoke suddenly filled the auditorium of Carnegie Hall, where more than 2000 persons had gathered for the final evening concert of the season.

The smoke from an incinerator chute drifted into the auditorium in swirling eddies during the intermission and several women uttered shrieks, while numerous other persons began to leave their seats.

Mr. Koussevitzky, observing the tenseness of the audience, strode to the center of the stage and then shouted roughly, "Sit down. Everything is all right."

A moment later he swung briskly around and signaled the musicians to start playing. The audience immediately relaxed and sat calmly throughgout the remainder of the concert.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 6 1934

Boston Orchestra Ends Season of Concerts Here

Hindemith, Debussy and a Strauss Work Offered

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. With the exception of the opening work, Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments, Mr. Koussevitzky offered music which long since has passed the controversial stage: Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik was introduced to local listeners by Mr. Koussevitzky in March, 1932, and has escaped the ministrations of other conductors since. The reasons are not difficult to fathom. In its two movements, the German composer, obviously with Handel as his model, has aimed to recapture his great precursor's virility and melodic breadth with something of the spice of modernity added. The trouble is that Handel was a genius and Hindemith but an ambitious talent whose objectives are barely approximated. His thematic material is of the slenderest. For all its bustling pretentiousness, the opening section fails to impress and the close of the first movement, with its impassioned reiteration of a melody overladen with leaps of sevenths and ninths, only achieves the effect of much ado about nothing. The chief theme of the second movement recalls not a little the music Puccini has given to the marriage broker, Goro, in "Mme. Butterfly," and its treatment, despite the contrapuntal ingenuity employed, does nothing to heighten its distinction.

It was considerably more rewarding to hear Mr. Koussevitzky's poetic revelation of Debussy's bucolic tone poem and his frequently stirring exposition of Strauss's masterpiece, both of which the orchestra performed with virtuosity and glowing, prismatic tonal hues.

J. D. B.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

34

Brilliant Concert Closes Local Symphony

By RONALD THORNE

Washington has been exceptionally fortunate in hearing, within two days, two excellent concerts by two splendid symphony orchestras, which have included in the programs two of the greatest works ever written in symphonic form—the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony and Cesar Franck's masterpiece, the D minor Symphony.

Naturally, with such an experience, comparison of the famous Boston Symphony with our own National Symphony is hardly to be avoided. It can truthfully be said that under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, the great organization from the Hub has attained its highest stature since the days of Dr. Karl Muck. Some critics might even place Dr. Koussevitzky first.

However that may be, and brilliant though the Boston Symphony's concert proved on Wednesday, Dr. Hans Kindler and his men do not suffer by comparison. Yesterday's concert, in my opinion, is the finest they have given in their entire existence. It would be unfortunate indeed if it proved their valedictory, and it is incredible that music lovers of this city should permit that to be the case.

The D minor Symphony, of course, was the principal work on yesterday's program. It is no surprise that it was urged for the request program by many Washingtonians, although it has not been played this season, for it has a rightful place among the greatest compositions of all time. And seldom if ever have the members of the National Symphony given a finer interpretation of the work of a master.

Showmen tell us that Washington audiences are less responsive than those of other cities; only extraordinarily fine work draws forth an unrestrained tribute here. But I have never witnessed in Washington a more enthusiastic ovation than that accorded Dr. Kindler and his men by yesterday's audience. It proved amply the place they have won in the cultural life of the Capital.

Dr. Kindler chose an excellent program, and it was excellently performed. Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the first number, presents Mozart at the height of inspiration; then the great Cesar Franck work, an achievement of genius if ever there was one; third, a novelty number of grace and appeal, Georg Schumann's "Dance of the Nymphs and Satyrs," never before performed in Washington; and last, Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture Solenelle," one of the foremost of all overtures.

A splendid concert, one of the most enjoyable Washington has ever witnessed—and a splendid climax to a season marked by many artistic triumphs.

Boston Orchestra Ends Season of Concerts Here

Apr 7 - Sub - NY

Hindemith, Debussy and a Strauss Work Offered

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday night. With the exception of the opening work, Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments, Mr. Koussevitzky offered music which long since has passed the controversial stage: Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik was introduced to local listeners by Mr. Koussevitzky in March, 1932, and has escaped the ministrations of other conductors since. The reasons are not difficult to fathom. In its two movements, the German composer, obviously with Handel as his model, has aimed to recapture his great precursor's virility and melodic breadth with something of the spice of modernity added. The trouble is that Handel was a genius and Hindemith but an ambitious talent whose objectives are barely approximated. His thematic material is of the slenderest. For all its bustling pretentiousness, the opening section fails to impress and the close of the first movement, with its impassioned reiteration of a melody overladen with leaps of sevenths and ninths, only achieves the effect of much ado about nothing. The chief theme of the second movement recalls not a little the music Puccini has given to the marriage broker, Goro, in "Mme. Butterfly," and its treatment, despite the contrapuntal ingenuity employed, does nothing to heighten its distinction.

It was considerably more rewarding to hear Mr. Koussevitzky's poetic revelation of Debussy's bucolic tone poem and his frequently stirring exposition of Strauss's masterpiece, both of which the orchestra performed with virtuosity and glowing, prismatic tonal hues.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 6 - 1934

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN SUPERB CONCERT

Program Contrast Daring of Hindemith With That of Debussy and Strauss.

CONDUCTOR WINS OVATION

Dr. Koussevitzky Brings His Audience to Its Feet With Tchaikovsky Finale.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Superlative playing of the first half of the program given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was somewhat overshadowed by the pall of smoke that descended over the heads of the orchestra in the second half, and by the alarm of the audience, while Mr. Koussevitzky and his men, with a coolness and courage past praise, gave a performance at first steady and at the end very brilliant, of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony.

The distinction of the performances, aside from the sensational features of the occasion, constituted one of the best orchestral concerts of the season. The program, with the exception of Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, was of acknowledged masterpieces — Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," for the first half of the concert, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony for the second.

The Hindemith music was composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When that orchestra was founded the atonalities of the Konzertmusik" would have been the most incredible nightmares of sound. No one could have been convinced that such combinations of keys or abnegations of harmony would ever be accepted seriously by human beings.

Music No Longer Audacious.

But see how the language of music evolves! Today we listen, some with grim endurance, more with tolerance and without the turning of a hair, to these extratonal adventures of a contemporaneous composer, while the music of Debussy and Strauss, hotly contested at the turn of the century, is now sheerest classicism.

Yet it must be said that with all the technical mastery and audacious spirit of Hindemith, neither he nor any of his fellows displays such originality and such breathtaking adventurousness as Strauss and Debussy demonstrated in their period. It would seem clear, by this comparison, that the present time in music is not a profoundly creative one, and that we are actually short of revolutionary spirits. The counterpoint of Hindemith is only pushing further long accepted musical procedure. The music of Debussy ushered in a new epoch and a beauty that had not been dreamed of before he appeared. With Strauss also there was perceptible an explosion of genius, which, if it did not break paths in the Debussyan sense, gave the world notice of a new mind, a new temperament, a new imagination at work in the orchestra.

Rare Performance of "The Faun."

The performances of a virtuoso orchestra and conductor were particularly sympathetic to the nervous, dissonant music of Hindemith and the irridesences of Debussy's score. "L'Après-midi" was played with a golden languor but without the suspicion of sentimentality. And where is a more beautiful flute part in orchestral music? But the first flutist of the orchestra is also to be thanked for this. His tone and art were one of the leading features of the performance.

It was a cunning stroke of program-making to juxtapose Hindemith's incisive music with the dreams and languors of Debussy and the humor and sardonic fantasy of Strauss. For these latter composers there was particular and long sustained applause.

The Tchaikovsky symphony naturally was not completely itself in the earlier movements. It could not have been simple for either conductor or players to concentrate upon phrasings and sonorities when smoke was thickening about them and when for all they knew, the stage might become a furnace. The playing was testimony to the discipline of the orchestra and the complete command of the music and the situation by Dr. Kovssevitzky. By the same tokens, it was not unnatural that the triumphant finale of the work, the finale which is perhaps the one heroic and triumphant utterance in all of the Tchaikovsky symphonies, should be given in an overwhelmingly dramatic and effective manner. The orchestra had been through a trial that was not only one of Tchiakovksian emotion. The relief that must have been felt by the men, and the exultation that thrills in the music, found release in the interpretation. At the end the audience, similarly motivated and affected, rose to its feet, to a woman and man, and cheered the conductor and the orchestra for minutes. There was reason for this. One move of alarm on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky or any one of his players, and it is doubtful whether this article would be concerned with the distinctions between Hindemith, Strauss and Debussy.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 7 - 1934

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here; Orchestra to Open New Borough Series in November

The final concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-sixth annual Brooklyn series attracted a large and distinguished audience to the Academy of Music last evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, dconuctor, presented a program which included the works of Handel, Debussy, d'Indy and Sibelius.

Announcement was made by Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences that a orchestra will give a series of borough concerts during the season of 1934-35. The concerts will again be under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn; R. Huntington Woodman, president, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, hostess in the committee box. last night, had as her guests the Suffragan Bishop and Mrs. J. I. Blair Larned, Dr. and Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Miss Adelaide Haxtun and John C. Francis.

Mrs. Frederic Pratt and a party included Dr. and Mrs. Phillips Packer Elliott, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Youtz and Mr. Pratt occupied a box at the court. In the box of the Packer Collegiate Institute were: Miss Bertha Brais, Miss Elsa Chapin and Mrs. Ruth B. Sheppler. Hosts in the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were: Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Johnson.

The Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes occupied a box and other members of the Junior League of Brooklyn and their escorts attended the concert. In the two Junion League boxes were the Misses Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and their escorts, Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee; the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott, and their escorts, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch and Gregory Price.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee for the series, which is headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, received in the foyer of the opera house last night preceding the performance. Among them were: Mr. and Mrs. Blum, Miss Mary Dillon, Dr. and Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh and Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols.

Five concerts will be given again next season on Four Friday evenings and one Thursday evening. The following dates have been announced: Nov. 16, Jan. 4, Jan. 31, March 1 and April 5.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 7 - 1934

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky Conclude Their Brooklyn Season— Ganna Walska in Recital

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last night under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGRAM
Concerto Grosso in B minor..Handel
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"..Debussy
"Istar" Variations ....D'Indy
Second Symphony ....Sibelius

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded their Brooklyn season with a concert at the Academy of Music last night. The program exemplified the catholicity of the conductor's taste, the performance the impressive virtuosity to which he has trained his men. One does not like to arouse antagonisms by expressing preferences, but the truth is that, for sheer beauty of sound, one would prefer hearing the Bostonians to any other orchestra. There are times, perhaps, when Mr. Koussewitsky drives his strings too hard; he has a liking, one gathers, under certain circumstances, for a string tone of a hard, penetrating intensity; but for the most part he seeks neither the exaggerated brilliancy for which Stokowski strives nor the devitalized purity of tone characteristic at times of Philharmonic performances. It has been said of Josef Hofmann that among pianists his tone is the most pianistic; it may be said, similarly, of the Boston Symphony, that among orchestras its tone is the most orchestral. This means little or much, as you understand it.

Last evening's program opened with a Handel concerto for strings; this was followed by Debussy's orchestral paraphrase of Mallarme's "L'apres midi d'un faune" and D'Indy's "Istar" variations. The concert concluded with a performance of Sibelius' second symphony. All of this music had been heard previously, in other seasons, by the audience that attends the Boston orchestra's Academy of Music concerts. Mr. Koussewitsky, though the range of his choice is wider than that of many conductors, has certain preferences which he imposes on his public. In the case of those on last night's program this was, quite properly, satisfactory to his listeners. Especially one was gratified to hear again the Sibelius symphony which, with the fourth and the seventh of the same composer, is among modern masterpieces in the form. The slow movement is one of Sibelius' most impressive creations, but the symphony reaches heights also in the first movement and in the finale. One senses continuously the originality, the power, of this artist's mind, his deep sensitiveness to experience and ability to understand and re-express its implications.

D'Indy's "Istar" is a work for which one does not retain one's first admiration. There are other and neglected scores by this Frenchman which it would be preferable to hear—not the B minor symphony, upon which a conductor's choice will often fall, but the "Jour d'ete sur la montagne," or the symphony on the song of a mountaineer. It is, one feels, the program of "Istar" that keeps it in the active repertory, rather than any qualities in the music itself. The variations last evening served to exhibit the tonal resources of the orchestra. They were superlatively played. Equally satisfying were the performances of the Debussy and the Handel.

Brooklyn Times Union

APR 7 - 1934

Boston Symphony Finishes Successful Series Here; To Return Next Season

Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announced last night at the final performance of the 46th annual series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music that the annual series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Brooklyn during the season of 1934-35. The series again next season will be under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, president, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Five concerts will be given again next season on four Friday evenings and one Thursday evening on the following dates: November 16, January 4, January 31, March 1 and April 5.

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis was the hostess in the committee box last night and had as her guests the Right Rev. and Mrs. J. I. Blair Larned, Dr. and Mrs. Earle J. Huff, Miss Adelaide Haxtun and Mr. John C. Francis.

Mrs. Frederick Pratt and a party which included Dr. and Mrs. Phillips Packer Elliott, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Youtz and Mr. Pratt occupied a box last night. Occupying the box of the Packer Collegiate Institute were Miss Bertha Brais, Miss Elsa Chapin and Mrs. Ruth D. Sheppler. Hosts in the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Johnson.

The Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes occupied a box and members of the Junior League of Brooklyn and their escorts attended the concert. In the two Junior League boxes were the Misses Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and their escorts Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee; the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott and their escorts Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch and Gregory Price.

A notable performance of the following works was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night: Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12, Handel; Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune, Debussy, Eclogue by S. Mallarme; Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42, d'Indy; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Sibelius.

A committee of members of the Sponsoring Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, received in the foyer of the opera house last night preceding the performance. Among the members of the Sponsoring Committee on the reception committee last night were: Mr. and Mrs. Blum, Miss Mary Dillon, Dr. and Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh and Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 7 - 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS 46TH SEASON

Final Concert in Its Brooklyn Series Draws Social Leaders of the Borough.

YOUNGER SET AT AFFAIR

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis Is the Evening's Official Hostess With a Distinguished Party.

A large audience, including many leaders in borough social circles, attended the final performance of the forty-sixth annual series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Charles D. Atkins, director of the department of education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under the auspices of which the series was offered, announced that the orchestra will present another series of concerts next season. The programs again will be under the auspices of the Institute of Arts, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

The five concerts in the 1934-35 series will be presented as follows: Nov. 16, Jan. 4, Jan. 31, March 1, April 5.

The program last night, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, included the following works: Concerto Grosso No. 12, for string orchestra in B minor, Handel; the "Prélude à l'Après-midi d'un Faune," of Debussy; "Eclogue," by S. Mallarmé; symphonic variations, "Istar," Opus 42, by d'Indy, and the Second symphony in D major of Sibelius.

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis was hostess in the committee box. Her guests included Suffragan Bishop and Mrs. J. I. Blair Larned, Dr. and Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Miss Adelaide Haxtun and John C. Francis.

Occupying the box of the Packer Collegiate Institute were the Misses Berthe Brais, Elsa Chapin and Mrs. Ruth B. Sheppler. Entertaining in the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Johnson.

The Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes occupied a box. Several members of the Junior League of Brooklyn and their escorts also attended. In the two Junior League boxes were the Misses Betty Lathrop, Stella Rae Carter, Sally Harding and their escorts, Stewart Richards, Robert Bergen, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee, and the Misses Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Virginia Felter, Lesley Olcott and their escorts, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch and Gregory Price.

A committee of members of the sponsoring committee, of which Mr. Van Sinderen is chairman, received in the foyer of the opera house preceding the performance. Members on the reception committee included: Mr. and Mrs. Blum, Miss Mary Dillon, Dr. and Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh and Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

APR 7 - 1934

Music

By Henriette Weber

Achron Brothers Give Recital

* * *

entified in the eyes of the music
ha Heifetz, having been his ac-
er the world for many years,
away from this long association,
piano recital at Carnegie Hall.

With this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York season is closed. To celebrate the conclusion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's tenth year as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, a representative group of composers and other well known men and women who are interested in the development of American music, will present a statement of appreciation to the conductor after the concert. This statement, permanently recorded on a scroll, expresses the gratitude of the signers for Dr. Koussevitzky's distinguished services in the cause of native music. During these ten years of his directorship of the Boston Orchestra, he has presented 70 works by American composers.

The presentation will be made by Rubin Goldmark in the Green Room. The following names are the signers of the scroll:

Joseph Achron, Barion Bauer, Nicolai Berezowsky, Ernest Bloch, John Alden Carpenter, Israel Citkowitz, Frederick S. Converse, Aaron Copland, Carl Engel, Arthur Foote, George Gershwin, Rubin Goldmark, Louis Gruenberg, Henry Hadley, Richard Hammond, Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, Edward B. Hill, Werner Josten, Daniel Gregory Mason, Harold Morris, Walter Piston, Carlos Salzedo, Roger Sessions, Alexander Steinert, Randall Thompson, Emerson Whithorne, John Erskine, Alvin Johnson, Alfred Knopf, Dorothy Lawton, Minna Lederman, Paul Rosenfeld.

* * *

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 7 - 1934

MUSIC

By Julian Seaman

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

Old Things Are Best.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8:45 p. m.

THE PROGRAM:

Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments ....Hindemith
"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" ....Debussy
"Till Eulenspiegel" ....Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor (Opus 64) ....Tchaikwsky

A pleasant glow of old remembrance gently suffused the fashionable corridors of Carnegie Hall last night as Dr. Koussevitzky and the visiting Bostonians, here to conclude the New York season, came to rest upon the final note of Tschaikowsky's wartorn fifth symphony. It was a comfort to know that the eclectic Doctor, having pandered at once to the modish foibles of his subscribers, via the Hindemith score, was content to seek familiar byways for the rest of the journey.

In the course of this commendable discretion he achieved a remarkable performance of "L'Apres-midi," exquisite in its mystic beauty, in the dreamlike, half-remembered vision of the waking faun, in its indescribable imagery and vernal magic.

But his discourse of the waggish Eulenspiegel missed entirely that intangible air of impudent gaiety which the score demands. I thought this the least impressive of Dr. Koussevitzky's efforts last night.

The Hindemith score is an excellent example of clean writing upon a fabric almost vaporous in its lack of substance. The texture is harmonic, deftly tinted, thumbed unmistakably by certain orchestral mannerisms of Brahms and Beethoven. The orchestration is robust but avoids adroitly the sin of being over-massive.

Dr. Koussevitzky's band is a justly celebrated entourage. Probably nowhere in the orchestral world is there a superior effulgence of string tone. The brasses and winds, in the matter of pure tone-color, are incomparable.

* * *

The piano recital by Mr. Leon-

Tran. Apr 7

Secrets are well kept at Symphony Hall. In spite of curiosity about the "mystery concert," which will be given Wednesday evening by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for the benefit of the Emergency Relief Fund, no information about it has escaped up to the present. The most that can be learned is that the evening in general will be light and entertaining and there are rumors of secret operations in progress to change the appearance of the hall.

At the [illegible] the concert by the Bos[illegible] Orchestra this afternoon [illegible] Carnegie Hall, New York, a scroll will be presented to Dr. Koussevitzky, marking the conclusion of his tenth season as conductor, and expressing appreciation for his interest in and his services to the cause of American music. The testimonial bears the signatures of representative American composers and others interested in developing American music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. CITIZEN

APR 7 - 1934

Recital by Boston Symphony Players

The Sunday afternoon series of lec- [illegible], conducted by Olin Downes, will conclude tomorrow with a concert by twenty-six players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, at 3:15 o'clock. Mr. Downes will discuss [illegible] by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra," the subject of this recital.

The program will be devoted wholly [illegible] four of the five [illegible] are living men. One, Aaron Copland, is a principal figure of the rising generation of American creative talent. The other composers are Stravinsky, Satie, Ravel and Hindemith.

The program for the performance is as follows: Octet for wind instruments (Igor Stravinsky); "Gymnopedies" (Erik Satie); Music for the Theatre, suites in five parts (Aaron Copland); introduction and allegro for harp, with string quartet, flute and clarinet (Maurice Ravel); "Kammermusik No. 1" (Paul Hindemith.)

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 7 - 1934

NOW AND THEN

By Emile Gauvreau

The Calm of Music

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays to a crowded Carnegie Hall audience of 2,000 music lovers, smoke curls slowly through the high upper reaches of the famous auditorium from a defective incinerator in the building. Conductor Koussevitzky, aware of the impending panic which might result from a single outcry, turns from the expedient of music's memorable enchantment and, just as the panic cry is about to set up its disastrous signal, he commands his audience to sit still and assures it that there is no danger. Instantly the audience permits itself to become a part of the leadership whose confidence is shown in the orchestra's response. The music bursts forth once more. The concert renews. Such is the beauty and the truth of music's force.

HANOVER, PA. SUN

APR 7 - 1934

* * *

In appreciation of the seventy works by American composers which Serge Koussevitzky has presented during his ten years with the Boston Symphony orchestra, a testimonial signed by thirty-eight composers and others interested in modern music will be presented the conductor after his final concert of the season this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, New York.

* * *

By report of the New York Times, Sibelius, listening at Helsingfors to a performance of his Fourth Symphony by the resident orchestra under the American, Werner Janssen, then and there declared him the "most gifted interpreter, probably" of his music.

* * *

Sir Henry Wood, conductor of the British Broadcasting Company's orchestra, will return to America next season for a month of guest conducting with various orchestras. He recently conducted three concerts with the Boston Symphony

---

Orchestra and a radio concert in New York.

* * *

If Strauss has not composed music worth posterity's while, the prospect of one or two contemporary composers must be counted gloomy. Even "Don Juan" in a performance of less than proper glamour puts Plokoviev out of mind. The moderns have been for years expounding to us their theories of art and, between whiles, telling us that Wagner is worked out and Strauss defunct. But where is the contemporary "Tristan" or "Die Meistersinger" and where is the contemporary "Rosenkavalier?" Or even the contemporary "Lohengrin," and "Don Juan"? — Neville Cardus in The Manchester Guardian.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 8 - 1934

Enjoyment of Music Series Will Close With Unusual Concert at Academy Today

ONE of the most unusual and interesting programs of the entire Brooklyn concert season will bring to a close today the Sunday afternoon series of concerts presented for the first time this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and 26 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the concert which is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees.

A feature of this final concert is that the program is devoted wholly to modern music. Of the five men, whose works Olin Downes, the critic, has selected for the program, four are living composers. Mr. Downes will discuss "Music by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra." One of the composers represented on the program, Aaron Copland, a former Brooklynite, is a principal figure of the rising generation of American creative talent and Dr. Koussevitzky has been responsible for the first presentation of some of his outstanding works. The other composers whose works will be performed today are Stravinsky, Satie, Ravel and Hindemith.

Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. F. R. Schepmocs will be the hostesses in the committee box and will have as guests Mr. and Mrs. Albert Van Wyck, Mr. Thayer and Mr. and Mrs. Howard R. Haviland. Lloyd V. Almirall is entertaining a party of box guests and Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, chairman of the sponsoring committee, and Miss Irene Miles will have box guests.

Mrs. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Blum and Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson will receive with members of the sponsoring committee in the foyer of the opera house preceding this afternoon's performance.

Director Charles D. Atkins of the institute announces that plans for the 1934-1935 "Enjoyment of Music" series are now under consideration and will be announced shortly.

Among the members of the sponsoring committee who will serve on the reception committee today are Dr. and Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Goetze, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Miss Anais Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. William

Continued from Page 1

F. Eastman, Miss Irene Miles Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mr. and Mrs. Thayer Mrs. Schepmoes and Mr Almirall.

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 8 - 1934

MUSIC

By Julia

Orchestra of the Week.

Mr. Nathan Milstein, Russian violinist, will play the Tchaikowsky concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, under Mr. Hans Lange, in an all-Russian program, which will include the overture to Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" and Tchaikowsky's Symphony in F minor (No. 4).

On Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Toscanini will conduct a Concerto Grosso in G minor, by Francesco Geminiani (Opus 3, No. 2), in the edition of Adolfo Betti; also the Mozart Symphony in G minor (No. 40), Kodaly's Summer Evening; Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, and the Berlioz overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

* * *

The Boston Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitsky and his Bostonians made their final local appearance of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, before a large and interested audince. Dr. Koussevitsky's program consisted of the Handel concerto grosso in B minor for string orchestra. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra, chorus of women's voices and a speaker, and the C minor symphony of Brahms.

Interest centered in the Loeffler novelty, which received its first New York performance. Going back once more, as in his "Pagan Poem," to the mists of antiquity for his inspiration, the composer gave us a lovely, haunting thing, exquisitely and imaginatively scored. If the lamp of invention seemed to burn a little low at times, the mood created managed to hold, and the effect of the womens' voices singing the verses

drawn from T. W. Macka grams of the Greek Anth
was tender and poetic as the co
poser intended. The last stanza was spoken to the orchestral accompaniment by Mr. David Blair McClosky ("Remember me the singing stone, thou who passest by Nisaea") and created a weird effect, the more effective for the reason that the combination of the speaking voice with musical accompaniment so often fails to carry artistic conviction.

The Handel concerto grosso was beautifully played, though the reading of the Brahms work seemed curiously lacking in conviction, the superb opening missing fire entirely. Dr. Koussevitsky received a most cordial reception and there was much applause for Mr. Loeffler after the per-

NEW YORK JOURNAL

APR 7 - 1934

Music -:- By Henriette Weber

Achron Brothers Give Recital

entified in the eyes of the music
ha Heifetz, having been his ac-
er the world for many years,
away from this long association,
piano recital at Carnegie Hall.

* * *

With this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York season is closed. To celebrate the conclusion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's tenth year as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, a representative group of composers and other well known men and women who are interested in the development of American music, will present a statement of appreciation to the conductor after the concert. This statement, permanently recorded on a scroll, expresses the gratitude of the signers for Dr. Koussevitzky's distinguished services in the cause of native music. During these ten years of his directorship of the Boston Orchestra, he has presented 70 works by American composers.

The presentation will be made by Rubin Goldmark in the Green Room. The following names are the signers of the scroll:

Joseph Achron, Barion Bauer, Nicolai Berezowsky, Ernest Bloch, John Alden Carpenter, Israel Citkowitz, Frederick S. Converse, Aaron Copland, Carl Engel, Arthur Foote, George Gershwin, Rubin Goldmark, Louis Gruenberg, Henry Hadley, Richard Hammond, Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, Edward B. Hill, Werner Josten, Daniel Gregory Mason, Harold Morris, Walter Piston, Carlos Salzedo, Roger Sessions, Alexander Steinert, Randall Thompson, Emerson Whithorne, John Erskine, Alvin Johnson, Alfred Knopf, Dorothy Lawton, Minna Lederman, Paul Rosenfeld.

* * *

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 7 - 1934

MUSIC

By Julian Seaman

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

Old Things Are Best.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8:45 p. m.

THE PROGRAM:

Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments ....Hindemith
"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" ....Debussy
"Till Eulenspiegel" ....Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor (Opus 64) ....Tchaikwsky

A pleasant glow of old remembrance gently suffused the fashionable corridors of Carnegie Hall last night as Dr. Koussevitsky and the visiting Bostonians, here to conclude the New York season, came to rest upon the final note of Tschaikowsky's wartorn fifth symphony. It was a comfort to know that the eclectic Doctor, having pandered at once to the modish foibles of his subscribers, via the Hindemith score, was content to seek familiar byways for the rest of the journey.

In the course of this commendable discretion he achieved a remarkable performance of "L'Apres-midi," exquisite in its mystic beauty, in the dreamlike, half-remembered vision of the waking faun, in its indescribable imagery and vernal magic.

But his discourse of the waggish Eulenspiegel missed entireiy that intangible air of impudent gaiety which the score demands. I thought this the least impressive of Dr. Koussevitsky's efforts last night.

The Hindemith score is an excellent example of clean writing upon a fabric almost vaporous in its lack of substance. The texture is harmonic, deftly tinted, thumbed unmistakably by certain orchestral mannerisms of Brahms and Beethoven. The orchestration is robust but avoids adroitly the sin of being over-massive.

Dr. Koussevitsky's band is a justly celebrated entourage. Probably nowhere in the orchestral world is there a superior effulgence of string tone. The brasses and winds, in the matter of pure tone-color, are incomparable.

* * *

The piano recital by Mr. Leon-

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 7 - 1934

Recital by Boston Symphony Players

The Sunday afternoon series of lecture-recitals, conducted by Olin Downes, will conclude to-morrow with a concert by twenty-six players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, at 8:15 o'clock. Mr. Downes will discuss "Music by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra," the subject of this recital.

The program will be devoted wholly to modern music, and four of the five composers represented are living men. One, Aaron Copland, is a principal figure of the rising generation of American creative talent. The other composers are Stravinsky, Satie, Ravel and Hindemith.

The program for the performance is as follows: Octet for wind instruments (Igor Etravinsky); "Gymnodedies" (Erik Satie); Music for the Theatre, suites in five parts (Aaron Copland); introduction and allegro for harp, with string quartet, flute and clarinet (Maurice Ravel); "Kammermusik No. 1" (Paul Hindemith.)

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 7 - 1934

NOW AND THEN

By Emile Gauvreau

Re Calm of Music

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays to a crowded Carnegie Hall audience of 2,000 music lovers, smoke curls slowly through the high upper reaches of the famous auditorium from a defective incinerator in the building. Conductor Koussevitzky, aware of the impending panic which might result from a single outcry, turns from the expedient of music's memorable enchantment and, just as the panic cry is about to set up its disastrous signal, he commands his audience to sit still and assures it that there is no danger. Instantly the audience permits itself to become a part of the leadership whose confidence is shown in the orchestra's response. The music bursts forth once more. The concert renews. Such is the beauty and the truth of music's force.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

APR 7 - 1934

* * *

In appreciation of the seventy works by American composers which Serge Koussevitzky has presented during his ten years with the Boston Symphony orchestra, a testimonial signed by thirty-eight composers and others interested in modern music will be presented the conductor after his final concert of the season this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, New York.

* * *

By report of the New York Times, Sibelius, listening at Helsingfors to a performance of his Fourth Symphony by the resident orchestra under the American, Werner Janssen, then and there declared him the "most gifted interpreter, probably" of his music.

* * *

Sir Henry Wood, conductor of the British Broadcasting Company's orchestra, will return to America next season for a month of guest conducting with various orchestras. He recently conducted three concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a radio concert in New York.

* * *

If Strauss has not composed music worth posterity's while, the prospect of one or two contemporary composers must be counted gloomy. Even "Don Juan" in a performance of less than proper glamour puts Plokoviev out of mind. The moderns have been for years expounding to us their theories of art and, between whiles, telling us that Wagner is worked out and Strauss defunct. But where is the contemporary "Tristan" or "Die Meistersinger" and where is the contemporary "Rosenkavalier?" Or even the contemporary "Lohengrin," and "Don Juan"? — Neville Cardus in The Manchester Guardian.

Tran. Apr 7

Secrets are well kept at Symphony Hall. In spite of curiosity about the "mystery concert," which will be given Wednesday evening by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for the benefit of the Emergency Relief Fund, no information about it has escaped up to the present. The most that can be learned is that the evening in general will be light and entertaining and there are rumors of secret operations in progress to change the appearance of the hall.

At the [illegible] concert by the Bost[illegible] Orchestra this aftern[illegible]arnegie Hall, New York, a scroll will be presented to Dr. Koussevitzky, marking the conclusion of his tenth season as conductor, and expressing appreciation for his interest in and his services to the cause of American music. The testimonial bears the signatures of representative American composers and others interested in developing American music.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 8 - 1934

Enjoyment of Music Series Will Close With Unusual Concert at Academy Today

ONE of the most unusual and interesting programs of the entire Brooklyn concert season will bring to a close today the Sunday afternoon series of concerts presented for the first time this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and 26 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the concert which is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees.

A feature of this final concert is that the program is devoted wholly to modern music. Of the five men, whose works Olin Downes, the critic, has selected for the program, four are living composers. Mr. Downes will discuss "Music by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra." One of the composers represented on the program, Aaron Copland, a former Brooklynite, is a principal figure of the rising generation of American creative talent and Dr. Koussevitzky has been responsible for the first presentation of some of his outstanding works. The other composers whose works will be performed today are Stravinsky, Satie, Ravel and Hindemith.

Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes will be the hostesses in the committee box and will have as guests Mr. and Mrs. Albert Van Wyck, Mr. Thayer and Mr. and Mrs. Howard R. Haviland. Lloyd V. Almirall is entertaining a party of box guests and Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, chairman of the sponsoring committee, and Miss Irene Miles will have box guests.

Mrs. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Blum and Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson will receive with members of the sponsoring committee in the foyer of the opera house preceding this afternoon's performance.

Director Charles D. Atkins of the institute announces that plans for the 1934-1935 "Enjoyment of Music" series are now under consideration and will be announced shortly.

Among the members of the sponsoring committee who will serve on the reception committee today are Dr. and Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Goetze, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Miss Anais Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. William

Continued from Page 1

F. Eastman, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mr. and Mrs. Thayer, Mrs. Schepmoes and Mr. Almirall.

NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 8 - 1934

MUSIC -:- By Julian

Orchestra of the Week.

Mr. Nathan Milstein, Russian violinist, will play the Tchaikowsky concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, under Mr. Hans Lange, in an all-Russian program, which will include the overture to Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" and Tchaikowsky's Symphony in F minor (No. 4).

On Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Toscanini will conduct a Concerto Grosso in G minor, by Francesco Geminiani (Opus 3, No. 2), in the edition of Adolfo Betti; also the Mozart Symphony in G minor (No. 40), Kodaly's Summer Evening; Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, and the Berlioz overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

* * *

The Boston Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitsky and his Bostonians made their final local appearance of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, before a large and interested audince. Dr. Koussevitsky's program consisted of the Handel concerto grosso in B minor for string orchestra. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra, chorus of women's voices and a speaker, and the C minor symphony of Brahms.

Interest centered in the Loeffler novelty, which received its first New York performance. Going back once more, as in his "Pagan Poem," to the mists of antiquity for his inspiration, the composer gave us a lovely, haunting thing, exquisitely and imaginatively scored. If the lamp of invention seemed to burn a little low at times, the mood created managed to hold, and the effect of the womens' voices singing the verses drawn from T. W. Macka
grams of the Greek Anth
was tender and poetic as the co
poser intended. The last stanza was spoken to the orchestral accompaniment by Mr. David Blair McClosky ("Remember me the singing stone, thou who passest by Nisaea") and created a weird effect, the more effective for the reason that the combination of the speaking voice with musical accompaniment so often fails to carry artistic conviction.

The Handel concerto grosso was beautifully played, though the reading of the Brahms work seemed curiously lacking in conviction, the superb opening missing fire entirely. Dr. Koussevitsky received a most cordial reception and there was much applause for Mr. Loeffler after the per-

143

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 8 - 1934

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Loeffler's "Evocation" Heard Here for the First Time From the Boston Symphony

Fifth and last New York matinee concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by chorus [illegible] the Cecilia Society, and David Blair McClosky, Speaker.

PROGRAM

1. Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
2. Loeffler—"Evocation," for Orchestra with Chorus of Women's Voices, and a Speaking Voice.
   (First performance in New York.)
   Chorus from the Cecilia Society.
   Speaker: David Blair McClosky.
3. Brahms—Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

THE high point of yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall (the Orchestra's last appearance here this season) was the New York première of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation."

A new work by Mr. Loeffler, no matter what its scope or its character, is inevitably a musical event of the first order; for Mr. Loeffler, now in his seventy-fourth year, remains the most distinguished musical mind that is functioning creatively in America. Fifty-three years ago, an Alsatian youth of twenty, he landed on these shores from the French ship Le Canada, and he has lived here ever since—for forty-seven years as an American citizen.

Long before the Young Lions of atonalism had begun to roar and rear upon the tonal veldt, Loeffler—the aristocratic fiddler who used to share with Franz Kneisel the first-violin desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Golden Age—had been ranked by the cognoscenti at the head of music-makers in America by reason of the individual quality of his thought, the inimitable distinction of his style, and the mastery of his craftsmanship.

* * *

It is a good many years since Loeffler began to give us those masterpieces of tonal subtlety and beauty and perturbing originality which turned him into an incredible and slightly irrubrical legend under the very nose of the New England Conservatory of Music. But he has not lost his command of the inevitable instrumental word: he still knows the secret way to those sources of imaginative incantation and power and intelectual distinction which he never had to learn. The music which we heard here yesterday for the first time is steeped in the familiar beauty of tone and mood and substance, is characterized by the old exquisiteness and strength and craftiness of facture. No one but Loeffler could have produced this score. It is unmistakable, inimitable.

* * *

"Evocation" was written in 1930 for the dedication of Severance Hall, the permanent home of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. The score is appropriately inscribed to that large-visioned philanthropist, Mr. John L. Severance, whose munificence yielded the principal contribution which made possible the erection of the beautiful and appropriate hall which bears his name.

Mr. Loeffler was fittingly commissioned to write the music for the dedication ceremonies with which Severance Hall was formally opened to the public on February 5, 1931. Nikolai Sokoloff, to whom the admirable Cleveland Symphony Orchestra owes its existence and its present high estate as a musical organization, conducted the program, which offered as its special feature the dedicatory work of Mr. Loeffler.

* * *

The music is a setting of lines from the Greek Anthology (in the English version of J. W. Mackail). It is written for large orchestra, women's voices, and the voice of a reciter.

Mr. Loeffler, in a felicitous description, has said that "the imagined form of the music is to tell us of the building of a beautiful temple of the Muses; of the god Pan's rhapsodic lay, and of the nymphs' love for him; of their vain endeavors to fetter him to their beloved sunny fields whence Echo is listening, listening for the pure fun of answering; of Syrinx, Pan's most beloved naiad, whom Artemis metamorphosed into a reed to save her from Pan's amorous pursuit; of the strange account given by the 'Singing Stone' of itself; awed by solemn wonder at it, we now seek the little stream running down the hills to meet us, the reeds bowing to us in the breeze. The nymphs are still calling, 'Pan, abide here on these sunny greens.'"

Charles Martin Loeffler

After the portrait by Sargent

Composer of "Evocation"

* * *

The clue to the significant appropriateness of the text chosen by the composer for this work which was to dedicate a House of Music is to be found in what Mr. Loeffler refers to as "the strange account given by the Singing Stone of itself"—those mystical and evocative lines of the Greek epigram in which it is related how,

> . . . when Alcathous was building his bastions, then > Phoebus lifted on his shoulders a stone for the house, and laid down on me > his Delphic harp; thenceforth I am lyre-voiced; Strike me lightly with a little pebble, and carry away witness of my boast.

And so Loeffler has selected as the central point of his luminous and exalted conception this mystical chant of the lyre-voiced Singing-Stone, that chant which was born of the Delphic harp of Phoebus.

The composer has elaborated this gracious and noble symbolism with his customary imaginative fertility and success. There are magical passages in the score, passages unforgettable for their beauty and poetry of musical thought and their ravishing instrumental vesture, as the passage in which the Singing-Stone is evoked—one of the most extraordinary and haunting pages in orchestral literature.

* * *

No doubt the device of allotting the lines of the Singing-Stone to a speaker whose "hushed and mysterious voice" should be heard through the orchestral web of tone, is capable of illusive and poetical realization. This is said to have been accomplished at the original performance in Cleveland under Mr. Sokoloff, when, by an ingenious placing of the speaker and the employment of a small megaphone, the spoken words acquired their essential effect of remoteness and unreality.

This effect was not accomplished yesterday. Mr. McClosky, as the Voice of the Singing Stone, might have been recounting the latest news from Washington or explaining how to derive the best results from your morning Daily Dozen. Nor was the effect of the women's voices enhancing. There was, however, some beautiful playing by the orchestra (it is difficult for the Boston Symphony not to play well), and Mr. Koussevitzky directed the performance with evident devotion and the fullest sympathy.

Mr. Loeffler had come on from his home in Medfield, Massachusetts, to hear the New York première, and he was persuaded to appear on the platform with Mr. Koussevitzky in response to the enthusiastic demonstration of the audience.

* * *

The loftiness of the work, its incantatory charm, triumphed over a performance that was too often pedestrian. This music, radiant, serene, Hellenic, spoke with irresistible effect the thought of a mind which has never forgotten that the ultimate ritual of the spirit is the worship of that loveliness which is outside of time.

---

ap. 8, 1934. N Y Time

AUDIENCE HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Demonstration Greets Boston Conductor at Opening of Carnegie Hall Concert.

COMPOSERS SIGN TRIBUTE

Testimonial Lauds Service to American Music—Loeffler's 'Evocation' Performed.

Public appreciation of courage shown in a trying situation was demonstrated when Serge Koussevitzky came on the stage yesterday afternoon to conduct the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The salutation of the audience in the form of long-continued applause was in part acknowledgment of the brilliant performances that the conductor and the orchestra have given in their New York series this season, but the memory was fresh and vivid of the manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men continued their performance last Thursday night when smoke suddenly appeared over the stage and only the presence of mind of the performers averted a panic. Dr. Koussevitzky had finally to signal the orchestra to rise before the concert could proceed.

The concert offered a novelty in what was listed as the first New York performance of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra, with chorus of women's voices and a speaking voice. The speaker was David Blair McClosky and the chorus was that of the Cecilia Society of Boston. "Evocation" was composed for the opening of Severance Hall, the permanent home of the Clevelnad Orchestra, Feb. 5, 1931. The preface of the composer, printed in the score, is the most concise index to its intentions.

Builds Temple of Muses.

"The imagined form of this music," this preface states, "is to tell the building of a beautiful temple of the muses; of the god Pan's rhapsodic lay and the nymphs' love for him; of their vain endeavors to fetter him to their beloved sunny fields whence Echo is listening, listening for the pure fun of answering; of Syrinx, Pan's most beloved naiad, whom Artemis metamorphosed into a reed to save her from Pan's amorous pursuit; of the strange account given by the Singing Stone of itself; awed by solemn wonder at it, we now seek the little stream running down the hills to meet us, the reeds bowing to us in the breeze. The nymphs are still calling, 'Pan, abide here on these sunny greens.'"

Mr. Loeffler wrote Nikolai Sokololoff, then conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, of his score; of the fugue, out of which grows the one most important theme of the work; of the beginning, intended to suggest "the matter which in confusion marked the beginning of the fine temple of music which the architects had in mind"; of the clarification of the fugue theme and the motive of the Singing Stone which is later referred to in spoken though hushed words from an old Greek epigram; of the song theme of the enticing nymphs, and the transition to the introduction of the lines uttered "in a hushed and mysterious voice"—"Remember me the Singing Stone."

At the end there are reminiscences by chorus and by orchestra, as from far off, of previous themes, with the last words of the epigram.

The audience responded with exceptional warmth to Mr. Loeffler's music, music of extraordinary texture and of fastidious workmanship; music of poetic evocation and an echo, in modern terms, of the classic spirit of the poem that Mr. McClosky recited.

The other compositions of the afternoon were the Handel concerto grosso in B minor and, at the end, the Brahms C minor symphony. Handel's noble and vigorous music was played superbly by the strings. The epic world of Brahms's imagining lost none of its grandeur at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. This familiar and stirring work of monumental proportions came as the worthy capstone of the achievements of orchestra and conductor in New York in the season now coming to an end. Again there was fervent and long-continued applause from the audience.

Testimonial Is Presented.

In the green room back of the stage, after the concert, Dr. Koussevitsky received another testimonial from those who hold him in high honor. He was presented a paper signed with the names of over twenty-five American composers, with other signatures of those interested in American cerative art. The list was considered to constitute the most striking evidence of Dr. Koussevitsky's tireless curiosity and interest in American music, because the composers who signed it were young men and old, conservatives and radicals, all of whom united in thanking the conductor for his labors in the cause of native music. The paper read as follows:

"It is the desire of the undersigned to convey to Dr. Koussevitzky on the completion of his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their appreciation of his interest in and his services to the cause of American music. During his years in Boston he has amply demonstrated his conviction that the musical life and culture of a people cannot answer that people's deepest needs until it has become in the truest sense productive as well as receptive in character. We feel it, therefore, to be fitting at this time to express our admiration for Dr. Koussevitzky's distinguished accomplishment in the interests of American musical development, through the energy, courage, and understanding which he has devoted to the performance of American compositions."

The testimony was signed by the following:

Joseph Achron, Marion Bauer, Nicolai Berezowsky, Ernest Bloch, John Alden Carpenter, Israel Citkowitz, Frederick S. Converse, Aaron Copland, Carl Engel, Arthur Foote, George Gershwin, Rubin Goldmark, Louis Bruenberg, Henry Hadley, Richard Hammond, Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, Edward B. Hill, Werner Josten, Daniel Gregory Mason, Harold Morris, Walter Piston, Carlos Salzedo, Roger Sessions, Alexander Steinert, Randall Thompson, Emerson Whithorne, John Erskine, Alvin Johnson, Alfred A. Knopf, Dorothy Lawton, Minna Lederman, M. D. Herter Norton, W. W. Norton, Claire R. Reis, Paul Rosenfeld, Theodore Steinway and Alma M. Wertheim.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 8 - 1934

Five Concerts by Boston Symphony Next Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a [illegible] of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next season, according to an announcement by Director Charles D. Atkins of the Department of Education, Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The dates for the concerts are as follows: Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6.

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 8 - 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will give the following program this week in Boston: Selections from Beethoven's "Egmont," with Olga Averino, soprano, and Richard Hale, reader; Randall Thompson's Second symphony; Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Charles Stratton, soloist; Lambert's "The Rio Grande," with Jesús María Sanromá as piano soloist and the chorus from the Cecilia Society, and Borodin's Polovetzkian Dances from "Prince Igor."

NEWARK, N. J.

CALL

APR 8 - 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Q.—In order to decide an argument, will you please tell us the name of the organizer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Is he still living? The last point is an important one in the discussion.

A.—Theodore Human, violinist, who died September 18, 1933, in Brooklyn, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FLINT, MICH.

JOURNAL

APR 8 - 1934

The Power of Music to Sooth

Appropriately, it was Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony that was being played by the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert Thursday night in New York when wreaths of smoke appeared floating over the stage.

The danger of a riot was immediately apparent. Several persons leaped from their seats and started to run for the exits.

The first movement of the symphony had just begun. Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, stopped the orchestra. He spoke to the audience and gave assurances that everything was all right. Ushers helped to quiet the hubbub by passing up and down the aisles urging the crowd to remain seated. In a few moments the audience was composed again.

Though the smoke was still pouring onto the stage, Koussevitsky rapped his baton on his stand and led the orchestra through the whole symphony without interruption. During the second movement the smoke abated.

At the close, the applause for the conductor and orchestra was unusually generous and swelled to an ovation. People shouted themselves hoarse. Complimented because he did not change his tempo despite the strain, the conductor is reported to have said, "Tempo is tempo and tranquility is tranquility."

The Tchaikowsky Fifth Symphony is a great public favorite. Though somber, it always has had a profoundly moving effect upon audiences. The exceptional beauty of the theme of the second movement, "andante cantabile," is such that it is one of the most renowned melodies in musical literature—familiar to everyone, though perhaps not recognized by name.

What caused the smoke? Some rubbish in a chute in the subcellar of the building had caught fire, but was under control and did little damage.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 8 - 1934

Music Events of the Week in Brooklyn

A concert this afternoon at the Academy of Music by 26 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will conclude the Sunday afternoon series of lecture-recitals conducted by Olin Downes under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The subject for today's concert is "Music by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra." The program is devoted exclusively to modern music by six composers of whom all but one are still living. The program follows: Octet for Wind Instruments, Igor Stravinsky; "Cymnopedies" (orchestrated by Debussy), Erik Satie; "Music for the Theater," a suite in five parts, by Aaron Copland; Introduction and Allegro, for harp, string quartet, flute, and clarinet, Maurice Ravel; "Kammermusik," No. 1, Paul Hindemith.

The evening series of lecture-recitals by Mr. Downes at the Academy of Music will come to a close next Sunday evening with a performance of "The Combat of Tancredi and Clorinda," the Monteverdi opera which was revived at Smith College a few seasons ago and had one performance by the same group later at the Metropolitan Opera House. A seventeenth century ballet by Lully will complete the program.

Margaret Matzenauer will sing the part of the narrator in the opera, while other participants will be students of the Department of Music of Smith College under the direction of Werner Josten of the faculty. Mme. Matzenauer will also sing a group of early operatic airs. The dances for Lully's ballet, by a student group, will be performed in the style of the period, with music by an orchestra of 42 Smith College students.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 8 - 1934

As Music Goes

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

Great Classics from All Periods of Music Included in Dr. Koussevitzky's Final Boston Symphony Orchestra Program Here

Great classics from all periods of music are on the Boston Symphony's final program for the season Tuesday night. From the older works Dr. Koussevitzky has selected Handel's "Concerto Grosso No. 12." The Brandenburg concerti of Bach and the "Concerti Grossi" of Handel now enjoy a publicity hitherto unknown. Those who make a serious study of these works as they are offered will find their fund of music very much enlarged and enriched. They occupy a place in the literature of the orchestra comparable to that of the oratorios of choral fame and significance. This No. 12 is scored for strings, without the usual brass and woodwind of the small orchestra of those early times. It interests from the genius of its contrapuntal structure and variety. Probably no orchestra may offer more facile and flexible strings nor any conductor more authoritative and classic interpretation than Dr. Koussevitzky, who has been untiring in his efforts in the preparation of these masterpieces for his devoted public.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is now happily an old story with us, and with this increased familiarity one now feels that he may enter into the spirit of this ravishing tone poem and share in the rapture of one of the most choice orchestral expressions of poetic mysticism known to orchestral literature. Should one wish to know the underlying raison d'etre of these moods they are to be found in the incomparable genius of the composer for originality of musical ideas and subject matter, expressed in a tonal and orchestral technique which is equally ingenius and original.

Great "Short Piece"

This one composition, which embodies a large number of emotional phases, is easily one of the greatest "short pieces" of our time. Unusual as are its many tonal changes the divisions of effective musical form are easily discernible in its structure, which saves it from the error of much of the music of our time, the tendency towards musical monotony, even if the components are in themselves enjoyable. We have learned to think of Mr. Laurent's ravishing tone whenever this work is mentioned, a lasting memory and one of the high spots of orchestral exposition in this day and generation. One will perforce note the soft, repeated richness of the horn section in many episodes throughout the work and the indescribable loveliness of the pianissimo passage a very few bars before the end. The upsweeping glissandi of the harp also assist in the woof of this remarkable tone tapestry.

Ravel is undoubtedly our greatest writer in advanced musical thought. We need not compare him with Debussy any more than Bach with Handel, there are so many similarities and yet so many differences. It has been suggested that the suites of "Daphnis and Chloe" are incomplete without the pantomime and ballet. There is, however, enough to be said of the music as a purely orchestral tone poem that and so much to engross the attention that one may instead rejoice that there is no sound of footfall or flash of pirouette to distract the attention. The complexity of Ravel's orchestration is bewildering, the novelty of his contrapuntal variations and orchestral colorings many hardly be understood in years of study of the score or from many hearings. Perhaps when the public has learned the alphabet of these great masters of advanced musical thought it may begin to understand a few phrases and, after a time, to know something of the literature. In the meanwhile we unthinkingly bask in the warm radiance of these tonal fires and instinctively benefit from a refulgence which we feel rather than understand. This work is one of the specialties of this orchestra and conductor and its hearing is a veritable musical experience.

The Tschaikowski Symphony No. 5 is more obvious; it glows with orchestral fires which from our association with the great classics of the past we may follow more understandingly and which we may more readily repeat with our limited means of musical expression. To many this is the finest of all Tschaikowski's symphonies. Surely none surpass it in opportunities for hearing the orchestral groups and their individual voices. Examples of this come to mind in the very first notes of this symphony in which the clarinet in its lowest and richest register gives eloquent speech over soft strings. The clarinet is practically a solo voice throughout the introduction to the symphony. The strings then announce a stately dance in six-eight time. Tschaikowski cannot write for long before his love for contrapuntal embellishments betrays him and these gracefully accompany the waltz time until a motive enters which serves as a link with a movement in syncopation which is one of the most beautiful thoughts in all his symphonies.

Famous Solo.

In the next movement an organ-like figure in close harmony by the strings acts as a preamble for a solo aria from the French horn, which is famous in orchestral literature. The clarinet soon enters and converts the solo into a dialogue until the oboe offers a counter theme. The strings soon take up the beautiful aria, which is repeated a number of times, always in beautiful tonal vesture, leading into a magnificent stretto in tremendous volume suggestive of the opening measures of the symphony. These tonal grandeurs are slowly hushed and the movement ends with the voice of the clarinet.

Did Tschaikowski write only the "valse" of the next movement instead of many he would be entitled to the highest place among "waltz kings." In the final movement the "andante maestese" begins with the initial theme of the symphony played by all the violins. Its massive majesty is almost indescribable, its tonal elaboration most dignified and its effect extremely impressive. From this imposing legato the composer turns to a sharply rhythmic and highly accentuated "allegro vivace" in double time, which suggests the clanging of bells. The symphony closes with a return to the initial theme of the symphony played by the string band accompanied by the woodwind in triplets, a very solid and impressive tonal structure which drives home the theme with tremendous force. The entire symphony is noble and heroic in character. It is one of the greatest compositions of Tschaikowski and one of the most splendid symphonies of the century or even of all time.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 8 - 1934

In The World Of Music . . . . .

—By H. Earle Johnson

THE most notable figure in the entire field of American musical reviewing has passed on. Mr. Henry Taylor Parker, the famous "H. T. P." of the Boston Transcript has held for many years a place of highest honor in the estimation of public and profession, and his writings and attitude toward his profession are examples of that to which the chronicler in all fields of art may well aspire. For thirty years no musical or dramatic event of importance, here or abroad, has escaped his keen eye; he has detected the rising worth of many of the world's greatest artists of the theater and concert stage who, coming to this country for the first time, have found sympathetic and enlightened knowledge of their art already ahead of them tthrough the discerning notice of "H. T. P."

He was especially proud of having helped to start the Harvard Glee Club on its road to fame and has been Boston's last word in contributing to the public understanding of new works of art as well as the fuller appreciation of the world's greatest masterpieces. His integrity was absolute and he respected nothing so much as that quality in others. Sham, pretense, catering to a low standard of public taste, called forth his most scathing denunciation, and "H. T. P." coudl write with a pen of scorching fire when occasion demanded. Above all, personality was completely out of the picture; concert-going was an opportunity to hear great music, not to look at the prima donna's jewels or watch her vocal acrobatics: attendance at the theater was a chance to be entertained within the bounds of good taste and legitimate means of comedy or moved by an author's tragic tale; the exhibition of personality must not be allowed to stand in the way of character portrayal.

* * *

Mr. Parker's routine would be exhausting in any profession. He arose at noon and hastened to his office, "the coop," in that old-world building on Washington Street inhabited since time immemorial by the Transcript. There he read and digested in amazingly quick time an average of ten to fifteen papers each day. There were four New York papers, four London, two Chicago, one French, and one German daily; various magazines and incidental news items from other sources. He edited an entire page every day and two for the Saturday edition. On Monday there was usually an opening at the theater, on Tuesday another play to be review; various concerts and recitals filled the mid-week evenings. During the Winter there were the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; Mr. Parker attended both.

Leaving his office he went to Symphony Hall, gleefully prodding the bruised back of the taxi driver with his immense cane, cautioning haste; arrived, (and always on time) he occupied his two seats alone, foot and cane extended into the isle for the careless passerby to stumble over. Speaking to no one, and spoken to by few, he was brilliantly characterized by Mr. David McCord, as having "the faculty of making his first word sound like his last." "H. T. P." wrote most of the night in his apartment at the Vendome, retiring about four A. M. His writing was always distinguished, often scaling the heights of superb prose; a fine concert or play moved him to raptures which found more glorious expression than has ever been exercised in musical reviewing in this country.

The limitations of space were no drawback to an adequate discussion of an event; Mr. Parker believed that a good concert deserved an extended notice. The Transcript is probably the only newspaper in the country to give unlimited and uncensored space for the covering of news in the world of art; "H. T. P." would have none of the typewriter; he wrote on ruled yellow paper in a hand illegible except to a patient few. Two columns and a half were sometimes required to treat of a new work; sometimes, though rarely, did his space become verbose. Pictures were carefully chosen, and the six or eight word headings were marvels of concentrated wit. He took great pride in the make-up of his page and supervised it jealously; it has been estimated that his output has been the equivalent of over 300 full sized novels.

The writer remembers Mr. Parker's phantom presence at practically every musical event he ever attended in Boston. Always alone in the same seat, looking as though twenty feet would be near enough to approach without danger from the ever-threatening cane, one could never tell whether he was enjoying the concert or profoundly bored. But the same thing always followed: one purchased the paper to see what "H. T. P." thought about the concert, and if thought had been filled with personality it was soon elevated to the higher consideration of the music and a fuller appreciation of its greatness as well as of the interpretation by the artists.

Certainly the body of "H. T. P.'s" writing must be preserved as a valuable commentary on the music and theater of the first third of this century! Some one will carefully select, and edit the works to the furtherance of our own understanding and the credit of their author.

Brooklyn Times Union

APR 9 1934

Boston Symphony Concert At Academy of Music On Friday Evening

Another important series in the musical life of Brooklyn will come to a close next Friday evening with the fifth and final concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 8:30 o'clock. The five concerts, which marked the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees.

For the final concert Dr. Koussevitzky has selected an unusually interesting program of works by Handel, Debussy, d'Indy and Sibelius.

Boxes will be occupied by members of the Brooklyn Junior League, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, the Packer Collegiate Institute and the Woodward School.

A committee of membes of the Sponsoring Committee will receive in the foyer of the opera house preceding the performance.

The program for the final concert will be as follows: Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12, Handel; Prelude a l'Apres—midi d'un Faunem, Debussy; Eclogue, by S. Mallarme; Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42, d'Indy; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Sibelius.

Among members of the Sponsoring Committee who will receive on Friday evening are Mr. and Mrs. Blum, Miss Mary E. Dillon, Dr. and Mrs. C. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Dr. John H. Denbigh and Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols.

⁂

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 9 - 1934

Boston Symphony Group Gives Program of Modern Music At Last Sunday Concert

A program of modern music presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and twenty-six members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music brought to a close the series of fifteen Sunday lecture recitals arranged by Olin Downes, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Works of Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith and Satie were included in the program.

Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, hostesses in the box of the sponsoring committee, entertained as their guests: Mr. and Mrs. Albert Van Wyck, Mr. Thayer and Mr. and Mrs. Howard R. Haviland. Lloyd V. Almirall was host to a box party. Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, chairman of the sponsoring committee and Miss Irene Miles also had box guests.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Butler and Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson received in the foyer preceding the program. They were assisted by the following members of the committee under whose sponsorship the concert series was given:

Dr. and Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Goetze, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Miss Anais Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Eastman, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederick Mackay, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mr. and Mrs. Thayer, Mrs. Schepmoes and Mr. Almirall.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

APR 9 - 1934

SUGGESTED BY THE NEWS.

Serge Koussevitzky, the skilled conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, needs no press agent. But he comes in for a little publicity in a story which credits him with averting a panic in Carnegie hall last week at the final concert of the season. The disturbance was not caused by performance of any of the ultra-modern music, but by eddies of smoke which had drifted into the hall from an incinerator that was working properly. The conductor was equal to the emergency. He calmed the fears of a few hysterical women in the audience and swung into the scheduled piece on the program. It is not the first time that a musician has shown qualities of leadership aside from those which have to do with music.

international arms pacts. How far such a policy is feasible there is hesitation to say. Truth to tell, most wars have their origin in economic rivalries or disputes. There may be risks in using the powers mentioned as punitive weapons. In the last analysis disarmament must be voluntary rather than compulsory.

The payroll in Washington may have been reduced in the matter of dollars and cents, but more employees are frequently added to the list. Only the other day the Senate voted each member an extra clerk for the remainder of the session. And the taxpayer will not be wholly reassured by the statement that the expense will come out of the Senate contigent fund.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

APR 9 - 1934

Boston's Symphony hall, built in 1900 by the late Maj Henry L. Higginson, founder and benefactor of the famous Boston orchestra, has lately been acquired by the corporation which controls the orchestra. Some 4000 shares of stock were issued to subscribers, and through the efforts of Ernest B. Dane and the late Galen L. Stone ownership of the property has now been transferred to the orchestra. It is a coincidence that Dr Koussevitsky, the orchestra's conductor, had to quell a fire scare Thursday night at Carnegie hall, New York, where the Boston orchestra was giving a concert. Any one would tremble to think of a real fire at Carnegie hall, with high balconies difficult of access. New York needs a new concert hall more than it needs a new opera house, but at present must concentrate attention on preserving its Philharmonic orchestra.

145

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

APR 8 - 1934

Final Sunday Afternoon Concert At Brooklyn Academy of Music

One of the most unusual and interesting programs of the entire Brooklyn concert season will bring to a close today the Sunday afternoon series of concerts presented for the first time this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and 26 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the concert which is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees.

A feature of this final concert is that the program is devoted wholly to modern music. Of the five men whose works Olin Downes, the critic, has selected for the program, four are living composers. Mr Downes will discuss "Music by Contemporary Composers for Small Orchestra." One of the composers represented on the program, Aaron Copland, a former Brooklynite, is a principal figure of the rising generation of American creative talent and Dr. Koussevitzky has been responsible for the first presentation of some of his outstanding works. The other composers whose works will be performed today are Stravinsky, Satie, Ravel and Hindemith.

Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes will be the hostesses in the committee box today and will have as box guests Mr. and Mrs. Albert Van Wyck, Mr. Thayer and Mr. and Mrs. Howard R. Haviland. Lloyd V. Almirall is entertaining a party of box guests and Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, chairman of the Sponsoring Committee, and Miss Irene Miles will have box guests.

Mrs. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Blum and Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson will receive with members of the Sponsoring Committee in the foyer of the opera house preceding this afternoon's performance. Director Charles D. Atkins of the institute announces that plans for the 1934-1935 "Enjoyment of Music" series are now under consideration and will be announced shortly.

The program for this afternoon includes the following works: Octet for Wind Instruments, Igor Stravinsky; Gymnopedies, Erik Satie; Music for the Theatre, Aaron Copland; Introduction and Allegro, for harp and string quartet, flute and clarinet, Maurice Ravel; Kammermusik No. 1, Paul Hindemith.

Among the members of the Sponsoring Committee who will serve on the reception committee today are: Dr. and Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Goetze, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Miss Anais Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Eastman, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederick MacKay, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mr. and Mrs. Thayer, Mrs. Schepmoes and Mr. Almirall.

NEW YORK SUN

APR 9 1934

Boston Symphony in Novelty

Charles Martin Loefler's 'Evocation' Played at Final Concert for This Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

There was a novelty on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This was Charles Martin Loefler's "Evocation," for orchestra, with chorus of women and a speaking voice. A new work from the pen of the illustrious musician, who has been an ornament of American art for so many years, was something to be received with thanksgiving. "Evocation" was written for the dedicatory exercises attending the opening of Severance Hall, the new home of the Cleveland Orchestra, on February 5, 1931.

Mr. Loeffler derived his musical thought from some Greek epigrams which speak of Pan and his magical music of Syrin, and of a wondrous singing stone. "Phaebus lifted on his shoulders a stone for the house and laid down on me his Delphic harp; thenceforth I am lyre voiced." Visioning the architectural order that grew slowly in the minds of the designers of the hall, the composer begins his music with a fugue, harmonically vague, but gradually shaping and clarifying till its theme becomes the germ of the work. The fugue is interrupted by the motive of the singing stone. Subsequent music strives to picture the nymphs in Arcady and the revelation of Pan. The words of Greek poets explain how the nymphs loved him. Now the principal theme recurs and leads to the utterance of the singing stone, represented by the speaking voice bidding us to remember. Again we hear the chorus of women's voices calling upon Pan to breathe music. The work concludes with a marvelous decrescendo, the women's voices sinking to a melodious whisper.

The orchestration is remarkable. For the singing stone Mr. Loeffler has used the vibra harp, an instrument related to the xylophone family, but made of metal and having a rotating contrivance which gives the tones a curious throbbing and a mystic quality. Piano, celesta, saxophones and English horn add to the effects produced by mastery treatment of the body of wind instruments and the familiar company of strings. The flute has some ravishing passages in the Debussy style, but with a Greek tonal gamut to represent Syrinx. Exotic scales and elusive harmonization are employed with consummate art.

The futility of all attempts at the description of music was long ago demonstrated. There remains only the feeble declaration that the thematic foundations of the composition are of substance and that the developments are broad, dignified, and compelling in the beauty of their conclusions and in the completeness of their exposition of the germinal ideas. The texture of the music, like that of all the Loeffler creations, is faultlessly fine and rich. The instrumental colors are royal without gaudiness. The style is entirely august and patrician, the idiom of an exquisite artistic nature, steeped in culture.

We do not know of any other musician who could have written this work. It is essentially individual. It is one more disclosure of the fully stored mind and generous heart of a composer who is profoundly a scholar, instinctively aristocratic, a poet and a philosopher, born to dwell through all his life in the sacred shades spread from the Erechtheum. Without ever making concessions to the urge toward popularity, without ever defacing his musical speech with shopworn devices of the market place or shibboleths of party, without parade of pomp or circumstance, he has made for himself a proud and wholly personal place as one of the definitely distinguished writers of his time.

He has held his art in deepest respect and practiced it, not as a merchant, but as a high priest. And today he is recognized as one of the foremost living composers, who has made classic conceptions the basis of a romantic lyricism urbane in its elegance, yet filled with the spirit of Arcadia and the great god Pan.

Mr. Loeffler was present at Saturday's concert and appeared on the stage to receive the applause of audience, orchestra and conductor. There was no room for doubt about the esteem in which he is held. The orchestra rendered unto Loeffler all that was Loeffler's.

The program began with Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, No. 12, in which Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz played the violin parts of the concertino admirably. To conclude the winter's activities Mr. Koussevitzky chose the triumphant paean of the C minor symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

APR 11 1934

-:- MUSIC -:-

LAST CONCERT

There was infinite variety in the program which Dr. Koussevitzky selected for the closing of this season's performances of the Boston Symphony in Providence, which closing was accomplished at the Metropolitan Theatre last night. The variety was not only in musical mood and substance and method; it was in the periods of musical development which were represented.

The program was:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12......Handel
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro
"Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" ....Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme
Orchestra Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" ....Ravel
(Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64 ....Tschaikovsky
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale (Andante maestoso): Allegro vivace.

This representation of several periods of musical history was indubitably interesting. Handel, the classicist "par excellence;" Debussy, the founder of the "neo-classicist" school; Ravel, whose "Bolero" has made him popular in spite of his intricate intellect; and Tchaikovsky, who is not to be tied to any period, but never soars over the best of any period.

Of course the orchestra played beautifully as it always does. The Handel concerto was especially skilfully done, though we missed something of the richness of tone we expected to find. Still, we doubt if there is any group of players who could give at once the sedateness, the sonority and the dignity of that composition as the Boston orchestra did last night.

Frankly we were disappointed in the Debussy number. As we have remarked before, there is some quality in Debussy which does not seem to awaken Dr. Koussevitzky's usually resourceful imagination. On the other hand, Ravel seems to appeal intimately to the great conductor. He played the "Daphnis and Chloe" with a most subtle sense of its tonal values, and of the substance of the legend behind it. Certainly that strange poet, Mallarme, would have enjoyed both the composer's and the orchestra's transfiguration of his work.

Of the Tchaikovsky number, there is no need, to speak. It seemed a little stale last night, but that, we feel, was not the orchestra's fault. The Fifth Symphony, after several hearings, makes almost everyone a little weary—too much plain Slavic desolation in it.

X. Y. Z.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 8 - 1934

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Close Providence Season

Final Concert to Be Given Tuesday Night at Metropolitan Theatre.—Works By Tschaikowsky, Debussy, Handel and Ravel to Be Played

On Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close its Providence season with its fourth concert here. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. He has placed Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in the closing position, which will make the second week in succession that Providence concertgoers have heard a symphony from that composer. The Providence Symphony Orchestra gave Tschaikowski's Fourth last week. Other works to be played by the Bostonians are Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and orchestral fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, will lecture on the program this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library. The lecture, which is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, is free to the public.

Tonight Beatrice Ward and Paul Vellucci will be presented by the Federal Hill House School of Music in a two-pianoforte program at Federal Hill House to which the public is invited. Mr. Vellucci, formerly of this city, has been for the past six years affiliated with the music department of Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, N. Y., and has devoted some time to settlement music work in New York. He has appeared several times in recital in this city, Boston and Bronxville. Both he and Miss Ward are students with Avis Bliven Charbonnel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

The Conning Tower

It is pointed out by R. R. C. that when Mr. Koussevitzky averted the panic at Carnegie Hall the other night, he should have told the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" and "Blow the Smoke Away." And in yesterday's papers there was the account of the St. Paul's School Alumni meeting. The Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, rector of the school, said "The great problem of education today is to prepare people for leisure." Traditional anthems and hymns of the school, the story said, were sung. Including, perhaps, "On the other side of Jordan . . . there is rest for you."

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

APR 9 - 1934

Music

Koussevitzky Conducts Modern Program

Serge Koussevitzky led 26 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in a program of modern music in the 14th and final Sunday afternoon lecture-recital conducted by Olin Downes at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. An audience of good size, though not so large as the interest of the event might warrant, listened with polite attention and sometimes with enthusiasm to music ranging from what was called revolutionary at the turn of the century to truly "modern" works written during the last decade by outstanding composers of today.

The program appropriately began with Igor Stravinsky's Octet for wind instruments, a work written in 1923, which Mr. Downes described as in many respects the model followed by other contemporary composers. Whatever one may think of its objectivity, its lack of tone color and emotion, and its modernistic contrapuntal harmonic scheme, it remains a piece of unique and arresting individuality. Needless to say it was superlatively played by the Boston musicians, each of whom displayed the virtuosity of a soloist.

Erik Satie's earlier example of a changing style in musical concepts was the "Gymnopedies," which followed, in Debussy's orchestral arrangement. This was one of the afternoon's offerings which obviously pleased the audience, which applauded conductor and musicians with enthusiasm at its conclusion.

Aaron Copland, a native of Brooklyn, was represented with his "Music for the Theater," written in 1924 and first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky the following year. Its interesting use of American jazz as an idiom of expression, and the sharply contrasting moods of gayety, burlesque, and romanticism in the various movements make it one of the representative works by the younger American composers of today. Mr. Copland was present and acknowledged the applause of the audience.

Ravel's beautiful Introduction and Allegro for harp with string quartet, flute and clarinet, with B. Zighera playing the harp solo in masterly fashion, again afforded the more conservative element in the audience relief from the dissonance and acrid tension and clamor of much that had gone before. Composed in 1906, when Ravel was a devotee of the impressionistic school founded by Debussy, it is a far cry from the later works of the French composer. It pleased the audience enormously, and the conductor and soloist were recalled several times.

Hindemith's "Kammermusik No. 1," very essentially of today with its atonality so characteristic of the composer and its cynical disregard of established conceptions of musical composition, completed the list. Despite the savagery of many pages in the score the poetic interlude in the third movement for flute, clarinet, bassoon and glockenspiel once more afforded a glimpse of beauty in a generally stark and uncompromising picture of post-war reality.

R. E. B.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

146

APR 11 1934

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays to Largest Audience in Its History Here.—Dr. Koussevitzky and Men Given Ovation.—Music of All Periods Presented

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its all too brief course of concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre last night before a capacity audience. Each time this orchestra plays here it seems to open new vistas of musical wonders of technical perfection and the highest possible degree of musical artistry. Whether it plays the old masters, the most difficult and abstruse of the moderns or well known classics, the work is always in the highest ideals of projection and interpretation.

Although this program began with an "old master," it contained far more than the usual proportion of modernism, all of it of the highest musical order. Among contemporaneous writers no names stand higher in musical invention, in mastery of orchestration and in value of material than Debussy and Ravel. No composition may in short compass exhibit a larger plentitude of the incomparable idiom of Debussy than his musical interpretation of Mallarme's exquisite poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and, by the same token, one could not find any composition by Ravel that would better show the wealth of imagination of his musical mind or his skill in original and colorful orchestration than the "Daphnis and Chloe" fragments. They are not only "good moderns" but they are also our very best moderns. From them and from these two compositions, imitative writers have helped themselves most plentifully, and in many cases they have hardly been able even to copy correctly. At no time do they show any elaboration or extension of technique or musical substance.

In the "Concerto Grosso No. 12," Dr. Koussevitzky and his string choir brought that perfection of artistry which we have learned to expect whenever he and they offer Bach or Handel. Consider the evenness and beauty of its soft passages, compared with the solid sonorities of the upswelling fortes. Note the perfection of the unity of ensemble in rapid scale passages and, if you will, compare it with the blur that is sometimes heard even from noted orchestras. It is such comparison that brings us to a realization of the true greatness of this orchestra.

After a brief sojourn in the chaste classic confines of strict counterpoint, glowing and vibrant from the hands of an impassioned and artistic conductor with instantly responsive men, one may turn to the exquisite Debussy in the prime of his compositional greatness. After the breadth of sonorities of the string band, the entrance of the solo flute is most effective and potent. The influence of the flute is felt throughout this beautiful work and the ravishing tone of Mr. Laurent contributes in no small measure to its success. He is as firmly identified with "L'apres Midi" as was Georges Longy with Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony"—a distinct addition to the tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and what will prove to be an enduring memory.

This tone poem, a veritable study in tone quality supported by virtuosi who has not only acquired perfection of technical facility but who appreciate to an unusual degree our admiration for the tonal beauty and characteristic speech of their several instruments. From a maze of kaleidoscopic and ever-changing tone colors, one recalls the effectiveness of the muted horns, the shimmering of glistening strings, the artistry of delicate dynamic values of the harps, the subdued and mystical subtlety which Dr. Koussevitzky, through his directional control, brings to the performance, making it ideal among orchestral productions. No orchestra of which we know gives it more poetic appeal. From no hands does one hear a more imaginative and truly inspired version, nor do we expect those who had the tradition of the work direct from Debussy himself.

In like manner did the orchestra respond to the finenesses of Ravel's inimitable "Daphnis and Chloe," another of the great masterpieces of our time. Dr. Koussevitzky's sound understanding of this intricate and polychrome composition and the consummate technique and artistry of his men made this production most interesting and enjoyable. It has been said that the ballet and pantomime are necessary to accomplish interest and understanding yet it might seem that it is entirely successful as a concertpiece. It may be that when one has exhausted all the possibilities of the score he may feel the need of the spectacle, yet we venture to claim that very considerable study and many rehearings must elapse before this advanced state of cerebration is attained. It is a work of great genius, it is one of the great show pieces of this superb orchestra and one would gladly hear it often.

Then to the more staid and stately measures of Tchaikovsky. The songful clarinet rather than the flute claimed the attention. The music became more obvious, more in the musical language that we know better, a music far more impressive in tonal sonorities, in massive potentialities and tonal contrasts. In this symphony the splendid brass section of the orchestra found more positive expression than in previous parts of the concert. Note here clever method of program making, the orchestra de t-ing in a blaze of tonal glory, as it w for grandeurs have always been considered a fitting end for a concert a doubly so for a season. Soft music fo solemnities, crashing concords for the end of a season.

Again one heard with great satisfaction beautiful and justly famous solo for French horn with its graceful sinuous investment of other instruments, each choir in tonal beauty and in perfection of technical expression. One's admiration of this magnificent symphony must pay tribute to the masterful conductor, the artistic devotion of the men and the splendor of the musical mind which minted this, one of the greatest of all symphonies.

This was the largest audience that has ever attended a symphony concert in this city. It was also the most enthusiastic and applausive, according Dr. Koussevitzky and his men a veritable ovation. It was with difficulty that the audience restrained itself from applause between the movements of the symphony, so close was the attention, so ardent the appreciation.

So the Boston Symphony Orchestra concludes one of the most successful seasons it has ever brought to this city. Its regretted departure warns of the long season of musical aridity which inevitably accompanies the vacation time. It seems always to come at a time when one has that leisure conducive to the greatest enjoyment. During this hiatus one may profitably review the musical offerings of the past season, a reflection which will bring a more complete appreciation of the good things it has given us and which will surely sharpen our anticipation of its return.

The program:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro
"Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune", Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" .... Ravel
(Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64
Tschaikovsky
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale (Andante maestoso): Allegro vivace.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

1934

Boston Programs.

The current concert calendar in Boston is token that the musical season is waning. The opera stars have departed after what appears to have been a successful week's stay. The Monte Carlo Russian Ballet opening on Monday of this week, lasts through Thursday evening.

This evening in Symphony hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its promised program for the benefit of the emergency fund. Dr. Koussevitzky has managed to keep the details of the program a sec save for the intimation that it will be a light and entertaining one.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra program will include Beethoven's incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont," with Olga Averino as singer and Richard Hale to recite part of the text. The purely orchestral numbers will be Randell Thompson's Second Symphony, for the first time in Boston; Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept;" Lambert's "The Rio Grande," and the Dances from "Prince Igor." The Cecilia chorus will assist.

SYMPHONY COMMENDED FOR DIVERTING PANIC

Boston Orchestra Played as Smoke Filled New York Hall

A letter of tribute, signed by Bentley W. Warren in behalf of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was read to the assembled musicians at rehearsal yesterday. The letter referred to the episode in Carnegie Hall, New York, last Thursday evening when the orchestra and conductor played steadily for 25 minutes, diverting a probable panic as smoke poured into the auditorium.

The text of the letter follows:

To Dr. Koussevitzky and all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Gentlemen:

"Playing with fire" has more than one meaning. Sometimes it is a dangerous pastime. As we know it through you, it sets the spirit aflame.

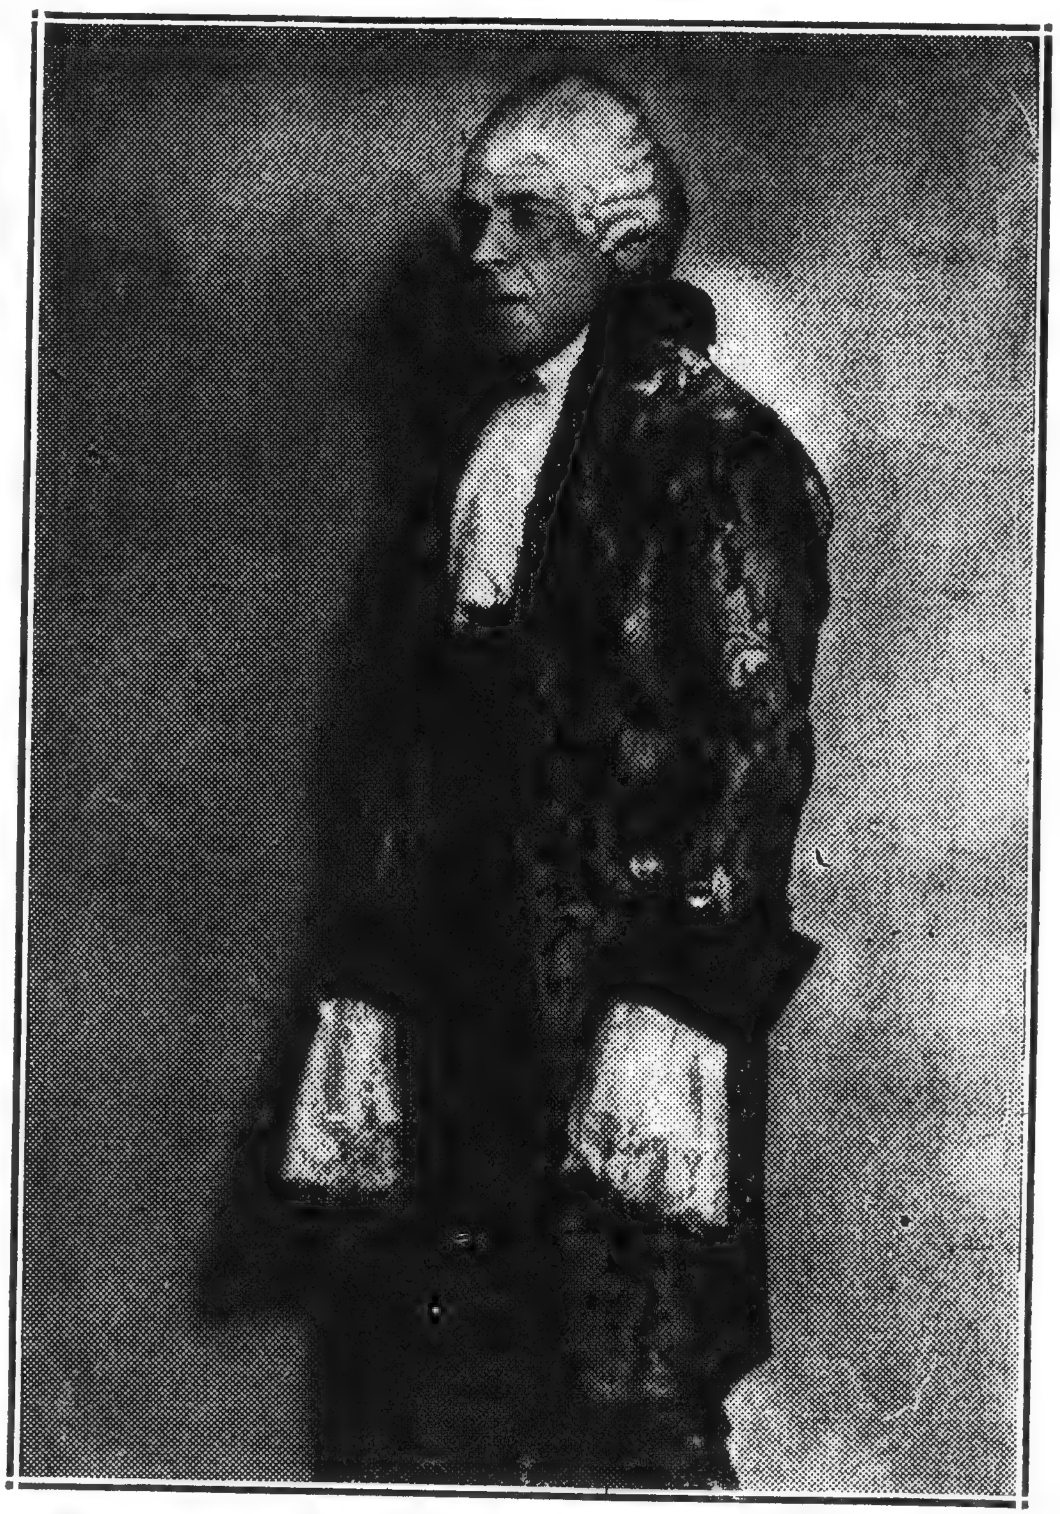
"Playing against fire" is another thing. This requires the courage and self-mastery of well-trained and well-led troops. The trustees have heard with pride of the manner in which the conductor and the orchestra met an emergency of fire and possibly great danger to a New York audience last week. May we express to each and all concerned in that emergency our warmest appreciation of the credit they brought to the orchestra through a continued offering of men and music of the first order?

Faithfully yours,
BENTLEY F. WARREN
(For the Trustees)

BOSTON SYMPHONY SURPRISES AUDIENCE

Apr 11 Globe

Koussevitzky Keeps Program Secret Until End of Concert



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, DRESSED IN COSTUME HE WORE AT CONCERT

Mystery prevailed right down to the moment of beginning at the concert given in Symphony Hall last evening by the Boston Symphoy Orchestra for the benefit of the Emergency Relief Campaign. Even the program of what was to come was missing from a printed folder containing a portrait of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and a list of sponsors for the occasion. In its place was a marginal strip informing that: "Following the concert there will be handed to you a page revealing the complete program. . . ."

The stage was shrouded by heavy red curtains. Only one clew was present, a rectangular expanse of white cloth—obviously a screen for projected pictures—high in front of the curtain. At about 8:45 out went the lights and upon the screen was flashed: "Papa Haydn and His Orchestra."

The parted curtains revealed a small chamber orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky in front, all dressed in attire of the 18th century. Dr Koussevitzky was resplendent in a gleaming white wig, black satin trousers, and a beautifully brocaded bronze-colored coat, with lace stock and cuffs. At a distance of one-third the length of Symphony Hall the conductor bore startling resemblance to familiar portraits of Haydn.

Candles on Racks

Lighted candles were placed upon the music racks before the players, and Dr Koussevitzky's orchestral score stood upon the music stand of what appeared to be an old clavichord or an early—and tiny—square piano.

Then Dr Koussevitzky began Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. The players arose singly and in small groups as their parts were finished, blew out the candles upon their music stands, and departed. At the end only Dr Koussevitzky was left upon a darkened stage.

Making a jump of 150 years, Dr Koussevitzky and an even smaller band next appeared, this time in modern evening dress, to play "Daniel Jazz," by Louis Gruenberg to a text by Vachel Lindsey. The text was sung by Colin O'More, tenor.

Just before the third number, Dr Koussevitzky appeared before the red curtain, leading by the hand little Susan Godoy who, he said, would be soloist in the forthcoming piece. This music, he added, consisted of variations by five great composers. It had never before been publicly played. While the orchestra performed the variations, continued the conductor, Miss Susan would canstantly play the theme upon a piano. And this she did, through many changes of tempo and rhythm. The composers who collaborated upon this work, described in the program as "Tati, Tati, Paraphrases on a Child's Theme," were Rimsky-Korsakov, Cui, Liadov, Borodin and Liszt. Their work was transcribed for orchestra by Nicolai Tcherepnin.

More Surprises

Perhaps the biggest surprises came after intermission, when Dr Koussevitzky stepped upon the podium in front of a fully assembled orchestra. He raised his baton, lowered it and faced the audience.

"I think the orchestra is now so wonderful a conductor is not needed. Instead, I'll play the double-bass."

So he borrowed an instrument from one of the double-bass players, and fingered his part exuberantly through a conductorless performance of the overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart.

Then another double-bass was placed near the conductor's stand. All must have thought that Dr Koussevitzky would break a silence of some years as soloist. But no—

"I cannot play," bowing and smiling, "but that I promise you for next season. But I have here a very fine player of the double-bass, Ludwig Juht, who comes from Estonia. He will play two parts of my own composition for double-bass and orchestra. You know, I have never been able to hear my piece before. Always have I either played it or accompanied it. So I shall listen to it as a composer. I have a very good accompanist, Mr Burgin, who will make accompaniment for Mr Juht."

Johann Strauss' waltz "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" came as an encore for full orchestra. The overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" brought the evening's fun to an end.

The hall was jammed by an audience turned out in showy and costly best. The Symphony Hall management issued the following statement regarding receipts for the concert:

"The net proceeds are reported to amount to more than $17,500. This sum is derived from the sale of tickets, from many donations, and to the extent of $10,000 it represents an anonymous gift through this benefit concert for the purposes of the Emergency Campaign. Additional proceeds may be available on final accounting."

Apr. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents 'Mystery Concert' for Charity

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Concert for the Boston Emergency Campaign

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

When Dr. Koussevitzky conceived the idea of giving a concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra for the benefit of the emergency relief campaign, he had hopes of great financial success. Last night at Symphony hall the plan became a reality. The generosity of Dr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues brought a tremendous response on the part of the Boston public. Receipts at last night's concert will give the charity concerned a net sum of more than $17,500.

Dr. Koussevitzky was the lion of the evening, a lion with a different purpose than those who confronted Daniel in the "Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg. Our Boston lion, in his happiest mood, was last night the direct cause of dispersing a whole flock of fears: hunger, weariness, despondency, from the door of many a troubled home in this city. How can one find enough praise for such citizenship? The evening had an air of gaiety, under which, those who knew realized that what Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had planned for the audience was a labor of love. In the midst of a crowded schedule, as an extremely active season draws to a close, these artists found the time and energy to prepare a different type of program than that usually presented at these concerts, and to do it in their own inimitable fashion.

When the curtains parted for the first number—the program had been kept secret—Dr. Koussevitzky and certain members of the orchestra were revealed properly costumed as Papa Haydn and his orchestra. They played Haydn's Farewell Symphony, in which one player after another left the stage, leaving Papa Haydn alone and unconscious of their departure. To his other gifts Boston last night added an appreciation of decided histrionic talent on the part of the conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky was his own master of ceremonies, improvising apt and witty speeches of just the right length.

Once upon a time, a group of composers—Borodin, Cui, Liadow, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt—wrote a series of variations for two pianos (if our memory is correct) on "Chop Sticks." This theme, familiar to every child of recent generations, is also known as "Tati Tati." Last night, with the assistance of Susan Godoy, who played the theme with remarkable poise, the orchestra played the Tscherepnin orchestral transcription of these variations. It looks like an easy task, but a "tune detective" might compare it (the piano part) with the mesmeric difficulties of the drum part in Ravel's "Bolero."

The concert began at a later hour than usual. Waits between numbers only served to whet the appetite for the succeeding mystery.

One especially interesting feature was the playing by Ludwig Jub of a concerto for double-bass, written by Serge Koussevitzky. This work shows that we have in our conductor, a composer to be reckoned with. It reflects the amazing mastery of the double-bass that astonished many an audience in Europe before this same Koussevitzky became a conductor. It treats the instrument with the most interesting and flexible sonarities and is a warm-blooded work with much melodic charm.

Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was played sans conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky taking his place among the double-bass players. In the Gruenberg "Daniel Jazz" the difficult solo part was done with great effectiveness by Colin O'More.

The Blue Danube and the Overture to Tannhauser brought this unique program to a close.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra added new laurels to their crown, that of simply and beautifully expressed human kindness.

Ballet Russe Reviews On Page 33

Distinguished Audience Hears Unusual Symphony Concert

Prominent Patronesses, Headed by Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Receive Many Congratulations on Success of Their Efforts

By MARION LYNDON

There are surprises in store for all. One of them is to hear the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra play chopsticks. Such happened last evening at Symphony hall at the Mystery concert in aid of the Boston emergency campaign. To be sure it was called "paraphrases on a child's theme for the piano freely transcribed for orchestra," but the impression remained the same.

The opening number was a lovely thing, Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" with the orchestra in costume with Mr. Koussevitzky resplendent in coat of black and gold brocade with white wig and red heeled slippers with silver buckles. The only illumination was candle light. Then one by one the musicians blew out their candles and so quietly left the stage until only the conductor remained. In one number Mr. Koussevitzky announced that the orchestra played so perfectly that the it could get along without him so he took his place among the players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 22 1934

"PAPA HAYDN" VISITS BOSTON: SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

as He Appeared When He Conducted the Composer's "Farewell Symphony" at a Concert Given in Symphony Hall in Boston for the Benefit of the Boston Emergency Relief Fund.

SURPRISES ENJOYED AT SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's "Mystery" Concert Brings Over $17,500

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Topsy-turvydom reigned at Symphony Hall last evening on the occasion of the "Surprise Concert" given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Boston Emergency Relief Campaign of 1934.

It may be said here that the amount realized through tickets and subscriptions was in excess of $17,500.

PROGRAMMES AT END

Not until the audience was leaving the hall were the printed programmes of the evening's entertainment distributed. But prior to that, thanks to a stereoptican and to Dr. Koussevitzky as master of ceremonies, the audience was kept informed regarding most of what went on.

It was told at the outset, through the medium of the lantern, that it would behold "Papa Haydn and his orchestra." The curtains parted and there sat a band of some 20 men in the 18th century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky standing before a harpsichord as their director. The conductor alone had powdered hair; the others were properly bewigged.

At each man's desk was a candle, and during the playing of the last movement of the piece which ensued these candles were extinguished one by one as the players feigning exhaustion, left the stage. For this was Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, designed, it is said, so to soften the heart of Prince Esterhazy that he would permit the musicians of his court to take a well-earned holiday.

Koussevitzky at Double Bass

Mr. Martino's Eighteenth Century Orchestra has thus presented he "Farewell Symphony." The really unusual and unexpected began to happen later in the evening when Dr. Koussevitzky took his place among the orchestra's double basses while the band, unconducted, performed Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

On several occasions Dr. Koussevitzky has played in Symphony Hall his own Concerto for the Double Bass. Last evening it was heard here for the first time with orchestral accompaniment, but not with Dr. Koussevitzky as soloist. Instead, the conductor now sat among the audience. Mr. Burgin conducted, and the soloist was an Estonian bass-violist, Ludwig Juht. As planned encore the orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitzky, then played for the first time under his direction the "Blue Danube" Waltz of Johann Strauss.

"Chopsticks" Variations

The final number on the programme was the Overture to "Tannhauser." The second and third had been unconventional. After Haydn's Symphony Colin O'More, tenor, sang to an accompaniment of eight instruments, Louis Gruenberg's diverting "The Daniel Jazz," as he had once sung it at Jordan Hall in a chamber concert directed by Arthur Fiedler. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

The following piece offered one of the most diverting incidents of the evening; for the first time anywhere was performed Nicolai Tcherepnin's transcription for piano and orchestra of the Variations on "Chopsticks," composed jointly by Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt. The pianist, elaborately introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, was little Susan Godoy, pupil of Mr. Sanroma. Over and over again, but with suitable inflection and emphasis, Miss Godoy played her "Chopsticks" while the orchestra, in its varied colors and sometimes in close to its full strength, accompanied her.

Symphony Hall is indeed the home of ingenuity, and that gift was brilliantly exercised last evening. In the bewildering succession of surprises one almost forgot to note that the performances, orchestral and indivdual, were of the high order that we expect of the Symphony Orchestra, its conductor and its assisting artists. An amused and appreciative audience filled nearly every seat.

Symphony Mystery Concert

apr 12 — Trav

Program in Aid of Relief Drive Delightful Surprise

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a vastly entertaining "surprise" concert in Symphony hall last evening as their gift to the Boston emergency relief campaign. Perhaps never before has a concert of this exact type been given in Boston.

The program was faithfully kept a secret. Even the pamphlets handed one at the door had a blank in them and merely the information that a complete program would be distributed at conclusion. Curtains draped and covered the platform. Until they moved apart, not one of the audience that completely filled the hall, knew what was to come.

On a white screen above the curtained stage were projected the words "Papa Haydn and his orchestra." The curtains parted and disclosed the Boston symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky in costume, elaborate brocaded material, knee breeches, wigs, and all that went with dress in the latter part of the 17th century. There were some 20 or more players. Haydn was master of a band of 16 musicians for a considerable time until his patron died in 1790.

They began the first movement, allegro assai, of Haydn's symphony No. 45, the so-called "Farewell" symphony. For the entire first movement Dr. Koussevitzky stood before what in Haydn's day was called a clavier and is now spoken of as a clavichord or harpsichord. For the second movement he sat down at the clavier; stood for the third and fourth. Near the end of the fourth the audience was amazed to see a musician stop playing, blow out the candle lighting his score, arise and nonchalantly walk off the stage. One after another others followed until at the sounding of the last note the conductor was left alone.

Nothing like that had ever before taken place with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The applause was tremendous. The white-wigged conductor bowed with pleasure and grinned delightedly.

So it went throughout the evening. Next came a performance of Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," after the poem by Vachel Lindsay. A jazz band of eight instruments and a tenor voice, supplied humorously by Colin O'More, made up the picture.

Later a little curly-haired young lady, Susan Godoy by name, came out with Dr. Koussevitzky and acted as piano soloist in the first performance of Tcherepnin's free transcription for orchestra of "Tati Tati," paraphrases on a child's theme for piano by Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt. Throughout she showed a fine sense of tempo and acted well her part of falling asleep in the middle of the piece.

After intermission the entire orchestra assembled again. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked they could get along without him, walked down, took up a base violin and played to the intense joy of everyone. The piece was Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

Then he stated Ludwig Juht was to be the bass soloist in his, Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass and that he as composer would sit among the audience while Richard Burgin, concert master, conducted. He did, and his work was received with great applause. To many it was a revelation of the musical qualities within the bass violin.

As encores and fitting close to a most entertaining evening, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed magnificently Strauss's "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

W. T. Q. Jr.

---

u for next
very fine
, Ludwig
tonia. He own com-
nd orches-
ever been . Always r accom-n to it as very good who will
Mr Juht."
"By the ame as an
The over-nnhaeuser"
to an end.
y an audi-
and costly
l managestatement concert:
eported to
,500. This e sale of ons, and to presents an his benefit es of the Additional
e on final

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents 'Mystery Concert' for Charity

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Concert for the Boston Emergency Campaign

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

When Dr. Koussevitzky conceived the idea of giving a concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra for the benefit of the emergency relief campaign, he had hopes of great financial success. Last night at Symphony hall the plan became a reality. The generosity of Dr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues brought a tremendous response on the part of the Boston public. Receipts at last night's concert will give the charity concerned a net sum of more than $17,500.

Dr. Koussevitzky was the lion of the evening, a lion with a different purpose than those who confronted Daniel in the "Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg. Our Boston lion, in his happiest mood, was last night the direct cause of dispersing a whole flock of fears: hunger, weariness, despondency, from the door of many a troubled home in this city. How can one find enough praise for such citizenship? The evening had an air of gaiety, under which, those who knew realized that what Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had planned for the audience was a labor of love. In the midst of a crowded schedule, as an extremely active season draws to a close, these artists found the time and energy to prepare a different type of program than that usually presented at these concerts, and to do it in their own inimitable fashion.

When the curtains parted for the first number—the program had been kept secret—Dr. Koussevitzky and certain members of the orchestra were revealed properly costumed as Papa Haydn and his orchestra. They played Haydn's Farewell Symphony, in which one player after another left the stage, leaving Papa Haydn alone and unconscious of their departure. To his other gifts Boston last night added an appreciation of decided histrionic talent on the part of the conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky was his own master of ceremonies, improvising apt and witty speeches of just the right length.

Once upon a time, a group of composers—Borodin, Cui, Liadow, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt—wrote a series of variations for two pianos (if our memory is correct) on "Chop Sticks." This theme, familiar to every child of recent generations, is also known as "Tati Tati." Last night, with the assistance of Susan Godoy, who played the theme with remarkable poise, the orchestra played the Tscherepnin orchestral transcription of these variations. It looks like an easy task, but a "tune detective" might compare it (the piano part) with the mesmeric difficulties of the drum part in Ravel's "Bolero."

Ballet Russe Reviews On Page 33

The concert began at a later hour than usual. Waits between numbers only served to whet the appetite for the succeeding mystery.

One especially interesting feature was the playing by Ludwig Jub of a concerto for double-bass, written by Serge Koussevitzky. This work shows that we have in our conductor, a composer to be reckoned with. It reflects the amazing mastery of the double-bass that astonished many an audience in Europe before this same Koussevitzky became a conductor. It treats the instrument with the most interesting and flexible sonarities and is a warm-blooded work with much melodic charm.

Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was played sans conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky taking his place among the double-bass players. In the Gruenberg "Daniel Jazz" the difficult solo part was done with great effectiveness by Colin O'More.

The Blue Danube and the Overture to Tannhauser brought this unique program to a close.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra added new laurels to their crown, that of simply and beautifully expressed human kindness.

Distinguished Audience Hears Unusual Symphony Concert

Prominent Patronesses, Headed by Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Receive Many Congratulations on Success of Their Efforts

By MARION LYNDON

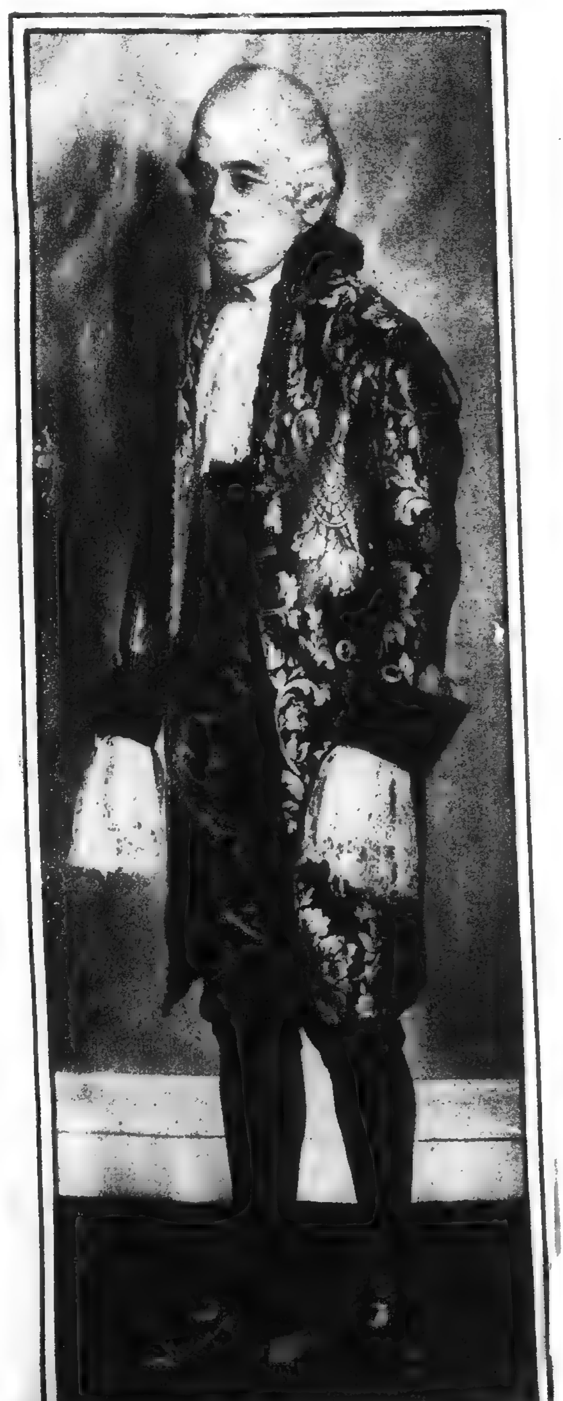
There are surprises in store for all. One of them is to hear the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra play chopsticks. Such happened last evening at Symphony hall at the Mystery concert in aid of the Boston emergency campaign. To be sure it was called "paraphrases on a child's theme for the piano freely transcribed for orchestra," but the impression remained the same.

The opening number was a lovely thing, Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" with the orchestra in costume with Mr. Koussevitzky resplendent in coat of black and gold brocade with white wig and red heeled slippers with silver buckles. The only illumination was candle light. Then one by one the musicians blew out their candles and so quietly left the stage until only the conductor remained. In one number Mr. Koussevitzky announced that the orchestra played so perfectly that the it could get along without him so he took his place among the players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 22 1934



"PAPA HAYDN" VISITS BOSTON: SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

as He Appeared When He Conducted the Composer's "Farewell Symphony" at a Concert Given in Symphony Hall in Boston for the Benefit of the Boston Emergency Relief Fund.

SURPRISES ENJOYED AT SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's "Mystery" Concert Brings Over $17,500

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Topsy-turvydom reigned at Symphony Hall last evening on the occasion of the "Surprise Concert" given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Boston Emergency Relief Campaign of 1934.

It may be said here that the amount realized through tickets and subscriptions was in excess of $17,500.

PROGRAMMES AT END

Not until the audience was leaving the hall were the printed programmes of the evening's entertainment distributed. But prior to that, thanks to a stereoptican and to Dr. Koussevitzky as master of ceremonies, the audience was kept informed regarding most of what went on.

It was told at the outset, through the medium of the lantern, that it would behold "Papa Haydn and his orchestra." The curtains parted and there sat a band of some 20 men in the 18th century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky standing before a harpsichord as their director. The conductor alone had powdered hair; the others were properly bewigged.

At each man's desk was a candle, and during the playing of the last movement of the piece which ensued these candles were extinguished one by one as the players feigning exhaustion, left the stage. For this was Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, designed, it is said, so to soften the heart of Prince Esterhazy that he would permit the musicians of his court to take a well-earned holiday.

Koussevitzky at Double Bass

Mr. Martino's Eighteenth Century Orchestra has thus presented he "Farewell Symphony." The really unusual and unexpected began to happen later in the evening when Dr. Koussevitzky took his place among the orchestra's double basses while the band, unconducted, performed Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

On several occasions Dr. Koussevitzky has played in Symphony Hall his own Concerto for the Double Bass. Last evening it was heard here for the first time with orchestral accompaniment, but not with Dr. Koussevitzky as soloist. Instead, the conductor now sat among the audience. Mr. Burgin conducted, and the soloist was an Estonian bass-violist, Ludwig Juht. As planned encore the orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitzky, then played for the first time under his direction the "Blue Danube" Waltz of Johann Strauss.

"Chopsticks" Variations

The final number on the programme was the Overture to "Tannhauser." The second and third had been unconventional. After Haydn's Symphony Colin O'More, tenor, sang to an accompaniment of eight instruments, Louis Gruenberg's diverting "The Daniel Jazz," as he had once sung it at Jordan Hall in a chamber concert directed by Arthur Fiedler. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

The following piece offered one of the most diverting incidents of the evening; for the first time anywhere was performed Nicolai Tcherepnin's transcription for piano and orchestra of the Variations on "Chopsticks" composed jointly by Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt. The pianist, elaborately introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, was little Susan Godoy, pupil of Mr. Sanroma. Over and over again, but with suitable inflection and emphasis, Miss Godoy played her "Chopsticks" while the orchestra, in its varied colors and sometimes in close to its full strength, accompanied her.

Symphony Hall is indeed the home of ingenuity, and that gift was brilliantly exercised last evening. In the bewildering succession of surprises one almost forgot to note that the performances, orchestral and indivdual, were of the high order that we expect of the Symphony Orchestra, its conductor and its assisting artists. An amused and appreciative audience filled nearly every seat.

every inch of waist ...

Symphony Mystery Concert

Program in Aid of Relief Drive Delightful Surprise

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a vastly entertaining "surprise" concert in Symphony hall last evening as their gift to the Boston emergency relief campaign. Perhaps never before has a concert of this exact type been given in Boston.

The program was faithfully kept a secret. Even the pamphlets handed one at the door had a blank in them and merely the information that a complete program would be distributed at conclusion. Curtains draped and covered the platform. Until they moved apart, not one of the audience that completely filled the hall, knew what was to come.

On a white screen above the curtained stage were projected the words "Papa Haydn and his orchestra." The curtains parted and disclosed the Boston symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky in costume, elaborate brocaded material, knee breeches, wigs, and all that went with dress in the latter part of the 17th century. There were some 20 or more players. Haydn was master of a band of 16 musicians for a considerable time until his patron died in 1790.

They began the first movement, allegro assai, of Haydn's symphony No. 45, the so-called "Farewell" symphony. For the entire first movement Dr. Koussevitzky stood before what in Haydn's day was called a clavier and is now spoken of as a clavichord or harpsichord. For the second movement he sat down at the clavier; stood for the third and fourth. Near the end of the fourth the audience was amazed to see a musician stop playing, blow out the candle lighting his score, arise and nonchalantly walk off the stage. One after another others followed until at the sounding of the last note the conductor was left alone.

Nothing like that had ever before taken place with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The applause was tremendous. The white-wigged conductor bowed with pleasure and grinned delightedly.

So it went throughout the evening. Next came a performance of Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," after the poem by Vachel Lindsay. A jazz band of eight instruments and a tenor voice, supplied humorously by Colin O'More, made up the picture.

Later a little curly-haired young lady, Susan Godoy by name, came out with Dr. Koussevitzky and acted as piano soloist in the first performance of Tcherepnin's free transcription for orchestra of "Tati Tati," paraphrases on a child's theme for piano by Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt. Throughout she showed a fine sense of tempo and acted well her part of falling asleep in the middle of the piece.

After intermission the entire orchestra assembled again. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked they could get along without him, walked down, took up a base violin and played to the intense joy of everyone. The piece was Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

Then he stated Ludwig Juht was to be the bass soloist in his: Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass and that he as composer would sit among the audience while Richard Burgin, concert master, conducted. He did, and his work was received with great applause. To many it was a revelation of the musical qualities within the bass violin.

As encores and fitting close to a most entertaining evening, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed magnificently Strauss's "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

W. T. Q. Jr.

---

u for next
very fine s, Ludwig tonia. He own com-
nd orches-
ever been re. Always or accom-
n to it as very good who will
Mr Juht."
"By the ame as an
The over-nnhaeuser"
to an end.
y an audi-
and costly
l managestatement concert:
reported to
,500. This e sale of ons, and to presents an his benefit es of the Additional
e on final

148 TRANS ARKIE

An American Composer for Symphony Hall

Randall Thompson, the Man And His Music for the Week-End Concerts

THE week-end brings to Symphony Hall once again a new composer—and an American—in the person of Randall Thompson. Mr. Thompson, though a native of New York (where he was born in 1899) is, by virtue of many associations, almost a New Englander. He is a graduate of Harvard, where he "majored" in music; was for two years (1927-29) a member of the faculty of the department of music of Wellesley College; has been a lecturer at Harvard (1929); has given various and sundry concerts in the area known as Greater Boston. Mr. Thompson also expressly desires to acknowledge the great value of piano lessons received in Boston from Mrs. Frances L. Grover. Dr. Koussevitzky played his "The Piper of the Gates of Dawn" in Cambridge, March 28, 1929. But he has not been heard at the symphony concerts in Boston.

After leaving Harvard Mr. Thompson had about a half-year of somewhat desultory study with Ernest Bloch in New York. Since that time he has studied and composed entirely "on his own." There has been one period, however, at the approximate date of 1930, when considerable association with the Italian composer, Francesco Malipiero, opened new vistas of thought for him, although he never actually studied with Malipiero. The first movement of the symphony which is to be played this week was completely re-orchestrated as a result of Malipiero's comment when Thompson showed it to him.

Mr. Thompson has held various fellowships and scholarships which have given him the benefits of residence abroad and of consequent association with musicians abroad—the Guggenheim fellowship, the Naumburg fellowship, that of the American Academy at Rome. He has written various works for orchestra, combinations of chamber music, choral works, songs, incidental music to plays. Of special interest at the present time among the choral works are his settings of five of the Odes of Horace, one of which ("O fons Bandusiae") is to be sung at the choral concert of the Harvard forces in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon. Mr. Thompson wrote these odes after visiting Horace's farm in the Sabine hills while in Rome, 1924-25. The visit resulted in the reading of the odes; that in turn to the selection of five for musical composition. At the opposite pole of his musical experience is his collaboration with Arthur Schwartz (of "Dancing in the Dark" fame) in the Grand Street Follies of 1926.

One other work deserves mention because of its unique subject matter—the sequence of five mixed choruses with piano accompaniment entitled "Americana," on texts chosen from "The American Mercury" (1932). The subjects of these five remarkable choruses are (1) Fundamentalism—"May Every Tongue," "the impassioned anathema of the preacher, discrediting Science"; (2) Spiritualism—"The Staff Necromancer," "treats each question according to the probable character of each questioner"; (3) Temperance—"God's Bottles" (need more be said?); (4) Capital Punishment—"The Sublime Process of Law Enforcement," "This is not 'pleasant' music. It is a short, one-act opera, deliberate and macabre; intentionally so"; (5) Optimism—"Loveli-lines" "is a glorification of our love of Beauty in poetry—as well as in advertising." (The quotations are from the composer's program notes written on the occasion of the performance of "Americana" by the Dessoff choirs, April 9, 1932, in New York.)

"Americana," which dates from 1932, is the only thing Mr. Thompson has written since the second symphony of 1930-31. Since that time he has been occupied with a study on "The Status of Music in the American Liberal Arts Colleges," which has been financed by the Carnegie Corporation of New York and is sponsored by the Association of American Colleges. It includes a study of the music courses which may be taken in fulfillment of the requirements for the B. A. degree in thirty selected colleges. From conversation with Mr. Thompson this week one gathered that a change in the composer's style took place beginning with the second symphony. Asked the direct question as to the truth of such an assumption, Mr. Thompson replied, "Why yes, I think that is so." The second symphony has been characterized by New York reviewers as a symphony exceedingly "light" in mood. The composer assures us that the subsequent "Americana" is even lighter.

Mr. Thompson now tries to write an entirely objective, self-contained music, with no conscious thought-taking about models or idiom or sources. "To write just as naturally as I possibly can," is the way he puts it. "A writer may carefully polish all that he writes. But sometime he will be called on to speak somewhere, extemporaneously. Then he will talk in his own absolutely natural way. It is this same natural, unself-conscious approach that I have tried to preserve in my last symphony and in 'Americana.' If there are 'Americanisms' in the symphony, it is not because I tried to put them there, or to write an American music. They are there because they are my most natural mode of musical speech. If there is 'jazz' in my music, it is not because I tried to put jazz into it, but because I am using the dialect most natural to me as the result of the environment in which I grew up." Such simple and unpretentious but sincere words may hold more for the future of American music than appears on their surface.

Measure of the Man

Randall Thompson (Apeda)

Whose Music Will be Heard at Symphony Hall Tomorrow Afternoon and Saturday Evening

Mr. Thompson's second symphony was composed in Switzerland, 1930-31, while the composer was the holder of a Guggenheim fellowship. Its first performance was at Rochester, at an American composers' concert, March 24, 1932. It was performed also by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York under Bruno Walter, Nov. 3, 1933. The New York press had much to say about it, mostly favorable. Mr. Thompson has written about his symphony that it "has no program, either literary or spiritual. It is not cyclical; I wanted to write four contrasting movements, separate and distinct, which together should convey a sense of balance and completeness."

The score calls for the usual contemporary orchestra, except that the percussion section is limited to kettle-drums and cymbals, and further, that kettle-drums and cymbals are never used together. Kettle-drums are to be found in the first two movements, cymbals in the last two. Says Mr. Thompson: "I have been sparing in my use of percussive punctuation in an attempt to make the music itself intrinsically rhythmic." After the first movement he builds up a largely conceived crescendo of orchestral effect, beginning in the second movement with a much reduced orchestra, limiting the brass in the scherzo to horns and a single trumpet, reserving trombones and tuba for the last movement.

This symphony is definitely music of the American scene. It is a symphony that is most often gay, a symphony that sparkles. Most of its rhythmic matter is derived from jazz, but jazz transformed through a personality. The first movement is an Allegro, in the key of E minor, 2-4 meter. The principal theme is rhythmic, a jazz figure, and is heard at once from horns, answered by trumpets. The rhythmic feeling of this theme

Continued on Following Page

Dr. Koussevitzky's "Surprise" Party

Costumes and Trappings for A Concert Out of Usual Course

THE air of expectancy, cultivated from the first announcement of the surprise concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, continued up to the very beginning of the concert last evening. The entering audience received program folders, to be sure, but on opening them they found a page filled in fine print with the names of the committee of sponsors; found the following page given over to a picture of Dr. Koussevitzky; a fourth to announcement of the orchestra's plans for next year; a fifth—more sponsors. Between the fourth and fifth pages was a narrow stub. It contained printing: "Following the concert, there will be handed to you (to be attached here) a page revealing the complete program, with the names of the participants."

Further incentive to guessing came when one first looked at the stage. The huge red curtain which Symphony Hall occasionally uses, hung suspended from the proscenium arch. At the top of this curtain one saw a white screen—which led to speculation as to the several possible combinations of pictures and music. Would the orchestra undertake some of these?

The house was gradually darkened, light focussed upon the screen and we read the legend, "Papa Haydn and His Orchestra." When the curtains parted eighteen men from the orchestra were seen grouped closely together, a spinet in front of them. All were bewigged and befrilled, in the manner of Haydn's day. A candle stood at each desk. Papa Haydn (Dr. Koussevitzky) was seated at the spinet, in the identical wig of the Haydn pictures, with coat of rich brown and gold silk, long, flowing lace cuffs—a picture of interest down to the red heels of the well polished boots and the large red chiffon handkerchief with which he occasionally discreetly mopped his brow. From the spinet he conducted, now standing and guiding the orchestra with both hands, now seated and simulating the act of playing and conducting at the same time. The work performed proved to be Haydn's so-called "Farewell Symphony," in which during the long last movement the players, one after another, extinguish the light of their candles, quietly walk out of the room, until at last only the conductor is left, raptly gazing at the ceiling in loving thought about his music, gently waving his hand, even after the last of his players has deserted him. . . . The screen flashed the words, "You have heard Haydn's Farewell Symphony. May your orchestra never play its own."

After an interval, the screen again announced, "The Daniel Jazz, poem by Vachel Lindsay, music by Louis Gruenberg." Colin O'More, who had sung the piece in Boston some years ago, was the soloist. A small group from the orchestra furnished the background. Never was jazz hotter or blues bluer or realistic touch more compelling than in this performance.

If the jump from Haydn to jazz was large, the next jump was larger. From the wings Dr. Koussevitzky stepped before the curtain with a child whom he introduced as "Suzette." He continued, "She will be our soloist. She will play a piece by five composers—two of them Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt." Carefully he seated her at the piano. From this point the announcements from the screen grew fewer and Dr. Koussevitzky assumed the various rôles of conductor, composer, master of ceremonies, announcer, orchestral double bass player, and general funmaker. "Suzette" (the talented young Susan Godoy) began playing—using no more than one finger on each hand—a sort of Russian equivalent for our own "Chop-sticks": the orchestra joined in with the variations: reviewers began to remember tales of a wonderful collaboration on such a work, which had always interested them but which they had never heard. And when the program-sheet was finally passed, they were confirmed. The official title had it:

Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt—
"Tati, Tati," Paraphrases on a Child's Theme for Piano.
(Freely Transcribed for Orchestra by N. Cherepnin)
Theme.
Variations: Rimsky-Korsakov—Rimsky-Korsakov—Cui—Liadov—Rimsky-Korsakov—Cui—Liadov; Finale—Cui.
Andante (Liszt).
Polka (Borodin).
Berceuse (Rimsky-Korsakov).
Tarantella (Rimsky-Korsakov).
Carillon (Rimsky-Korsakov).

The program-sheet was even so bold as to call this a first performance; which may well be in spite of the age of the piece. There were amusing touches in plenty; the child going to sleep during an interlude, with the conductor signalling in pantomime to the audience not to wake her; the conductor speaking to her when it was time again to commence playing; the shaking of the bobbed head of "Suzette"—Paderewski-fashion—when "Tati" became violent; the rapt look toward heaven when it became sufficiently gentle.

After the intermission the stage had been cleared of its trappings, the full orchestra was in its place. Dr. Koussevitzky raised his bâton, then suddenly lowered it, turned to the audience: "The orchestra is now so wonderful that they can play without a conductor." Forthwith he strode to the double-bass section, relieved one of the players of his instrument, and all joined in an excellent performance of Mozart's overture, "The Marriage of Figaro."

This concluded, an attendant brought in a double bass. All expected that Dr. Koussevitzky was about to play. Instead, he appeared with a gentleman, whom he introduced: "You thought I was going to play. I am not. But Mr. Juht here is a marvellous double bass player. He comes from Esthonia, a small country, but very beautiful. He will play two parts from my concerto. Now, you see, I have never heard this concerto because either I always play it myself or conduct it. Now I want to hear it, just like a composer. We have a good conductor here in Mr. Burgin. He will conduct, Mr. Juht will play, and I will go in the audience and listen like a composer." Whereupon he turned to one side, while a gentleman in the audience spoke up: "Here, Dr. Koussevitzky, please take my seat." When the playing was ended, the composer was called to the platform to take his usual composer's bow.

In response to the applause the conductor said, "We will now play an encore." Whereupon all launched into Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz. With the playing of Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," the evening came to a close. Two huge bouquets were carried to the platform, one for Dr. Koussevitzky, one for Mr. Burgin; a large audience had genuinely been entertained; no one had had more fun out of it than the conductor; and the Boston Emergency Campaign, for which the concert was given, had benefited greatly. A sum of more than $17,500 was reported as the net proceeds.

A. H. M.

Trav Apr 14

-Makers

Thompson's Symphony Given

Never before during the present musical season has the first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra of an American composer's symphony been received with such enthusiasm as was in evidence at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon at conclusion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation of Randall Thompson's symphony No. 2 in E Minor.

Mr. Thompson was among those in the audience and at a gestured command from the noted conductor strode around and on to the platform in acknowledgment of prolonged applause and considerable stamping of feet. Following the established custom on these occasions, he enthusiastically shook Dr. Koussevitzky's hand and shortly thereafter the hand of Richard Burgin, concert master and the orchestra's first violinist.

Before this "event" the orchestra performed Beethoven's music to Goethe's tragedy, "Egmont," heard recently during the Tuesday afternoon concert of March 27, with Olga Averino as soprano soloist and the speaking actor, Richard Hale, as the reader. Afterwards there came Prokofieff's incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" for tenor, chorus, and orchestra; Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte, from the poem by Sacheverell Sitwell; and Borodin's Polovetzkian dances from the opera "Prince Igor." The chorus was supplied by the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor; the tenor soloist was Charles Stratton; the piano soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma; and the contralto soloist, Marie Murray.

All too frequently, even in Boston, the shouts and enthusiasm of the multitude are wrongly directed. That was not the case yesterday during the 22d regular symphony concert of the season, for Mr. Thompson's second symphony was worthy of the appreciation showered upon it.

This second symphony, written in Gstaad, Switzerland, during the months from July, 1930, through September of 1931, was a light, sparkling, rhythmic work, somehow definitely American in nature. Occosionally came indication of themes derived from jazz. Throughout was a logical development and a clear indication of the composer's mastery of the use of a modern orchestra. It was a pleasure to hear a work created in the past several years that seemingly did not attempt to make use of or copy the musical style of a Stravinsky or a Schoenberg.

In the program notes Thompson declared: "It is based on no program, either literary or spiritual. It is not cyclical. I wanted to write four contrasting movements, separate and distinct, which together should convey a sense of balance and completeness." He did just that, capably. Of the four movements, the second, a largo in C major, was perhaps the most enjoyable. It opened with the violins playing a simple melody contrasted against pizzicato chords from the 'cellos. Later an oboe sang a different melody. And so on to the end. Interestingly the percussion choir was limited to cymbals and kettledrums; the drums being used in the first two movements and the cymbals in the last two

The Prokolieff incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" (Seven, they are seven!) was first given at a concert for Dr. Koussevitzky at the Paris Opera House, May 29, 1924. Based on a text by Constantin Balmont from a cuneiform inscription on the walls of an Akkadian temple, it was dramatically and stirringly presented by Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and a well trained Cecilia chorus. Charles Stratton rendered the tenor solo part with admirable spirit.

Lambert's "The Rio Grande" was a musical and verbal atmosphere picture of the Rio Grande and the country in the vicinity. The work of the chorus in this and in Borodin's dances from the opera "Prince Igor" was less impressive than in the incantation. Phrasing and enunciation were not as clear as one might have wished. In Lambert's work there were several effective passages for solo piano, expertly played by Sanroma. The short alto solo at the end was intelligently sung by Miss Murray, though overmuch of tremolo and an inclination to force high notes slightly marred the clarity of her tones.

In closing this reviewer would like to mention the time and effort spent by Dr. Koussevitzky in preparing for the performance of Thompson's second symphony. It had been announced for a previous program, but was postponed apparently to permit more rehearsals. By thus presenting a new work as skilfully and thoroughly as if it were an acknowledged masterpiece, the conductor has endeared himself to composers and public alike.

W. T. C., Jr.

CONCERTS

will [illegible]

10*

THOMPSON'S SECOND BY SYMPHONY

Musical Delights With Voices Make Concert Enjoyable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a lavish and prodigal hand did Dr. Koussevitzky provide musical delights and excitements at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, in which the orchestra enjoyed the diverse and capable assistance of Olga Averino, soprano; Marie Murray, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor; Richard Hale, reader; Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and the Cecilia chorus.

A VARIED LIST

From the last Tuesday afternoon concert, Dr. Koussevitzky repeated the Egmont music of Beethoven, previously unperformed by the symphony orchestra since 1885. For the first time in this city conductor and orchestra offered the second symphony of Randall Thompson, praised for its general agreeableness in New York last autumn. From orchestra, chorus and certain of the soloists came, as more or less familiar items, Prokofieff's savage Akkadian incantation, "Seven, They Are Seven!"; Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," and the ever-alluring, ever-stirring Polovetzkian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

It would be idle to remind Mr. Thompson that his music is light and often obvious. His evident intention was to make it so. Had he contrived to infuse into it a little more originality and distinction, he would have given us something worth while. The reaction against the deliberate ugliness of so much contemporary music has set in, and in this engaging score Mr. Thompson accordingly shows himself to be a true progressive.

Thompson's Piece Liked

To put one's finger on the portions of the symphony that are unmistakably Thompsonian would be more difficult than to list its sources. At the outset came thoughts of Dvorak and his symphony, "From the New World." Mr. Thompson frankly courts the Negroid note that for the older composer spelled American folk-song. There are later hints of the Indian dance. The slow division is sublimated musical comedy sentimentalism; the finale, brilliant and exhilarating, has a "Turkey in the Straw" cheerfulness with overtones of MacDowell. The Scherzo, more completely Mr. Thompson's own than the other movements, does him much credit.

Summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, he was enthusiastically applauded. The audience liked his piece. And well it might.

"Rio Grande" Wearing Thin

The music of Beethoven has been described and appraised so recently in these columns that it is necessary only to repeat that its interest is partly historical, that the two songs of Claerchen, particularly the first, were good to hear from Mme. Averino, and that Mr. Hale declaimed the chosen lines from Goethe's play with dignity and with a rhetorical emphasis by no means amiss in this connection.

The "Rio Grande," so rapturously praised by the English reviewers who heard it in Manchester and London in 1929, is already wearing thin. There are seductive measures, but they paled before the music of Borodin that followed. Inevitably Prokofieff's musical demonology inspires less terror with each re-hearing, though few composers possess his gift for the horrible.

If emphasis has been laid thus far upon the pieces performed rather than upon the performances, it is only because all those concerned had their thoughts upon the music, not upon themselves, and through them, from Beethoven to Borodin, it was made alive. If the other composers could have been present, they would have joined with Mr. Thompson in expressing gratitude to their interpreters.

DESPERADO CAPTURED

JERUSALEM, April 13 (AP)—Th bandit Abujilda, one of Palestine's mo notorious terrorists, was captured a cave tonight after exchanging with police.

METROPOLI

UNIVERSITY O

Her. Apr. 14 MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

PROGRAM:

Beethoven—Music to Goethe's tragedy "Egmont": Overture, two songs, Claerchen's Death," melodrama, "Symphony of Victory." Soprano: Olga Averino. Reader: Richard Hale. Randall Thompson: Symphony No. 2. Prokofieff—"Sept, ils sont sept." Lambert—"The Rio Grande" for Tenor, Chorus and Orchestra. Soloist: Charles Stratton. Borodin—Polovetzkian Dances, from "Prince Igor."

Honor to whom honor is due! At yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzy brought out another American work and gave it the same complete devotion in preparation and performance that he bestows on all new works, regardless of the composer's nationality.

The new piece is Randall Thompson's Second Symphony. There is not the slightest doubt that this symphony achieved a rousing success. All that Mr. Thompson had written in advance in explanatory notes made a distinct impression in his favor, by the lack of verbose pretentiousness and by the simple clarity of his statements. The symphony is as understandable at a first hearing as his analytical notes are at a first reading.

One compelling feature of the work that arrests immediate interest is the strong sense of movement with which this piece finds its pace and keeps it—at all times and in all the movements. It also obvious that Mr. Thompson knows the value of the dissonance. He does not indulge in a purposeless use of this device, so overworked, and therefore, so unappreciated, by many a "modern" composer. Mr. Thompson makes no vain effort for effects. When he uses percussion, it is with telling effect; when he singles out any instrument or group of instruments, the result is adroitly secured.

From the standpoint of personal impressions, we felt that the final movement of this symphony has the least distinctive atmosphere. It is almost popular in character, so much so that to us it does not give the symphony a sense of having rounded out its purpose.

All the movements are admirably contrasted and no movement is too long. The concentrated energy of the first never leaves the listener in doubt as to the material and its treatment. Too few composers are today showing enough interest in the listener, who is often left outside the sphere of the composer's activities. Yet these same composers are often chagrined when the average listener reacts confusedly. Mr. Thompson writes with admirable restraint, but without aloofness. His music is the proof that a cultivated mind can preserve a strong human purpose, a warm and lucid emotional activity; can combine these with an individual sense of the beautiful, and, where profitable, with the humorous or grotesque, without once resorting to sham.

There is something distinctly American in the way Mr. Thompson has refused to burden his speech with nonessentials, and that from a more profound impulse than merely being practical. He has given us abundant proof of his refined yet vigorous art. When his Second Symphony is played in London, later in the season, American music will be most worthily represented.

Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept" is described as an incantation for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, after a cuneiform inscription on the walls of an Akkadian temple. The inscription represented formulas of incantation against seven horrible devils, the supposed authors of all human woes. What Mr. Prokofieff demands of soloist, chorus, and orchestra, is without the bounds of music; it is mostly noise. Who shall say that this with the composer's imaginative scoring, is not successfully appropriate?

When Lambert's "The Rio Grande" was first heard here, Philip Hale made the wise observation that "most of us have been trained to take our music too seriously." A serious attitude would completely foil, in this case, both composer and auditor, and cause the latter to miss some delightfully spontaneous music. Jesus Maria Sanroma shone brilliantly in his excellently defined playing of the piano part.

The concert closed with a vivid performance of Polovitzkian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." At the end of the concert Arthur Fiedler who had so ably prepared the chorus of the Cecilia Society for its versatile activities in yesterday's concert, was brought out by Dr. Koussevitzky for deserved applause.

Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont," as given yesterday, was reviewed in these columns two weeks ago.

From beginning to end the program confirmed the greatness of the Boston Symphony under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

MacDOWELL

NTOWN SCREEN

4, 1934 Globe Apr 14

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Second Symphony of Randall Thompson, heard for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday, proved a notable and indisputably "American" score. Its notability is to be found in its freedom from cliches, eccentricity and pretense, and in the fact that it has something light-hearted and jocular to say. This is expressed in a manner both individual and graceful. The "Americanism" lies in a perfectly natural employment of the elements of jazz; not a literal imitation of the Tin Pan Alley boys, but a sort of sublimated, refined jazz. No European could possibly have conceived this score. This expert manipulation of jazz toward purely symphonic ends may disturb those conservatives who have held that nothing of permanent value may be derived from that tonal phenomenon.

Set nominally in the key of E minor, the Symphony attempts neither to be profound nor flippant; it is skillfully written for orchestra; its themes are salient and almost whistleable; the harmony flirts casually with dissonance. There are four movements, Allegro, Largo, Vivace, and a final Allegro which concludes "largamente." Only the last movement employs a full orchestra; elsewhere lighter scoring prevails. Kettle-drums and cymbals, and these alone, lend percussive emphasis, the former in the first two movements, the latter thereafter.

This Second Symphony, says Mr Thompson, "is based on no program, either literary or spiritual. It is not cyclical. I wanted to write four contrasting movements, separate and distinct, which together should convey a sense of balance and completeness." He has succeeded with distinction, not hesitating to adopt a middle course between past and contemporary methods in his style of expression.

The whole piece is deliciously rhythmic, always vital but never vulgar. Mr Thompson carries lightly his command of intricate technical devices; no matter how complex his score may appear on paper, it is beautifully transparent in hearing. The second movement is plainly in the style of jazz ballads, though not so mushy as those musical freaks are apt to be in their native state. Mr Thompson is not only clever, he is brave: courage is required of anyone under 35 who dares to write a simple sequence.

The composer was fortunately able to be present to receive the exceptionally warm approval of a Friday audience. His Symphony joins the select company of Mr Piston's Concerto and Mr Harris' Symphony, works which ought to be heard again.

The concert began with the incidental music which Beethoven wrote for the play, "Egmont," by Goethe. This music and sundry speeches of Count Egmont were revived a few weeks ago at a concert of the Symphony's Beethoven cycle. Only the familiar overture is of value. Olga Averino again sang the soprano solos of Claerchen, and Richard Hale read the speeches of Egmont.

After intermission the Cecilia Society joined the orchestra in Prokofieff's "Seven, They are Seven"; the "Rio Grande" of Constant Lambert; and the "Polovtsian Dances" from the opera "Prince Igor" by Borodin. The piano solos in "Rio Grande" were played by Mr Sanroma, and those for contralto sung by Marie Murray. Charles Stratton performed commendably the difficult part for tenor in Prokofieff's incantation, a definitely minor composition, but one which has retained for some years its primitive strength.

"Rio Grande," revived after a comfortable silence of three years, seemed strained and artificial after Mr Thompson's Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky was at his best yesterday afternoon, and his reading of Beethoven's overture was distinctly improved in style and taste over that of a few weeks ago.

The program for next week has not been announced.

C. W. D.

Music

Monitor Apr 14

Boston Symphony

For novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-second program of the season (April 13-14), Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Randall Thompson's Second Symphony. This work had been heard in Rochester and in New York, and other compositions of Mr. Thompson's had appeared on the Boston orchestra's Cambridge programs; but the composer made his Symphony Hall début on the present occasion.

Mr. Thompson is a native of New York, a graduate of Harvard and has taught music at Harvard and Wellesley colleges. He is the author of another symphony and other works for orchestra, some chamber pieces and several choral works.

His Second Symphony is evidently an attempt to write specifically American music. It is an unassuming work, free of bombast, remarkable perhaps chiefly for its restraint; for the composer, instead of trying to win attention by the shock method, has employed more ingratiating means. Asking an orchestra of moderate size, he employs it sparingly. For percussion he requires only cymbals and kettledrums, which are not used together at all. Reducing his orchestra in the second movement, he builds a crescendo from there which comes to its climax in the final (Largamente) section of the fourth movement. Even then his sonority is very moderate.

SHOP

For themes he has gone to popular sources. His principal subject is not so much a theme as a rhythmic figure in the jazz manner; his second, a sort of "blues" tune. The texture throughout is very transparent. The material and structure are exposed to plain view. Perhaps the composer has been a little over-confident in permitting this exposure. Nevertheless his symphony, which is certainly not difficult to grasp, won an immediate popular success. If it is not important, it is evidently pleasing to many.

The rest of Dr. Koussevitzky's list was rather oddly assorted. The symphony was preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" music (except the entr'actes). This music, which the conductor had unearthed for a recent concert in a Beethoven series, apparently has caught his fancy. Except for the Overture, it strikes us as uncommonly dull.

The second half of the program brought revivals of two modern choral pieces, Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," with Mr. Charles Stratton for tenor soloist, and Lambert's "Rio Grande," with Mr. J. M. Sanromá playing the piano and Mme. Marie Murray in the contralto part. The chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Mr. Arthur Fiedler. The Prokofieff retains to a surprising degree its original effectiveness. The Lambert item proved still entertaining. The final number was the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

L. A. S.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD
APR 16 1934

Boston Innovation

A "surprise" concert unique in many respects was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night. It involved not merely the withholding of information usually conveyed by the printed program, but "costumes and trappings" for the various numbers, the identification of offerings by the flashing of titles on a screen and the playing of Louis Gruenberg's setting for Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel Jazz," done in a fashion to elicit from a reviewer the following comment: "Never was jazz hotter or blues bluer or realistic touch more compelling than in this performance."

In going off on this imaginative rampage, the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, had a special purpose in mind. It was the next to the last concert of the season. In Boston, as elsewhere symphony orchestras have felt the sharp edge of the depression. So Dr. Koussevitzky undertook to make the event as popular and human as possible. He must have succeeded admirably without deviating one hair's breadth from the highest musical standards. The affair proves that symphony concerts do not have to be austere affairs of the conventional pattern.

The device of the screen could be more generally used than happens to be the case. Encores can be named, and program notes can be amplified in this way. One hears a great deal about the showmanship of Conductor Stokowski, of Philadelphia. He has a dangerous competitor in the Boston's Koussevitzky.

---

10 Post apr. 15

Tchaikovsky Festival Will End the Season---Music Notes of the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As was announced last autumn, Dr. Koussevitzky will end this, his 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a Tchaikovsky Festival. This festival will embrace the final pair of Symphony Concerts, those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 27 and 28, and there will be two special concerts on the preceding Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon. Admission to these special concerts will be by invitation only, but all subscribers to the four series of Symphony Concerts are privileged to attend. For the benefit of non-subscribers, it may be remarked that seats are available for the two regular concerts. First come, first served. Details regarding programmes and soloists have not yet been made public.

* * * *

Thus will the name of Tchaikovsky be added to those of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms as one of the composers to be honored during the Koussevitzkian regime by festival performances of their works. The choice of Tchaikovsky for this particular anniversary is a fortunate and appropriate one. As an interpreter of the music of the composers mentioned above, Dr. Koussevitzky has acknowledged rivals. As an exponent of Tchaikovsky he is unquestionably supreme among living conductors.

* * * *

Next season, as in the past, there will be 24 symphony concerts each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings and six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. It is encouraging to note that hard times are not causing any curtailment of the accustomed schedules. Needless to say Dr. Koussevitzky continues at the helm. His popularity and his vigor remain alike undiminished. As in the 10-year period now ending, he may be counted upon to keep the concerts free from dull routine, to discover new ways of giving them fresh life and interest. These gifts are scarcely less valuable than his talents as conductor.

* * * *

At the beginning of each season certain pieces are suggested for performance that for one reason or another do not materialize. This year no room has been found for the monumental Seventh Symphony of Bruckner, announced last fall for performance during the year, and not heard in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time. No doubt this particular revival, to which some of us had looked forward with eager anticipation, will be accomplished next season.

* * * *

NEW YORKER
MAR 17 1934

MUSICAL EVENTS

ALWAYS hospitable to new music, Mr. Koussevitzky brought with him on his latest trip from Boston the second symphony of Nicolai T. Berezowsky, who is a gifted New Yorker-by-adoption. This symphony commands respect for its composer's mastery of his materials, but more important than that is its indication that Mr. Berezowsky is shedding musical mannerisms and permitting what he has to say to speak for itself. The genuine Berezowsky, I take it, is to be found in the largo rather than in the mechanistic opening allegro. If Mr. Berezowsky himself will insist on the genuine article, he probably will find plenty of customers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 15 1934

CURRENT MUSIC

SPRING CONCERTS

By MARGARET REGAL

New York, April 14—The thermometer and the musical calendar alike bear occasional witness to the arrival of spring. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra made their last visit of the season to New York last week. Thursday evening the large audience in Carnegie hall had an exciting time. In addition to the expected thrills that a fine orchestral performance furnishes in greater measure than any other form of musical expression, the second half of the program, the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, was played while a cloud of smoke hovered thickly over the stage. Fortunately nothing came of it. Conductor and players continued with serene indifference, averting a possible panic by their composure. As they reached the finale, which offered a legitimate release for sternly repressed emotion, they played with a passionate intensity, an exultation, that were infinitely stirring. At the close the audience rose and cheered both the fine playing and the fine courage of the performers.

Three contrasted works by modern composers, each a daring innovator, made up the first part of the program: Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faune" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The trails blazed by the last two have become well trodden musical paths; many will doubtless hope that the dissonance and atonality of Hindemith will be regarded by future composers as a cul-de-sac that offers no escape from the labyrinth of esthetic problems that surrounds the creative artist. Of course Hindemith originated neither dissonance nor atonality but he did devise new and effective ways to use them. This music was written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, which played it with a virtuosity that few organizations in the world could approach. Equally fine performances of the Debussy and Strauss works were given by Dr Koussevitzky and his men.

The special feature of the final concert by the Bostonians, given Saturday afternoon, was the first New York performance of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation," for orchestra with chorus of women and a speaking voice. The chorus was that of the Cecilia society of Boston and the speaker was David Blair McClosky. The work was written for the dedication of Severance hall, the home of the Cleveland orchestra, February 5, 1931. It received unanimous critical approval, exceeding that accorded any new composition played here in recent seasons. The composer was present and appeared on the stage to receive the applause of audience, orchestra and conductor.

The other compositions of the afternoon were the B minor concerto grosso of Handel and the Brahms C minor symphony. After the concert, Dr Koussevitzky was presented with a testimonial signed by composers of all schools and others actively interested in the creative arts, expressing their admiration for his "distinguished accomplishment in the interests of American musical development, through the energy, courage and understanding which he has devoted to the performance of American compositions."

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
APR 15 1934

The Week Of Music In New York

Orchestras. Local And Visiting, Chief Source Of Music In Gotham With "Met" Away

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

WITH the Metropolitan on the road, the orchestras, local and visiting, are the chief source of the best music at present, although Mr. Amato's opera company at the Hippodrome continues to reap golden opinions in spite of a somewhat stereotyped repertoire.

Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony closed its New York season, the Russo-Bostonese conductor winning laurels for himself not only by his fine conducting but by averting a panic in Carnegie Hall. Smoke from an incinerator started billowing from backstage during one of the numbers and the audience got restive. Little flutters came up here and there and people began getting up to run out. Koussevitzky finally turned around and cried out "Sit down! There's nothing the matter!" and went on playing. His coolness undoubtedly kept unpleasant things from happening.

Audiences are funny things. A few years ago during a performance of "Parsifal" in Palermo, the lights went out and stayed out for so long that a panic started. Some clever person, however, began singing the "Merry Widow" waltz, which was at once taken up by most of those present, and calm was restored, even though the journey from Monsalvat of Wagner to Maxim's of Lehar was a far one!

HINDEMITH COMPOSITION

At the first of his pair of concerts, Koussevitzky played the Konzertmusik for String and Brass Choirs, composed by Hindemith for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony last year. It was a clever idea to have such a composer show what he could do on the half-century.

As a matter of fact, Hindemith, with his bunch of keys all rattling at the same time, is not such a profound revolutionary as he might seem. His radicalism is that of form rather than of ideas and therefore, secondary. On the same program were Debussy's Faun and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, and there is revolutionary music, if you like, even though it was the revolution of the turn of the century. Both are susceptible of comprehension by the babies in our block, nowadays, and yet both pieces, because the ideas contained therein were new and original, raised tornados of controversy in their day! The program ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, most of which may be forgiven on account of the lovely horn solo in the second movement.

At the second of his pair, the Boston conductor played one of Handel's Concerti Grossi, the Brahms C Minor Symphony and the first performance here of the Evocation of Loeffler, once a player in the orchestra.

STANDS TEST WELL

The Loeffler piece, for orchestra, female chorus and a speaking voice was composed for the opening of Severance Hall, the permanent home of the Cleveland Orchestra. It is a symbolic work and deals with singing stones and such like, and has a fugue which typifies the confusion of building. As in the case of most program music, it must, in the last analysis, be judged by itself and of itself. Be it said that Mr. Loeffler's piece stands the test very well indeed. The choral parts were sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston and the spoken part was admirably done by David Blair McClosky of the same city.

Stokowski played the Fifth Beethoven Symphony and three Bach transcriptions by himself, "Komm, Suesser Tod," the Passacaglia and the D-minor Toccata and Fugue. The last was the best. It is familiar to phonograph listeners through the very fine recording with the same conductor and the same band. The Beethoven suffered a good deal through Mr. Stokowski's attempt to do things with it, with not invariably happy results.

Some rather good violin playing was done by a youth named Erno Valasek, who comes from Cleveland and who is said to be only 13 years old. In this day when violin prodigies are all over the lot, one who really can play is a real treat. This youth has fine technique, a good, sonorous tone and, apparently, genuine musicianship. He was hampered with an accompanist who shall be nameless, but who has done enough ensemble playing to play better than he did on this occasion. He nearly wrecked the finale of the Bruch concerto and the young fiddler had a quite shaky moment from which he recovered manfully.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIME
APR 16 1934

Fire v. Tempo

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony had to pause during Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, one night last week in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, while Conductor Koussevitzky asked the audience to sit down, be quiet. The billows of smoke that were gushing out on the stage and swirling among the imperturbable musicians, were only from a fire in a rubbish chute, which was quickly controlled. When a friend congratulated Koussevitzky not only for averting a panic but for keeping his tempo precise and unhurried through it all, Koussevitzky answered: "Ah! But tempo is tempo and tranquillity is tranquillity."

Music

Monitor Apr 14

Boston Symphony

For novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-second program of the season (April 13-14), Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Randall Thompson's Second Symphony. This work had been heard in Rochester and in New York, and other compositions of Mr. Thompson's had appeared on the Boston orchestra's Cambridge programs; but the composer made his Symphony Hall début on the present occasion.

Mr. Thompson is a native of New York, a graduate of Harvard and has taught music at Harvard and Wellesley colleges. He is the author of another symphony and other works for orchestra, some chamber pieces and several choral works.

His Second Symphony is evidently an attempt to write specifically American music. It is an unassuming work, free of bombast, remarkable perhaps chiefly for its restraint; for the composer, instead of trying to win attention by the shock method, has employed more ingratiating means. Asking an orchestra of moderate size, he employs it sparingly. For percussion he requires only cymbals and kettledrums, which are not used together at all. Reducing his orchestra in the second movement, he builds a crescendo from there which comes to its climax in the final (Largamente) section of the fourth movement. Even then his sonority is very moderate.

SHOP

For themes he has gone to popular sources. His principal subject is not so much a theme as a rhythmic figure in the jazz manner; his second, a sort of "blues" tune. The texture throughout is very transparent. The material and structure are exposed to plain view. Perhaps the composer has been a little over-confident in permitting this exposure. Nevertheless his symphony, which is certainly not difficult to grasp, won an immediate popular success. If it is not important, it is evidently pleasing to many.

The rest of Dr. Koussevitzky's list was rather oddly assorted. The symphony was preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" music (except the entr'actes). This music, which the conductor had unearthed for a recent concert in a Beethoven series, apparently has caught his fancy. Except for the Overture, it strikes us as uncommonly dull.

The second half of the program brought revivals of two modern choral pieces, Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," with Mr. Charles Stratton for tenor soloist, and Lambert's "Rio Grande," with Mr. J. M. Sanromá playing the piano and Mme. Marie Murray in the contralto part. The chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Mr. Arthur Fiedler. The Prokofieff retains to a surprising degree its original effectiveness. The Lambert item proved still entertaining. The final number was the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

L. A. S.

---

10 Post apr. 15

Tchaikovsky Festival Will End the Season---Music Notes of the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As was announced last autumn, Dr. Koussevitzky will end this, his 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a Tchaikovsky Festival. This festival will embrace the final pair of Symphony Concerts, those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 27 and 28, and there will be two special concerts on the preceding Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon. Admission to these special concerts will be by invitation only, but all subscribers to the four series of Symphony Concerts are privileged to attend. For the benefit of non-subscribers, it may be remarked that seats are available for the two regular concerts. First come, first served. Details regarding programmes and soloists have not yet been made public.

* * * *

Thus will the name of Tchaikovsky be added to those of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms as one of the composers to be honored during the Koussevitzkian regime by festival performances of their works. The choice of Tchaikovsky for this particular anniversary is a fortunate and appropriate one. As an interpreter of the music of the composers mentioned above, Dr. Koussevitzky has acknowledged rivals. As an exponent of Tchaikovsky he is unquestionably supreme among living conductors.

* * * *

Next season, as in the past, there will be 24 symphony concerts each on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings and six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. It is encouraging to note that hard times are not causing any curtailment of the accustomed schedules. Needless to say Dr. Koussevitzky continues at the helm. His popularity and his vigor remain alike undiminished. As in the 10-year period now ending, he may be counted upon to keep the concerts free from dull routine, to discover new ways of giving them fresh life and interest. These gifts are scarcely less valuable than his talents as conductor.

* * * *

At the beginning of each season certain pieces are suggested for performance that for one reason or another do not materialize. This year no room has been found for the monumental Seventh Symphony of Bruckner, announced last fall for performance during the year, and not heard in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time. No doubt this particular revival, to which some of us had looked forward with eager anticipation, will be accomplished next season.

* * * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

APR 15 1934

CURRENT MUSIC

SPRING CONCERTS

By MARGARET REGAL

New York, April 14—The thermometer and the musical calendar alike bear occasional witness to the arrival of spring. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra made their last visit of the season to New York last week. Thursday evening the large audience in Carnegie hall had an exciting time. In addition to the expected thrills that a fine orchestral performance furnishes in greater measure than any other form of musical expression, the second half of the program, the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, was played while a cloud of smoke hovered thickly over the stage. Fortunately nothing came of it. Conductor and players continued with serene indifference, averting a possible panic by their composure. As they reached the finale, which offered a legitimate release for sternly repressed emotion, they played with a passionate intensity, an exultation, that were infinitely stirring. At the close the audience rose and cheered both the fine playing and the fine courage of the performers.

Three contrasted works by modern composers, each a daring innovator, made up the first part of the program: Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faune" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The trails blazed by the last two have become well trodden musical paths; many will doubtless hope that the dissonance and atonality of Hindemith will be regarded by future composers as a cul-de-sac that offers no escape from the labyrinth of esthetic problems that surrounds the creative artist. Of course Hindemith originated neither dissonance nor atonality but he did devise new and effective ways to use them. This music was written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, which played it with a virtuosity that few organizations in the world could approach. Equally fine performances of the Debussy and Strauss works were given by Dr Koussevitzky and his men.

The special feature of the final concert by the Bostonians, given Saturday afternoon, was the first New York performance of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation," for orchestra with chorus of women and a speaking voice. The chorus was that of the Cecilia society of Boston and the speaker was David Blair McClosky. The work was written for the dedication of Severance hall, the home of the Cleveland orchestra, February 5, 1931. It received unanimous critical approval, exceeding that accorded any new composition played here in recent seasons. The composer was present and appeared on the stage to receive the applause of audience, orchestra and conductor.

The other compositions of the afternoon were the B minor concerto grosso of Handel and the Brahms C minor symphony. After the concert, Dr Koussevitzky was presented with a testimonial signed by composers of all schools and others actively interested in the creative arts, expressing their admiration for his "distinguished accomplishment in the interests of American musical development, through the energy, courage and understanding which he has devoted to the performance of American compositions."

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 15 1934

The Week Of Music In New York

Orchestras. Local And Visiting, Chief Source Of Music In Gotham With "Met" Away

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

WITH the Metropolitan on the road, the orchestras, local and visiting, are the chief source of the best music at present, although Mr. Amato's opera company at the Hippodrome continues to reap golden opinions in spite of a somewhat stereotyped repertoire.

Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony closed its New York season, the Russo-Bostonese conductor winning laurels for himself not only by his fine conducting but by averting a panic in Carnegie Hall. Smoke from an incinerator started billowing from backstage during one of the numbers and the audience got restive. Little flutters came up here and there and people began getting up to run out. Koussevitzky finally turned around and cried out "Sit down! There's nothing the matter!" and went on playing. His coolness undoubtedly kept unpleasant things from happening.

Audiences are funny things. A few years ago during a performance of "Parsifal" in Palermo, the lights went out and stayed out for so long that a panic started. Some clever person, however, began singing the "Merry Widow" waltz, which was at once taken up by most of those present, and calm was restored, even though the journey from Monsalvat of Wagner to Maxim's of Lehar was a far one!

HINDEMITH COMPOSITION

At the first of his pair of concerts, Koussevitzky played the Konzertmusik for String and Brass Choirs, composed by Hindemith for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony last year. It was a clever idea to have such a composer show what he could do on the half-century.

As a matter of fact, Hindemith, with his bunch of keys all rattling at the same time, is not such a profound revolutionary as he might seem. His radicalism is that of form rather than of ideas and therefore, secondary. On the same program were Debussy's Faun and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, and there is revolutionary music, if you like, even though it was the revolution of the turn of the century. Both are susceptible of comprehension by the babies in our block, nowadays, and yet both pieces, because the ideas contained therein were new and original, raised tornados of controversy in their day! The program ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, most of which may be forgiven on account of the lovely horn solo in the second movement.

At the second of his pair, the Boston conductor played one of Handel's Concerti Grossi, the Brahms C Minor Symphony and the first performance here of the Evocation of Loeffler, once a player in the orchestra.

STANDS TEST WELL

The Loeffler piece, for orchestra, female chorus and a speaking voice was composed for the opening of Severance Hall, the permanent home of the Cleveland Orchestra. It is a symbolic work and deals with singing stones and such like, and has a fugue which typifies the confusion of building. As in the case of most program music, it must, in the last analysis, be judged by itself and of itself. Be it said that Mr. Loeffler's piece stands the test very well indeed. The choral parts were sung by the Cecilia Society of Boston and the spoken part was admirably done by David Blair McClosky of the same city.

Stokowski played the Fifth Beethoven Symphony and three Bach transcriptions by himself, "Komm, Suesser Tod," the Passacaglia and the D-minor Toccata and Fugue. The last was the best. It is familiar to phonograph listeners through the very fine recording with the same conductor and the same band. The Beethoven suffered a good deal through Mr. Stokowski's attempt to do things with it, with not invariably happy results.

Some rather good violin playing was done by a youth named Erno Valasek, who comes from Cleveland and who is said to be only 13 years old. In this day when violin prodigies are all over the lot, one who really can play is a real treat. This youth has fine technique, a good, sonorous tone and, apparently, genuine musicianship. He was hampered with an accompanist who shall be nameless, but who has done enough ensemble playing to play better than he did on this occasion. He nearly wrecked the finale of the Bruch concerto and the young fiddler had a quite shaky moment from which he recovered manfully.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

APR 16 1934

Boston Innovation

A "surprise" concert unique in many respects was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night. It involved not merely the withholding of information usually conveyed by the printed program, but "costumes and trappings" for the various numbers, the identification of offerings by the flashing of titles on a screen and the playing of Louis Gruenberg's setting for Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel Jazz," done in a fashion to elicit from a reviewer the following comment: "Never was jazz hotter or blues bluer or realistic touch more compelling than in this performance."

In going off on this imaginative rampage, the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, had a special purpose in mind. It was the next to the last concert of the season. In Boston, as elsewhere symphony orchestras have felt the sharp edge of the depression. So Dr. Koussevitzky undertook to make the event as popular and human as possible. He must have succeeded admirably without deviating one hair's breadth from the highest musical standards. The affair proves that symphony concerts do not have to be austere affairs of the conventional pattern.

The device of the screen could be more generally used than happens to be the case. Encores can be named, and program notes can be amplified in this way. One hears a great deal about the showmanship of Conductor Stokowski, of Philadelphia. He has a dangerous competitor in the Boston's Koussevitzky.

NEW YORKER

MAR 17 1934 NY

MUSICAL EVENTS

ALWAYS hospita[illegible] new music, Mr. Koussevitzky brought with him on his latest trip from Boston the second symphony of Nicolai T. Berezowsky, who is a gifted New Yorker-by-adoption. This symphony commands respect for its composer's mastery of his materials, but more important than that is its indication that Mr. Berezowsky is shedding musical mannerisms and permitting what he has to say to speak for itself. The genuine Berezowsky, I take it, is to be found in the largo rather than in the mechanistic opening allegro. If Mr. Berezowsky himself will insist on the genuine article, he probably will find plenty of customers.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIME

APR 16 1934

Fire v. Tempo

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony had to pause during Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, one night last week in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, while Conductor Koussevitzky asked the audience to sit down, be quiet. The billows of smoke that were gushing out on the stage and swirling among the imperturbable musicians, were only from a fire in a rubbish chute, which was quickly controlled. When a friend congratulated Koussevitzky not only for averting a panic but for keeping his tempo precise and unhurried through it all, Koussevitzky answered: "Ah! But tempo is tempo and tranquillity is tranquillity."

He. apr 17

KOUSSEVITZKY PRESENTS CHECK

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, donating check for $17,617.37 to officials of the emergency campaign yesterday. The money was taken in at a benefit concert. Left to right: Edward A. Taft, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley.

SYMPHONY DONATION TO CAMPAIGN $17,617

A check for $17,617.37 was presented Edward A. Taft of the Boston Emergency Campaign Committee yesterday by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the proceeds of the benefit concert given last Wednesday in aid of the drive.

Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley represented the committee of sponsors of the concert as its vice-chairman. Although the amount was increased by private donations, it was one of the largest ever realized by a benefit concert in Boston.

immediate study and recom-

BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, APRIL 17.

CHECK FROM BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTED TO RELIEF CAMPAIGN

FROM PROCEEDS OF SYMPHONY CONCERT—$17,617.37 FOR EMERGENCY RELIEF
Edward A. Taft, of the relief committee, at left, receiving check from Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs J. Gardner Bradley, vice chairman of the committee is seen at right.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky presented Edward A. Taft of the Boston Emergency Campaign Committee with a check for $17,617.37, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The conductor gave the check in behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the proceeds of the benefit concert given in Symphony Hall last Wednesday evening. Mrs J. Gardner Bradley represented the committee of sponsors of the benefit concert as its vice chairman.

Although the amount of the check was much increased by private donations, it was one of the largest ever realized by a benefit concert in this city.

MONITOR

6

HYANNIS

Susan Godoy Plays at Symphony Concert

To read the program of the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the evening of April 11th, is to see the name among the artists of Susan Godoy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Godoy of Brookline and Hyannis, and to read the press notices on the following day to see many, and in most every instance, complimentary comments upon her performance, which is considered very remarkable. The following is that from the Boston Transcript:

From the wings Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, stepped before the curtain with a child whom he introduced as "Suzette. He continued, "She will be our soloist. She will play a piece by five composers—two of them Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt." Carefully he seated her at the piano. "Suzette" (the talented young Susan Godoy) began playing—using no more than one finger on each hand—a sort of Russian equivalent for our own "Chopsticks"; the orchestra joined in with the variations; reviewers began to remember tales of a wonderful collaboration on such a work, which had always interested them but which they had never heard. And when the program-sheet was finally passed, they were confirmed. The official title had it:

Borodin, Cui, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Liszt—
"Tati, Tati, Paraphrases on a Child's Theme for Piano, (Freely Transcribed for Orchestra by N. Cherepnin)
Theme.
Variations: Rimsky-Korsakov—Rimsky-Korsakov — Cui — Liadov—Rimsky-Korsakov—Cui—Liadov; Finale—Cui.
Andante (Liszt).
Polka (Borodin).
Berceuse (Rimsky-Korsakov).
Tarantella (Rimsky-Korsakov).
Carillon (Rimsky-Korsakov).

The program-sheet was even so bold as to call this a first performance; which may well be in spite of the age of the piece. There were amusing touches in plenty; the child going to sleep during an interlude, with the conductor signalling in pantomime to the audience not to wake her; the conductor speaking to her when it was time again to commence playing; the shaking of the bobbed head of "Suzette"—Paderewski-fashion—when "Tati" became violent; the rapt look toward heaven when it became sufficiently gentle.

Hyannis people are greatly interested. Mr. and Mrs. Godoy have many friends and connections here and a number have met the little Susan and heard her play and not only that, but older people knew intimately the maternal grandparents of Mrs. Godoy on both sides. All will watch little Susan's progress and rejoice now with her parents in what she has already accomplished.

A Chaikovsky Festival for Symphony Hall

Series of Five Concerts to End Season of Orchestra Next Week

ENCLOSED in the program book for the concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon is an announcement of a Chaikovsky Festival with which the season of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be brought to a conclusion next week. Five concerts will make up the festival series. Three of them will be in the regular subscription courses, that of Monday night and those of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The other two, to be given on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon, will be open by invitation to subscribers. For the three subscription concerts single tickets will be available at the box office. Two soloists have been invited by Dr. Koussevitzky to join the orchestra: Josef Lhevinne, pianist, for the First Concerto, which will be played on Wednesday evening; and Maria Kurenko, Russian soprano, for the group of songs with piano, to be included in the program Thursday afternoon.

The programs for the festival are as follows:

MONDAY EVENING
- Serenade for String Orchestra
- Symphony No. 4 in F minor

WEDNESDAY EVENING
- Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor
  (Soloist: Josef Lhevinne)
- Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique"

THURSDAY AFTERNOON
- String Quartet No. 1 in D major
- Songs with Pianoforte
  (Soloist: Maria Kurenko)
- Trio for Violin, Violoncello and Pianoforte

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND SATURDAY EVENING
- Symphony No. 1 in G minor
- Symphony No. 5 in E minor

Post

URDAY, APRIL 21, 1

SYMPHONY NEARS END OF SEASON

Make-Shift List of Good Music Is Offered

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That no one of the four pieces which made the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert required arduous or extensive preparation may be taken as a sign that next week's Tchaikovsky Festival has already begun to occupy the attention of conductor and orchestra.

ENDS WITH BACH FUGUE

From the programmes of the Beethoven Cycle that this year filled the concerts of Tuesday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky took for yesterday and this evening's list the little-played overture to the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and the Eighth Symphony. Out of the current repertory came the suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," and Respighi's full orchestral transcription of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue served as cap-stone and conclusion to the whole.

The Eighth Symphony of Beethoven is prevailingly light and playful, standing as a sort of intermezzo between the Seventh and the Ninth. Yet this lightness and playfulness is at times more apparent as one scans the pages of the score than when the piece is actually heard in the concert hall. To accuse Dr. Koussevitzky of misreading the music would be grossly unfair. The real culprit was Beethoven himself, whose heavy-handed treatment of the orchestral strings often clouds and obscures his musical design and thought. To the First and Second Symphonies Dr. Koussevitzky has more than once brought a revealing clarity and transparency by the simple expedient of reducing the string choir. The Eighth, particularly in the first and final movements, would likewise benefit by such treatment.

Thomas' Suggestion

Theodore Thomas once suggested that the day might come when Beethoven's ineptitude as orchestrator, for which his deafness was partly responsible, would banish his symphonies from the concert-room. There seems little likelihood that this will happen within the lifetime of any of us, though some day conductors may re-score Beethoven as they now re-score Schumann. But for some reason Beethoven's overtures escape the reproach of orchestral roughness and clumsiness that his symphonies occasionally merit.

The "Prometheus" Overture is a case in point. Admittedly the piece is lesser Beethoven, but it sounds. Yesterday it seemed even brilliant. Dr. Koussevitzky's revival of it was a happy thought.

Bach Never Old-Fashioned

Beethoven with Beethoven's orchestration, whether in symphony or overture, is less modern in spirit and feeling than is Bach, as orchestrated by the resourceful Respighi. Not a little of Bach's music, this Passacaglia, for example, has a peculiar timelessness; it does not "date." Many a piece written since the turn of the century is essentially more old-fashioned.

Already much of de Falla's suite, brilliantly played yesterday, seems hackneyed in a way that the great Passacaglia and Fugue, enthusiastically received yesterday, would not seem in another two hundred years.

Globe
Globe apr 21

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven, Manuel De Falla, and Johann Sebastian Bach stood side by side upon the program of the Symphony concert yesterday. Bach had the last word, the best, and the loudest through Respighi's orchestral transcription of the great Passacaglia and Fugue.

When a man tries to orchestrate some work of a dead master and fails to dress it properly, he is usually accused of "sacrilege"; when his instrumentation pleases those of analytical propensities he is congratulated on being a "master of modern instrumentation who has made available a great work to the many who otherwise might be deprived of hearing it." Respighi achieved a splendid example of orchestral writing and therefore remains open to felicitations.

When the present version was first played in Boston, at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's 52d season, the present reviewer was deeply impressed by its several qualities; that of skilled writing, of its employment of vast sonorities without essential distortion of Bach's ideas, and the prevailing clarity which Respighi succeeded in maintaining in spite of the closely-woven counterpoint. At that time Dr Koussevitzky's painstaking reading was, of course, partly responsible for the total effect; the same was true yesterday.

Respighi delights to heap sonority upon sonority until it seems is if the tension could not further be increased, but he does it with an artist's instinct for knowing when he has gone far enough. He has preserved the inherent majesty of Bach's music. No man can say whether it was realization of this achievement, or simply because the fugue ends with a triple forte chord, that aroused extremely warm applause at the end of the concert; at any rate, there were stamping, clapping of hands, and a few cheers.

There was no new music on the program, which began with the "Prometheus" overture of Beethoven and continued with his delectable Eighth Symphony, in F major. These two compositions are likely to be regarded as "lesser" Beethoven because neither is tragic nor profound in mood, nor particularly substantial in material. The overture was written when Beethoven was about 30; it does not attempt the dramatic delineation of the overtures composed for the opera "Fidelio," or that of the "Coriolanus" overture; it does not possess the transparency of form which distinguished the instrumental prelude to the music for "Egmont." But as goes without saying, it is a finely wrought score and pleasing from beginning to end. That, surely, is sufficient.

The Symphony partakes of the exuberance which permeates its predecessor, the Seventh Symphony, although there is an inexplicable reminiscence of the grace, the melodic symmetry and the formalism of 18th Century music. These qualities, interspersed with the jocularity and the caprice which Beethoven could summon when he wished, furnish a music that seemingly is incomparable. The manner in which any creative mind functions—and particularly that of Beethoven—defies explanation. Dr Koussevitzky played both scores pleasurably.

De Falla's music for the ballet "Love, the Sorcerer" needs the adjuncts of dancing and settings for complete appreciation. No matter how individual the score, or how peculiarly beautiful, it does not convey a coherent idea of the story. Nor is it so organically unified as to communicate its effect purely as music, as the "Petrouchka" and "Rite of Spring" of Stravinsky are able to do. Yesterday's performance was one of orchestral virtuosity. One hopes that Dr Koussevitzky might next season play "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," an exceptionally evocative work.

The final concerts of the season, next week, will be part of the Tchaikovsky festival. The Fifth Symphony, in E minor, and the first, in G minor, a "program" symphony called "Winter Day Dreams" and virtually unknown nowadays, will be played.

C. W. D.

AMUSEMENTS

ELL chestra, fe-voice was of Severme of the symbolic stones which uilding. As
music, alysis, be
. Be it stands
The choral
Cecilia So-poken part
David Blair
ith Beet-
Bach
"Komm,
and the
The last to phono-
very fine
conductor
Beethoven
h Mr. Stogs with it,
results.
laying was Valasek, and who is
In this all over play is fine tech-and, ap-ship. He companist who has g to play occasion.
e of the fiddler
m which

152

Program by Symphony Is Short

All Selections Connected with World of the Dance

Trav Apr 21

For the next to the last of this season's regular Friday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor, selected a rather short and decidedly interesting program. It included Beethoven's overture to the ballet "Die Geschopfe des Prometheus" ("The Creatures of Prometheus"), his symphony No. 8 in F major, de Falla's suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), and Bach's Passacaglia and fugue in C minor as transcribed for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi.

Somewhat unusually and yet quite appropriately, considering the recent visit of the Ballet Russe, every one of the selections played was connected directly or indirectly with the world of the dance. Beethoven's ballet overture and de Falla's suite were written with the art of ballet dancing obviously in the composers' mind.

The Bach passacaglia and fugue in C minor likewise had a rhythmic dance basis. The passacaglia as defined was a "species of chaconne, a slow dance with diviisons on a ground-bass in triple rhythm." Philip Hale in his program notes further pointed out that a passacaglia "was originaly a Spanish or Italian dance in triple time." Bach chose a theme of eight measures. They varied some 20 times and were skilfully scored by Respighi.

The dance was again to be found hidden in the light, often humorous and always pleasing eighth symphony of Ludwig Von Beethoven. The first movement, "Allegro vivace e con brio" had much of the general character of a slow waltz. The second movement, of course, contained the "three-voice circular canon or round" theme said to have been based on a canon "Ta, ta, ta, lieber Maelzel," reputedly sung "in honor of the inventor of the metronome." Again the third movement, "Tempo di menuetto," had much of the style of a dainty, playful minuet.

With such a beautifully and craftily designed concert program the enjoyment of the audience in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon was not to be wondered at. The Beethoven symphony had been heard recently, at the fifth of the Beethoven cycle afternoons on Tuesday, March 27. The Beethoven overture to the ballet was last performed at the regular Friday series in October, 1919. Dr. Koussevitzky has already demonstrated his mastery of Beethoven this season.

The de Falla suite from "El Amor Brujo" was effectively interpreted, the music creating in the mind of one listener, at least, surpassingly delightful choreographc pictures of dancers in action. The polished piano playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma was deserving of more than passing mention.

To some, the powerful, moving climax of Respighi's transcription of the Bach work must have been the highlight of the afternoon. To this reviewer, however, the use of the organ seemed unnecessary, and the clarity of the Bach composition a bit jumbled.

With the programs yesterday was announcment of a Tchaikovsky festival to be given by the orchestra this coming week as fitting conclusion to the present season. Dr. Koussevitzky excels at interpreting Tchaikovsky and the five "Festival" concerts should reveal him at his greatest. In addition there will be accomplished soloists Need more be said?

W. T. C., Jr.

GODING-THIEDE-ZIESE TRIO

On their program at Jordan hall on Monday evening, April 30, the Goding-Thiede-Zeise trio will include a work by the Spanish composer, Joaquin Turina, who was born in Madrid in 1882 and who was the founder of the Madrid quintet, a celebrated chamber music organization. The Turina trio is in the nature of a fantasy in three movements. It won the first prize in the international competition in 1926 and was played at the Frankfort international festival of chamber music in 1927. This work has been heard only once before publicly in Boston—at a concert of the Flute Players Club about three years ago.

The Goding-Thiede-Zeise trio is composed of Howard Goding, pianist; Alex Thiede, violinist, and Karl Zeise, 'cellist. The balance of the program for their Jordan hall recital will be the Beethoven trio in D major, Opus 70, Nol, and the Brahms trio in B major, opus 8.

Trans

Y, APRIL 21, 1934

d Players -

Afternoon Mainly from The Classics

With De Falla to Round Out A Program from Bach And Beethoven

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday devoted itself, with one exception as a splash of color, to the classics. Beethoven in an overture ("The Creatures of Prometheus") and a symphony (No. 8 in F major), Bach in the gigantic Passacaglia and Fugue (Respighi's arrangement) were the classics. The color was provided by the suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorceror."

The Beethoven of the afternoon, both in overture and symphony, was Beethoven in elegant vein. Not at any time was there a touch of passion. Never was this Beethoven hurling thunderbolts or smiting heavy blows. The light touch, the deft, gentle hand are the guiding forces in both these works. It is almost as though Beethoven in the symphony were reverting to his early Mozartean style—but with a difference due to the years of experience, the years of the writing of heaven-storming music through which he had passed. Perhaps it is not unfair to describe this as a music such as Mozart might have written had he lived to be fifty or sixty years old.

It has been remarked before this—and will be remarked after this—that the symphony contains no slow movement. Instead, one finds both scherzo and minuet—the minuet which Beethoven is supposed long since to have discarded. Beethoven himself spoke of it as "a little symphony in F," in contrast to "a great symphony in A, one of my best"—the Seventh. Wagner's description of the Seventh as the "apotheosis of the dance" has become a by-word. But to one hearer yesterday the Eighth seemed as much informed with the spirit of the dance as the Seventh. It is a less tumultuous dance. It apotheosizes nothing. It is the dance of the graces rather than of the gods—or of humans turned to would-be gods.

The sheer charm of the performance of both overture and symphony was the outstanding quality through the first half of the program yesterday. The high degree of finish, the exquisite polish, which Dr. Koussevitzky has been wont to give to the playing of the orchestra these last few years, combined with the delicacy of Beethoven's writing in the two works, brought forth something exceedingly fine-grained, something as noteworthy (in an entirely different way) as when the conductor piles up his tremendous climaxes or launches into his breath-taking rhythmic drives.

One began to think soon that this program was one entirely devoted to the dance. Was not "Prometheus" the overture to a ballet? Did one not feel the spirit of the dance all through the symphony? Next came a suite using actual ballet music; and at the close a passacaglia, which is an actual dance form of ancient day. De Falla in "Love the Sorceror" (which the purists would prefer to name "Wedded in Spite of Witchcraft") tells the story of the beautiful and passionate Candelas, who in her love-making with Carmelo, is interrupted by the spectre of a former lover, now dead but not entirely gone. To enable him to give Candelas the kiss of perfect love without interference from the spectre, Carmelo places the pretty Lucia in the way of the latter. Of course he succumbs to her, while Carmelo gives to Candelas the kiss that forever banishes the spectre.

The music displays both graphic and suggestive treatment of the various elements associated with this plot: the gypsies at evening, the spectre, the dance of terror at his appearance, the story of a fisherman, sorceries at midnight, a dance of fire ritual to dispel evil spirits, the final lovemaking. Many and various are ways in which de Falla brings home these ideas in musical language. There is a sufficiency of solos for several of the orchestral instruments. There are languishing melodies. There is full suggestion of spookiness. There is at least one dance of violent, brutal energy, that of the fire ritual—most played single excerpt from this ballet. There is that peculiar combination of rhythm and melodic contour which we are gradually learning to regard as more Spanish than many a thing that has been offered us under that designation by this or that earlier composer. With this Spanish music the orchestra was as much at home as with the music of Beethoven. Native languishing melody as well as native violent rhythm Dr. Koussevitzky outlined and projected as though they might have been as natural to him as his own Russian.

Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue is one of the monuments of organ literature. Respighi in transcribing it wished above all to maintain, and evidently heighten, if possible, this monumental character. Thus his opening theme, in single bass line, is given to a considerable group of instruments rather than to a single solo voice. The same sense of bigness he clings to with remarkable consistency, even where the music grows soft. The feeling of spaciousness and grandeur never leaves us, even in the most quiet moments. Whether one believes or disbelieves in transcriptions from the Bachian organ music, one can hardly deny that Respighi has contrived most effectively to infuse the whole of his transcription with this mood of supreme and continued nobility. Even to an organist it is doubtful whether the organ has ever rendered it so faithfully.

All of this one might not have realized had it not been for the discerning interpretative powers of Dr. Koussevitzky, joining hands with Respighi and with Bach. The high emotional level upon which Bach and Respighi placed their work, he grasped at once; as quickly transmitted it to the farthest corners of Symphony Hall. Proceeding from this level, the climaxes must, of course, be unusual ones. The long lines leading to these climaxes the conductor preserved with all Bachian integrity. Slowly, gradually, but steadily they mounted. Until the two climaxes, at the end of the Passacaglia, and at the end of the Fugue, reached heights beyond belief. Single piece and whole concert thus reached their supreme moment in the very last measures. Not always can programs be thus fortunately planned. A. H. M.

MUSIC

Herald 21

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Beethoven—Overture to the ballet "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major; de Falla—Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"); Bach—Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor (orchestral version by Ottorino Respighi).

The Boston symphony season draws to a close. Yesterday the 23d regular program of the season was offered a numerous public in Symphony hall.

The Suite from de Falla's "El Amor Brujo" came almost as a novelty, as it had not been done here for several seasons. The performance showed that though the season has been a busy and taxing one, Dr. Koussevitzky has not allowed his zeal in the preparation of his programs to lag. Whatever he presents is given an unlimited amount of care. To us the music of de Falla gives definite pleasure and the conviction that his is an art of which Spain can be proud. Colorful, rhythmic and melodic ideas are projected in a warm and often fascinating manner by means of a skilful and subtle orchestral technique.

When Sir Henry Wood was in Boston this season he discussed with the writer the problem of orchestral transcriptions of organ works. He is of the opinion that there should not be an attempt to make an orchestra play like an organ. Rather should there be a frank and free translation of organ idioms into the most effective orchestral speech. That is the plan followed by Ottorino Respighi in his "interpretazione orchestrale" of Bach's great Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. The Passacaglia is neither more nor less than a series of variations on a "ground bass," a theme given out in the bass and for the most part restated there, each repetition being the structure upon which new ideas are formed by the upper voices. The early variations are of a pathetic beauty and are followed by others with a constantly expanding emotional and structural scheme. The Fugue is built on the theme of the Passacaglia and another of contrasting type. Whether one enjoys the Respighi version is a matter of taste. The general trend of Respighi's esthetics is not subtle. To us his literal sense of the majesty of the biggest moments in the Passacaglia and in the Fugue fails to express the proportions attained by Bach in the original.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave a very expressive reading of this work, allowing the theme in the Passacaglia to take care of itself, and drawing attention, without exaggeration, to the wonders of Bach's polyphony. The same can be said of his reading of the Fugue. It is the custom, especially with pianists who should know better, to thump out fugue subjects wherever they appear, thus obscuring much of the contrapuntal texture. There was, of course, none of this in the Koussevitzky rendition. The variations and the Fugue were built up with logical, but not pedantic, precision, terminating in sonorities that displayed the extraordinary powers of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

When Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was first played, it was considered too small. Some one told Beethoven that it was less of a success than his Seventh, to which he replied, "That is because it is so much better." This symphony and the Prometheus Overture were heard during the recent Beethoven cycle. Both find Dr. Koussevitzky in some of his happiest and most comprehensive moods.

A Tschaikowsky festival begins with next Monday's program, the final concert of the Monday evening series. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the symphony season concludes with a program which brings the seldom-heard G minor Symphony (No. 1) of Tschaikowsky and the same composer's popular Fifth Symphony.

Trav Apr 21

Mus

Foreword to The Festival Of Chaikovsky

The Composer and His Works To Be Played Next Week At Symphony Hall

THE coming Chaikovsky Festival, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will end its season next week, calls for reflections and facts about that composer. Anything highly original about him can hardly be expected at this late date. To the average concert goer, Chaikovsky represents the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, the Overture "1812," the Piano Concerto in B-flat minor, a few movements from the "Nutcracker Suite," perhaps a piano piece or two, a song or aria, a movement or two of chamber music. But there is much more to be discovered in Chaikovsky, and some of it will be heard next week.

Chaikovsky is one of the many composers whose school and college days prepared him for some other profession than that of music; he is one of the few composers who have been able to devote the days of their maturity entirely to musical composition, without feeling the economic need for teaching or other remunerative occupation. Since he was constantly composing, the total number of his compositions is large. Born in 1840, Chaikovsky graduated from the School for Jurisprudence in St. Petersburg (Leningrad) in 1859. He had received only such musical training as was deemed necessary for a Russian "gentleman." He was holding a position in the Ministry of Justice, when the evidence of his musical talent grew so strong that even his hard-headed father (an engineer) consented to his making music his life work. In 1865 he graduated from the Conservatory of St. Petersburg, the following year was offered and accepted a position as professor of harmony at the Conservatory of Moscow. He was also a newspaper critic for some years and in that capacity attended the first Wagner festival at Bayreuth in 1876. In 1877, after a nervous collapse which followed an extremely unfortunate marriage that lasted less than three months, he gave up his teaching and reporting, and devoted himself entirely to composition. He considered himself a very bad teacher, feeling that a prime requisite in a teacher must be the quality of patience, and that in patience he was woefully lacking.

From 1877 Chaikovsky had a powerful patron in Madame von Meck, a wealthy widow, who was interested in his music. She provided him with a pension for practically the rest of his life, engaged in a voluminous correspondence with him about his works and career, opened her estates to him for his vacations—but through all their lives, never met him. The Fourth Symphony is dedicated to her—"to my best friend."

What of his three symphonies which precede the three now in the usual repertory? Of them, the Third, with certain Schumanesque qualities, is the least Russian, but was at one time very popular. Its performance in New York in 1879 served to call the attention of America to Chaikovsky. The Second Symphony has been spoken of as "perhaps the most distinctively national of all Chaikovsky's works." Mrs. Newmarch observes that it "has been aptly called the Little-Russian Symphony, because its first and last movements are based on Malo-Russian melodies." Each of these two symphonies has had a single performance at Symphony Hall.

The First Symphony—to be performed Friday and Saturday for the first times by this orchestra—is the first work Chaikovsky wrote, without the supervision of teachers, after graduating from the conservatory. The composer is said to have retained a more than ordinary fondness for it throughout the rest of his life. It is a symphony with a title—in the Russian "Zimnia grozi" (in a supposedly literal translation "Winter Storms"), but published with the French and German titles, "Rêverie d'Hiver," and "Winterträume" ("Winter Dreams"). The first movement bears the further title, "Dreams of a Winter Journey"; the second, "Rugged Cloudland." A scherzo and a finale follow. It is a longish work in which all the later Chaikovskian stylistic traits are in evidence, though there is still a certain immaturity in the technical handling of the material. It is indeed a stroke of genius in program making that Dr. Koussevitzky is to couple this earliest of the large works of the composer with the symphony which is probably his masterpiece—the Fifth.

Monday's program contains, in [illegible]dition to the popular Fourth Symphony, the String Serenade, Opus 48. Of this serenade—in four movements—it is sufficient to say that it has been liked from the first wherever it has been played.

Wednesday's concert combines two popular and well-known works, the Piano Concerto in B-flat Minor (Josef Lhevinne, pianist) and the Pathetic Symphony. It is of interest to Bostonians that the concerto had its first performance here in 1888 with Hans von Bülow as pianist. The concerto had been written for and dedicated to Nicholas Rubinstein. But this musician's harsh criticism of the work so irritated the composer that he removed the dedication and proceeded toward the publication of the score. A little later, when Von Bülow expressed his delight with the concerto, Chaikovsky dedicated it to him. Von Bülow was just at the point of departure for an American tour, and Boston was the first place at which he played the new concerto.

The chamber concert on Wednesday evening contains, beside songs (Maria Kurenka, soloist) the early String Quartet, Opus 11, with the popular Andante Cantabile; and the mature Trio for Violin, 'Cello and Piano, Opus 50. This is an outstanding work of Chaikovsky. It was written after the death of the same Nicholas Rubinstein, to honor his memory. It runs in three movements—"Pezzo Elegiaco," a regular sonata-form which "combines symmetry of form with rhapsody of utterance"; a Theme with Variations; a Finale. The second movement derives its theme from the memory of an exceedingly pleasant day spent with Rubinstein. After the first performance of "The Snow Queen" in 1873, Chaikovsky, Rubinstein and several of the artists in the performance went for an excursion to a favorite resort in the vicinity of Moscow. Peasants soon gathered to watch the "great ones" eat a meal sitting on the grass. They were not rebuffed, but on the contrary were given sweets and wine. Eventually they were asked to sing. They responded with their folk songs and dances. One of the melodies heard on that day Chaikovsky used as the theme of this movement of his trio. The different variations are each supposed to represent some particular trait or characteristic of Rubinstein. It would, of course, be both difficult and unprofitable to attempt to trace these traits as they appear in the eleven variations. The Finale is a sort of epilogue to the whole work. It is contrapuntal in style, "risoluto" in spirit, rises to a magnificent climax, dies finally quietly into nothing. A. H. M.

Drama · Mus

Globe Apr. 22

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Tchaikovsky Festival Begins Tomorrow

A Festival devoted to the music of Tchaikovsky, which will bring the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conclusion, will begin tomorrow evening with the final Monday concert of the season. Dr Koussevitzky will thus add another to the series of festivals which he has given here, a distinguishing feature of his tenure. Upon this occasion the conductor will do honor to the music and the memory of his countryman, a music which Dr Koussevitzky much admires and which he interprets to perfection. Though nothing has been said upon the commemorative nature of the Festival, it could be logically regarded as an observance of the 40th anniversary of the death of the Russian composer, who succumbed to cholera in Saint Petersburg, Nov 6, 1893.

Five concerts altogether are announced: that of tomorrow evening, the "regular" Friday and Saturday concerts (at which the same music will be heard), and a program each on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon. According to Symphony Hall, single tickets are available for the three concerts in the subscription series, and the two additional concerts are "open by invitation to subscribers."

MARIA KURENKO

There will be two soloists, Maria Kurenko, soprano, and Josef Lhevinne, pianist. Both are Russian. Mr Lhevinne has previously been soloist with the Boston Symphony. His reputation as one of the outstanding pianists of an elder generation has long been established. Mme Kurenko has sung here in concert and with the Chicago Civic Opera Company, and a few years ago was widely known for radio work. Mr Lhevinne will be heard on Wednesday in Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto, that in B-flat minor. Mme Kurenko will sing a group of songs on Thursday afternoon.

The music of Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky, despite fluctuations in popularity among those of fastidious taste, continues to hold its place in the art of the 19th Century. Tchaikovsky's intellectual vacillation extended to his views upon the nationalistic ideas of Rimsky-Korsakov, Balakirev, Moussorgsky, Borodin, and Cui, the Russian "Five"; he never wholly approved their aims. His own work, therefore, reflects more than that of the "Five" a mingling of indisputable originality and electicism. His love for Italian music and that of Mozart influenced his style considerably. His own peculiar temperament is accountable for the prevalence of intense emotionalism, of introspective brooding, and frenetic expression of feeling in his more mature work. No one has ever matched the particular type of broad, half sensuous and half lacrimous melody, which characterizes parts of the Fifth and "Pathetic" symphonies, nor has any duplicated his style of writing for orchestra. Here he differs alike from the opulence of Rimsky-Korsakov and Wagner, and from the simpler style of the German "classic" composers, of which the last was Brahms.

Tchaikovsky did not dote on folksong, yet he employed tunes of Russian folk origin. The obvious introspection, melancholy, and even self-pity in Tchaikovsky's music have drawn abusive epithets from those of professedly stouter character. It all depends upon the point of view. He did not command the technical skill in symphonic writing possessed by Brahms, for example; a barer texture is to be found in the Tchaikovsky symphonies. Yet so well fashioned in their own particular way, so salient in thematic material, and so direct and moving in emotional expression are the last three of the six symphonies which Tchaikovsky wrote, that each deserves to be called a masterpiece. Here one has the temerity to oppose the beliefs of such musicians as Arturo Toscanini and Dr Muck, both of whom are known to dislike Tchaikovsky's work. But one suspects that this is a matter of temperament; the designation "masterpiece" is, after all, relative; it can be applied to art creations of diverse type.

In general, Tchaikovsky has suffered a decline in popularity during the last hard-boiled score of years. Yet there are indications that his musical stock is about to take a rise in the market of public esteem.

Dr Koussevitzky has not included on his programs any excerpts from the operas of Tchaikovsky, but he has selected the First Symphony in G minor (entitled "Winter Day-Dreams"), a work almost unknown today. Tchaikovsky wrote many operas, but aside from a few arias occasionally sung in concert, they have experienced the neglect in this country from which Russian opera in general has suffered.

The programs for the Festival follow:

Tomorrow—Serenade for String Orchestra; Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

Wednesday Evening—Piano Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, soloist, Josef Lhevinne; Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic."

Thursday Afternoon—String Quartet No. 1, in D major; songs with piano accompaniment, soloist Maria Kurenko; Trio for Violin, Cello and Piano.

Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening—Symphony No. 1, in G minor; Symphony No. 5, in E minor.

The Tchaikovsky Festival

Adv Apr 22

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra season will close this week with a Tchaikovsky Festival. It will comprise five concerts: the subscription concerts on Monday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and two concerts open by invitation to subscribers, on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon. Single tickets are available for the three subscription concerts included in the Festival.

Soloists in Festival will be Maria Kurenko, the Russian soprano, and Josef Lhevinne, the pianist who has a special reputation as an interpreter of this composer.

Dr. Serg Koussevitzky will present the following program:

Monday evening, April 23:
Serenade for String Orchestra.
"Manfred" Symphony (1st movement).
Wednesday evening, April 25:
Pianoforte Concert No. 1 in B-flat minor.
(Soloist: Josef Lhevinne).
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Pathetique."
Thursday afternoon, April 26:
String Quartet No. 1 in D major.
Songs with Pianoforte.
(Soloist: Maria Kurenko).
Trio for Violin, Violoncello and Pianoforte.
Friday afternoon, April 27, and Saturday evening, April 28:
Symphony No. 1 in G minor.
Symphony No. 5 in E. minor.

Richelieu Manson Hamlet

Tchaikovsky Feast to Bring to End Symphony Season---Music of Week

Post Apr 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The feast of Tchaikovsky, with which the Symphony Orchestra ends its season, begins tomorrow evening with the last concert of the regular Monday series, and includes—as already announced in these columns—special concerts open by invitation to subscribers only on the succeeding Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon, and ends with the last concerts of the year, those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week.

It was suggested earlier in the year that Dr. Koussevitzky might find room in this Tchaikovsky festival for some of the less familiar music of the Russian composer: excerpts from his operas, for example. In the main, however, it will be the familiar Tchaikovsky who is here represented. The fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies will all be played, as will the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto.

* * * *

The one novel item, so far as the symphony concerts are concerned, will be the first symphony, in G minor, which received its initial hearing in this city two or three years ago at a concert of the orchestra of the MacDowell Club under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. This symphony will be paired with the fifth on the programme that Dr. Koussevitzky has designed for the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Not since 1920 has the "Manfred" symphony, after the poem of Byron, been heard in Symphony Hall. The first movement of that symphony will be played tomorrow evening, together with the Fourth Symphony in its entirety and the serenade for string orchestra, itself unheard at a regular symphony concert since 1918.

* * * *

The soloist in the pianoforte concerto will be Josef Lhevinne, an eminent pianist whom we have not heard in several seasons and who is something of a specialist in the music of his countrymen. This notable reappearance will take place at the concert of Wednesday evening, when the concerto will be companioned by the "Pathetic" Symphony.

* * * *

Thursday's concert—also as already predicted—will be non-orchestral. There will be a performance of the first string quartet in D major, Opus 11, that of the celebrated Andante Cantabile. While not announced as yet, the performers will undoubtedly be the Burgin Quartet. The elegiac trio of the famous theme and variations for violin, violoncello and pianoforte, dedicated to the memory of Nicholas Rubinstein, will be played at this concert, and between these two pieces of chamber-music will come a group of Tchaikovsky's songs sung by Maria Kurenko, Russian soprano.

* * * *

Between next Saturday and the following Wednesday evening Symphony Hall will undergo what is now its annual change from winter to summer raiment, in preparation for the lighter and livelier Pop concerts which begin their 49th season, and their fifth under Mr. Fiedler's direction on the evening of Wednesday, May 2. Eighty-five members of the orchestra will once more serve Mr. Fiedler's wishes. The conductor has in preparation novel music of importance, but he will by no means neglect the old favorites. There will be many special nights and special programmes. As in the past refreshments will be served at tables on the floor and in the lobby of the balcony.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 22 1934

TCHAIKOVSK' FESTIVAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra season will close this week with a Tchaikovsky Festival. It will comprise five concerts: the subscription concerts on Monday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and two concerts open by invitation to subscribers, on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon. Single tickets are available for the three subscription concerts included in the Festival. Soloists in the Festival will be Maria Kurenko, the Russian soprano, and Josef Lhevinne, the pianist who has a special reputation as an interpreter of this composer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the following programmes:

Monday evening, April 23: Serenade for String orchestra, "Manfred" Symphony, first movement, Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Wednesday evening, April 25: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. Soloist, Josef Lhevinne. Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique."

Thursday afternoon, April 26: String quartet No. 1 in D major. Songs with pianoforte. Soloist, Maria Kurenko. Trio for violin, violoncello and pianoforte.

Friday afternoon, April 27, and Saturday evening, April 28: Symphony No. 1 in G minor, Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
AMERICAN

APR 22 1934

Henrietta Schumann Refuses Boston Offer to Keep Faith

Holding fast to a point of honor, and keeping faith with an organization which features her as headline attraction, brought this past week to Henrietta Schumann, concert pianist of New York and Syracuse, one of the keenest disappointments of her musical career.

HENRIETTA SCHUMANN

Invited by Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to appear as soloist, playing a Tschaikowsky Piano Concerto with that eminent group during the forthcoming Tschaikowsky festival at Boston, Miss Schumann felt compelled to refuse the honor.

Loyalty to her contract with Roxy, under whose management her company of artists is booked for a 14 weeks' tour of many large cities, the straightforward girl reluctantly explained her situation to the great leader, and she will fulfill her engagement in Buffalo instead of shining in the cultural light of the Hub city, an eastern music center.

However, there is a silver lining to the present cloud, and Koussevitzky has her promise for a solo appearance with the Boston Symphony next season. To an ambitious artist of exceptional talent such as Miss Schumann undoubtedly is, the acquisition of fame of the highest artistic value in appearing in this cultural city is simply an aspiration deferred.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 22 1934

PROGRAM SELECTIONS OF VITAL IMPORTANCE IN RECITAL'S SUCCESS

Visiting Orchestras Should Be Requested to Play Music Scored for a Larger Orchestra Than Our Symphony

THE BOSTON AND THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRAS, when visiting Washington in the future, should be requested to stress on their programs symphonic works which cannot be played by our Washington orchestra, as yet, due to the lack of the required number of instruments. There are dozens of compositions in this category, among which we mention the "Pagan Poem," by Loeffler; "Gurre Lieder," by Schoenberg; "Poeme de l'Extase," by Scriabine, and several works of Richard Strauss, notably the "Don Quixote," "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Ein Heldenleben." These works could not otherwise be heard in Washington.

Why import, at great expense, 109 musicians all the way from Boston, to present a program like that of the last Boston Symphony concert in Washington, when the National Symphony Orchestra can play it nearly as well, provided the genius of Koussevitzky could be won to conduct it in the same program.

If the conductors of visiting orchestras continue to present scores that are within reach of our Washington orchestra it would be a simpler and less expensive solution to import the conductors only. This procedure may attract additional funds for enlargement of the National Symphony Orchestra and would greatly enhance its standing in the music world.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

R 22 1934

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

One need search no further for good moderns than the two ultra-modernistic compositions played at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's ballet suite, "Daphnis and Chloe." Both of these works abound in discord and in figures of musical speech to which we are not accustomed, but we venture to say that there were very few in that enormous audience who did not "like them." This is in part explained by the fact that the music was swiftly moving, that it glowed with scintillating brilliance and throbbed with vibrant tone color of superb quality. We may accept these works as among the best of good moderns. And perhaps it may be well to be content with this claim and refrain from citing music which is not so good, which is less interesting from a musical point of view and which is far from pleasing. This brings us down to the definition of what music really is, a thing of which many pages have been written.

One must insist that to be musical, sound must be pleasing and that without music being pleasing it cannot be good or even be music. It is really beyond the pleasing of individual tastes, for some persons have unusual tastes. For example it is well known that very many persons enjoy the barking of dogs, a thing which certainly breaks many friendships and occasions much "family trouble." To some the sighing of the wind among the trees brings no sense of enjoyment and the trickling of a rivulet sets in motion no happy thoughts. On one occasion this writer rejoiced in a most magnificent sunset, the sky overcast with most magnificent gold and purples, a rapturous sight. Yet there were none to pause and admire. But let a little smoke be seen coming from the cellar window of a hovel and in five minutes there would be a gallery of several hundred bystanders.

On a recent occasion this writer was overtaken by four charming and beautiful young ladies who had evidently reserved an important question for such a chance meeting. "Whose opinion," they said, "should be the one to accept when there is a disagreement as to the excellence of a piece of music or its performance?" The answer to this should be, "his who has the best reasons for his thinking." There is not enough conversation about music, too little interchange of ideas on musical subjects, which above others should offer opportunities for personal views and even argument. Too often there is a pronouncement of a like or dislike without explanation or reasons for one's thinking. A fund of knowledge cannot be built up in this way.

Changes Taking Place

To better understand the position that is occasionally taken by advanced thinkers in music it is interesting to note changes which are taking place in art and letters. There are basic principles of coherence, form, composition and symmetry which are common in all the arts. Whenever one is in doubt about the subject of a picture one may safely assume that the painter has failed in his mission. Whenever one cannot discover the thread of plot or subject matter in a story it is not worth the reading. Whenever any writer fails to show due attention to the rules and customs of rhetoric his work will be neither interesting nor readable. Whenever a writer fails in the employment of suitable punctuation his story will lose point and form. Yet there are today books being written with scanty punctuation and without any attempt at literary form.

Of course the prime consideration of any work of art is its subject matter. If it be a picture one must admit that a beautiful nature scene has more charm than a mere house made with hands, and that a picture is greater than the picturesque. And the human figure must be considered a finer subject than a domestic animal or an inanimate object. In music one finds similar contrasts in the splendors of oratorio or opera, with the rich possibilities of a varied and alluring libretto. In a symphony or symphonic poem one sees in these larger forms the elaboration of musical sentences and an assembly of "movements" of varying character and development. And as one goes into the smaller forms, with their less elaborate music and simpler material, one may contrast them with a simple house rather than a gorgeous place. But when shorn of their ornaments and grandeurs the structures of form and thematic material of great works still remain and it is upon these that the musical worth of the composition depends.

Oscar Ekeberg

Will conduct massed choruses in opening program of "Music Week," Sunday afternoon, May 6, in Sayles Hall, Brown University.

Now originality of tune or thematic material has always been the sine qua non of fine composers of all time. Not until the present day have music writers who would like to be called composers put aside these fundamental principles of composition very much as sculptors have transposed curves into angles and writers, beautiful and well expressed thoughts into jargon. These endless strivings for effect, illogical and heterogeneous tonal association, lack sincerity and character. Many of them are not worthy of being called music and even now works which have been hailed as significant of the dawn of a new era are already falling into obsolescence and obscurity. They have not even endured a decade. They have not done their sponsors credit and they have injured rather than enhanced the reputations of their authors. One thought that they would not endure, but it was not to be supposed that they would perish so soon. Already a long suffering public is rejoicing at the wane of jazz. Whatever lessons of rhythmic punctuation and verve this style of music has taught us, its popularity is waning and musical sobriety and sense are taking their places. This is due not only to the inferiority of the music itself but also to the hopeless vulgarity of the performance from crooners and personalities or the most inferior type. The effect of music is inseparable from its components. Presentation is even more potent than the music.

Voice of the People

The voice of the people is being heard on every hand. The press is most generous in opening its columns to "letters" in which listeners ease their minds in the hope that many feeble and plaintive voices will become a massive force for that desire for good music we now know to be inherent in the minds of all people. Not for long will the public be satisfied with mediocrity, not forever will it accept bad music or good music badly played.

It is interesting to note a very important feature in the audition of modern music. If even the "gosh awful" kind be played with spirit and verve it is often quite bearable and even interesting. But let the dissonances be played slowly, and the mind be allowed to analyze what it hears and the judgment is often adverse. This may be said to be a fundamental principle which this writer would urge as worthy of a test.

Surely a very great responsibility rests with those who select programs and recommend bad music for public performance. If the music be discordant such sponsors are deliberately lending their aid and assistance to those who would not only waste our time but would harm the cause of good music and insult our intelligence. The mind of today is an active one. There is far more critical analysis of music than might appear, and there are many who do not hesitate to assume the seats of the mighty in matters musical. The musical character does not differ from the estimation of other branches of thought. If brought into contact with the best of music most of the time it grows in riches of grace, but if exposed to musical thoughts of low degree it becomes degenerated and debased. Countless analogies may be made between music and the other arts, but with all its faults it is still one of the purest and most ennobling.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 22 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is the first major organization to announce its definite schedule for New York concerts next season, will give the usual five evening concerts (on Thursdays, with one exception) and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall, and five evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Carnegie Hall dates are Thursday evenings, November 15 and January 3; Friday evening, February 1; Thursday evenings, February 28 and April 4, and Saturday afternoons, November 17, January 5, February 2, March 2 and April 6. The Brooklyn dates are Friday evenings, November 16 and January 4; Thursday evening, January 31; Friday evenings, March 1 and April 5. All these concerts will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, in his eleventh season with this orchestra.

For their calm and self-possession in the Carnegie Hall concert of April 5, when fire in the basement filled the hall with smoke and offered the possibility of some commotion among the audience, the trustees of the Boston Symphony complimented Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra in the following letter, which was read aloud to them during a rehearsal in Boston:

To Dr. Koussevitzky and all Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Gentlemen—"Playing with fire" has more than one meaning. Sometimes it is a dangerous pastime. As we know it through you, it sets the spirit aflame.

"Playing against fire" is another thing. This requires the courage and self-mastery of well trained and well led troops. The Trustees have heard with pride of the manner in which the Conductor and the Orchestra met an emergency of fire and possibly great danger to a New York audience last week. May we express to each and all concerned in that emergency our warmest appreciation of the credit they brought to the Orchestra through a continued offering of men and music of the first order!

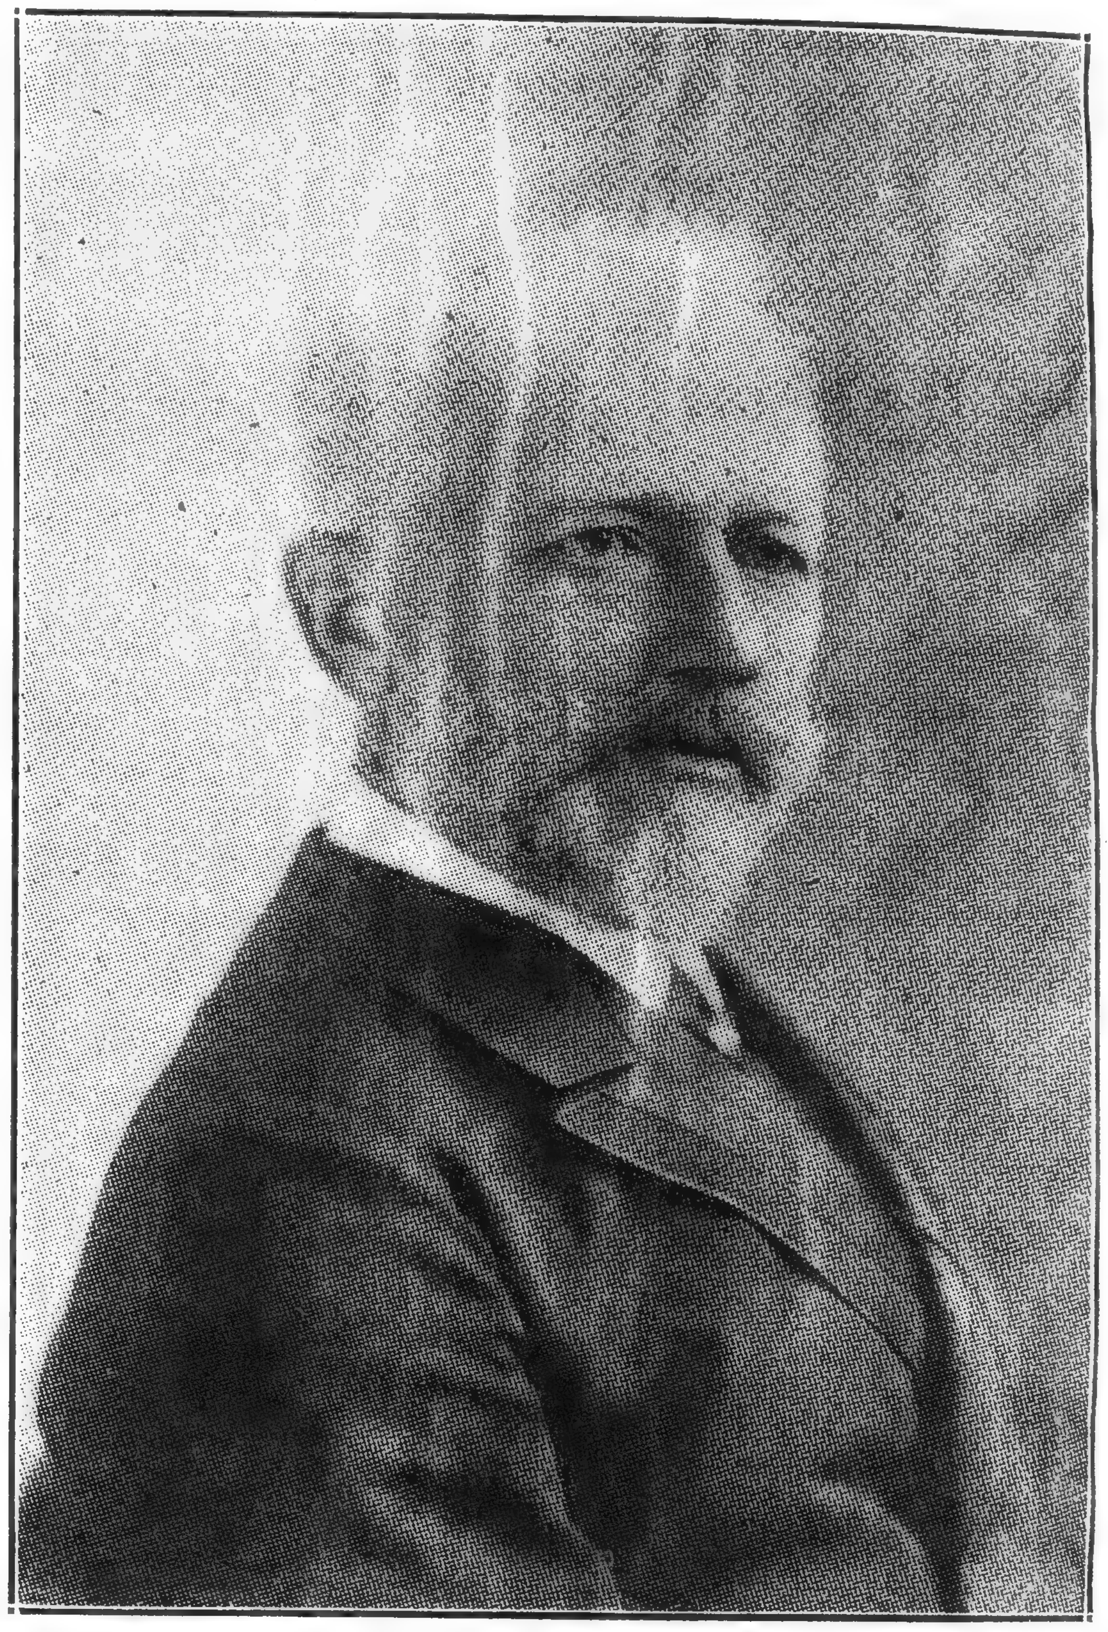
Faithfully yours,
BENTLEY W. WARREN,
For the Trustees.

The conductor and the players, despite the ominous smoke, pursued their program as if nothing was amiss.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

S === Plays and Player

Figure for a Festival



Chaikovsky

Whose Music Will Be Played at the Series of Concerts This Week at Symphony Hall

Request Programs

To the Editor of the Transcript:

After listening over the radio to Mr. Stokowski's "Request" programs, I am hoping that next season our distinguished conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, will give the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts the choice of a program or two. The first request of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra consisted of Brahms's Symphony No. 1, the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The second request program contained the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony and Brahms's Symphony No. 4—a thoroughly conservative list. Our programs are so much more modern and progressive than either Mr. Stokowski's or Mr. Toscannini's, that it would be interesting to see what the consensus of opinion here would produce for one or two request programs.

MABEL D. POST

Boston, April 21.

BUCYRUS, O.
TELEGRAPH FORUM

APR 23 1934

BRITON PRAISES U. S. AUDIENCES

LONDON—American musical audiences are praised to the limit by Sir Henry Wood, the famous British conductor. He has just returned from a visit to the United States where he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Never have I known an audience listen in such absolute silence," says Sir Henry. "There was not a rustle of a program, not a cough, not a movement of any kind. There was no need to tap my baton before beginning. So soon as I appeared on the platform there was absolute stillness."

Concert-going is the fashion in America, according to Sir Henry, who says that when he was in New York, the "house full" signs were up every night. The noticeable fact that practically the entire audience was in evening dress at the concert he attended, contrasted favorably with some English audiences, who were not always so meticulous.

Among other points he admired in the conduct of American concerts was the discipline of the orchestra. "There was never a moment's slackinb among the Boston Symphony, when I conducted it," he said. "They obeyed the slightest command with absolute precision. It was a real treat for me to be there."

---

regarded as a national misfortune.

This explains why Himmet Bey, a leading heavyweight, is suing for one million Turkish pounds (about $800,000) damages for a broken arm.

While training for the inter-Balkan championships, Himmet Bey had his left arm fractured. It was set by a Turkish doctor in a German hospital here. The joining was unsatisfactory, and Himmet Bey will wrestle no more.

The Turkish federation of wrestlers after consulting European sports federations, have helped Himmet Bey to instigate his suit.

155

24, 1934 Globe Apr 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky began last evening a festival devoted to the music of Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky by performing his Serenade in C major, Op 48 for string orchestra, and the Fourth Symphony, in F minor. The concert. incidentally, was the last in the Monday series. It was the first time that a Boston symphony festival has been opened at a concert in either of the supplementary series. The Monday audience, invariably demonstrative, applauded and stamped without restraint at the end of the symphony.

Tchaikovsky throughout his life held an almost fanatical admiration for the music of Mozart, and upon more than one occasion exemplified this admiration by deliberately writing in Mozart's style. The first movement of the C-major Serenade is such an example, although there actually is little of Mozart except in superficial details of instrumental and melodic style, a certain precision of form, and the fact that the harmony is for the most part relatively simple The introductory theme is ingenious built as it is upon the major scale, and simply but elegantly harmonized

The serenade is, as it was bound to be since its purpose is imitation, far from being a masterpiece, but it does reveal a side of the composer different alike from he who created the last masterly three symphonies, and the musician who wrote to order such ineffably meretricious stuff as the "1812" overture. The serenade does not run as deeply in what it attempts to express as do the symphonies or the admirable symphonic poems, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca da Rimini." Except for fleeting appearance of the frankly "gooey" sentiment proverbially associated with the 19th century, the serenade flows lightly and ingratiatingly, pleasing because of its sheer beauty of sound. Tchaikovsky himself voiced a personal fondness for the serenade, a fondness which may have exceeded the musical merit of the work. Even if that was so, it was plainly a case of the esthetic myopia to which artists of all sorts are occasionally subject when contemplating their own work. It generally requires someone else to appraise fully a work of art.

The performance was literally marvelous, in which the tone of the Boston Symphony strings was phenomenally rich and sonorous. Only from such a conductor as Dr Koussevitzky, who perceives the beauty of this music and who is qualified to re-create these beauties, can the Serenade be heard to full advantage. A perfunctory interpretation would be certain to conceal its beauty and to stress by contrast its weakness of ideas.

It seems doubtful that even Dr Koussevitzky has ever played the F minor Symphony in Boston so intensely as last evening. Every nuance, every emphasis of inner voices that would lend increased tension, received attention. Once or twice, in the feverish pace of the finale, one sensed an unpleasant proximity to incoherence. Yet the performance could not be called bombastic. It was, on the other hand, indescribably thrilling, just the sort of reading which the music demands. When Tchaikovsky spoke from the heart he did so in no uncertain terms, and that is just the manner in which a conductor should approach his scores. In Dr Koussevitzky's case, this must be something more than racial sympathy or understanding, rather a personal insight and temperamental affinity.

The composer's "program" seems in this hard-boiled day, childlike at best; the music itself, however, possesses distinguished themes which are worked upon and varied in a truly masterly fashion by one who knew how to score well for orchestra in his own way. Tchaikovsky was in no sense a Beethoven, a Wagner, or a Brahms. He was simply Tchaikovsky, whose method of writing was perhaps less sophisticated than theirs, yet a man whose musical character was as individual as any which flourished in the 19th century. You may not like the morbid quality of his music, his feverish emotion, but you ought to respect his particular genius. It is, after all, chiefly a matter of temperament.

The Festival will be resumed Wednesday evening, when Josef Lhevinne will be soloist in the B-flat minor Piano Concert. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct the "Pathetic" Symphony.

C. W. D.

Trans Apr 24

Plays an

Beginning a Festival, End Of a Season

Chaikovsky's Serenade and Fourth Symphony from Dr. Koussevitzky

TWO events of importance occurred at Symphony Hall last evening. Either would have been sufficient to make the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an outstanding one. In the first place, the concert was the concluding one in the interesting Monday series, the climax of a whole season of concerts. In the second place it was the opening concert of the festival of the works of Chaikovsky which is being given by Dr. Koussevitzky this week. A double occasion it was then, and doubly, it seemed, conductor and men were on their mettle. Dr. Koussevitzky has long been noted for the authentic quality of his readings of the works of this composer. The Russian in the one answers to the Russian in the other. The conductor becomes a great revealing force where Chaikovsky is concerned. The unique quality of the readings is enhanced by the fact that there are many others who cannot "do" their Chaikovsky at all, not even satisfactorily, let alone greatly. What an opportunity for music lovers, then, does this festival present.

No more than two numbers were on last evening's program. One was scarcely known to the present generation (its last previous performance was in 1918); the other was one of the old war horses of the symphonic repertory. It may be said that each of the other programs of the festival, save only that of Wednesday evening, divides equally between the known and the lesser known Chaikovsky.

The semi-novelty was the Serenade for Strings, Opus 48. It runs in four movements: a piece in the form of a sonatina, a waltz, an elegy, a finale on a Russian theme. The first movement has a certain amount of the weight which one ordinarily associates with a first movement. The musical ideas of the rest were lighter by far. The waltz might in part have come out of the pages of Johann Strauss. The finale was a Russian folk-dance of the most typical kind. Chaikovsky brings a degree of unity into the whole by repeating the introduction to the first movement as the epilogue for the whole.

But the interest of this serenade does not lie chiefly in its themes—not in the near-musical-comedy character of its waltz nor in the dance-like quality of its finale. The interest of the serenade lies in the sonorities, purely string sonorities, be it remembered, which the composer has been able to imagine and which the string choir of the orchestra under the guidance of Dr. Koussevitzky is able to return to us. Truly, one who has heard this orchestra at one time or another for almost fifteen years, has heard the string choir play repeatedly, felt last evening that he scarcely knew that string choir at all. Such depths of sonority! Would these players never strike bottom? Plumbing the lowest conceivable depths they still seemed as far from a "bottom" as when they had started. One could speak equally of the richness of the sonorities. In a very real sense the whole orchestra scarcely ever sounds fuller, and very often not as full, as in this serenade. Finally, one must make mention of the heats engendered. Probably nothing in the orchestra produces so intense a flame of passionate effect as strings playing in high register. Searing and scorching like white flame, the strings penetrate into the consciousness.

One should like to hear this serenade more frequently. Presumably the light character of certain portions of it keeps it from being played oftener. But the compensations which the string sonorities bring would surely atone for something far worse than this lightness. Here is an outstanding example of the dual marvel of music: the imagining power of the composer, who imagines supremely, but who must come to naught without the performer; the recreative artist, who is able to match his imagination with that of the composer, but who is likewise impotent without the composer. Never did two imaginations run higher and more closely together than those of Chaikovsky and Koussevitzky in planning and projecting these string sonorities.

The known piece on the program was the composer's Fourth Symphony, in F minor. It is one of the symphonies in which the conductor excels himself. And this was not a mere idle phrase when applied to last evening's concert. The importance of the occasion, the festival sense, the feeling of being at the year's climax for at least one audience, these were strong upon him. The Fourth Symphony was merely the vehicle wherewith he expressed himself. And how admirably it lent itself to such expression! It seemed last evening that everything about the symphony was intensified and yet everything was kept in proportion. Certainly a bigger or a more electric Fourth Symphony one has never heard.

The sheer virtuosity which Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi required and received was something at which to marvel. How could a hundred men maintain such paces and yet keep the music clean-cut and neat? But these hundred men did. How could the precision of the ensemble fail to suffer? But there was no lack of such precision. Never has it been proved more conclusively that the term virtuoso orchestra is also no mere idle phrase. Given this virtuosity, given the power of the Koussevitzkian impact which he released at its fullest upon this score, given his demonic driving power, and the furores and the tumults, the climaxes and the supreme moments which this symphony brought may well be imagined.

Then there was the audience. As much as the conductor this audience sensed that it was participating in an "occasion." The air of close interest, of actually taking part in what transpired, was strong upon it. It gave expression in the only way possible to it, by closest listening, by bursts of applause. For the third time in a single review one uses the expression "not a mere idle phrase,"—this time in saying that the audience gave the conductor and the orchestra an ovation after the playing of the serenade Dr. Koussevitzky returned to respond the usual number of times, then bade the orchestra stand to share the applause with him. But still it did not abate. Repeatedly he had to return, the men meanwhile remaining on their feet. After the symphony the whole took place once more in almost equal degree. Thus a season ended and a festival began.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

Herald Apr 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Tschaikowsky program: Serenade for Strings, op. 48; Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, op. 36.

The Tschaikowsky festival is under way. Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the last of the season's Monday series and the first of four Tschaikowsky programs to be given this week at Symphony Hall. The second concert brings Josef Shevinne as soloist in the Pianoforte Concerto in B Flat Minor, followed by the "Pathetic" Symphony. On Thursday afternoon there will be chamber music by the Burgin String Quartet and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, interspersed by songs, with Maria Kurenko, soprano. Friday afternoon and Saturday night the program consists of the First and Fifth symphonies. These two concerts will be the last of the symphonic season 1933-1934.

Tschaikowsky's Serenade had not been heard here since 1918. The changes that have come about in audiences and in the world of music in general gave the work the air of a novelty. Tschaikowsky himself seems to have had an affectionate regard for this serenade. It shows his uniqueability to prite a work for strings in four movements, without impoverishing his musical ideas. Only in the andante that precedes and follows the Allegro Moderato of the first movement, are there sonorities of peculiar effect. The treatment there seems like that of a string quartet multiplied, instead of having been originally intended for a whole string choir. The Valse has been called Vienese, Spanish, and commonplace. Whatever it is, it is not to be taken seriously. Orchestrally it exhibits traits that are specifically Tschaikowsian. The performance last night was excellent, giving cause for additional pride in the achievements of the Boston Symphony The string section never lacked in richness or delicacy. One single final chord wavered a bit in intonation, as if to prove how impeccable this orchestra's intonation usually is.

More than one person has said to himself the past week—we conwess to our full share of it—that the most unkind thing to do to Tschaikowsky is to have a festival of his works. Is Dr. Koussevitkky to be right again? As far as the first concert goes, we felt ourselves disarmed. When the conductor raised his baton last night to begin the F Minor Symphony, No. 4, there was something defying in the gesture; a sense that the unusual was about to happen.

And it did!

Last night's performance of this symphony surpassed any that we had ever heard. It was electrifying. With positive control, dominated by great dramatic intensity, as well as the dramatic power of contrast, Dr. Koussevitzky poured out the Tschaikowsky measures in a way that added to the composer's glory. There was no whining, no bickering in the Koussevitzky reading of this symphony. It was a powerful battle of values (from the first theme, followed by the almost Wotanesque stride of descending intervals) to the final measures. Surely the Boston Symphony has never played better. There was a kaleidescopic view of life in the language of Tschaikowsky, revealing the composer's emotions and his craftsmanship in their best light. Extremes of sound that degenerate into noise and thereby lose power, have too often spoiled this symphony. The scherzo is too often made an empty tour de force. None of these frailties were evident last night. The great success of the performance would not have been possible without the appeal Tschaikowsky evidently makes to Dr. Koussevitzky. That appeal translated itself into a magnetic presentation that caused conductor and orchestra to rise to new heights.

SDAY, APRIL 24, 1934

DOUBLE EVENT BY SYMPHONY

Monday Series Ends and Tchaikovsky Festival Begins

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Simultaneously at Symphony Hall last evening the Monday series of Symphony concerts ended and the long-heralded Tchaikovsky Festival began. Originally the programme was to have contained the first movement of the "Manfred" Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky has never conducted here, but this item was eventually dropped, and the list, as it finally stood, included only the Serenade for strings and the Fourth Symphony.

NOT SINCE 1918

The Serenade, if memory serves, was played under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction at a pension fund concert in his first or second season here. It had not been performed at a regular Symphony Concert since 1918. In a letter to his benefactress, Mme. von Meck, Tchaikovsky declared that in the first movement he had consciously imitated the style of Mozart. Actually this section is Mozartean in the degree that the G minor Symphony suggests Tchaikovsky. In fact, the whole Serenade is characteristic of the Russian composer; in the melancholy tinge of its chief melodies, in the repetition of rhythmic figure and in the idiomatic employment of the instruments. The performance of this grateful, agreeable music was both ardent and polished.

The Fourth Symphony is not to be ranked with the Fifth and Sixth. Much of its effect with a present day audience depends upon conductor and players. That the brilliant Finale aroused that of last evening to a high pitch of enthusiasm was due, then, quite as much to the performace as to the piece itself. Happily Dr. Koussevitzky did not on this occasion permit bass drum ond cymbals to drown out more important instruments. The final climax was one of large sonority, not of mere noise and din.

SECOND OF FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Tchaikovsky Concerto and Pathetic by Symphony

Post Apr 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

More Tchaikovsky, with more yet to come. The second concert of the Tchaikovsky Festival with which Dr. Koussevitzky appropriately rounds out his 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Symphony Hall last evening. Like the concert planned for this afternoon, that of last evening was in the nature of a present to those subscribers to the several series of Symphony Concerts whom the hall would accommodate. Needless to say, the demand for tickets exceeded the supply.

CONCERTO AND "PATHETIC"

Two pieces made the programme: B-flat minor concerto for piano and orchestra, with Josef Lhevinne as the soloist, and the "Pathetic" Symphony. To the extent that the performance of this concerto a few seasons ago by Vladimir Horowitz was sensational and electrifying that of Mr. Lhevinne last evening hardly deserves such characterization. Though lacking in neither fire nor brilliance, as such things are commonly understood, Mr. Lhevinne's playing was nevertheless more conspicuous for its musical and musicianly qualities. If in the matter of breadth and power it did not fail the composer, it gave him full measure and more when delicacy and charm were in order. So played, the concerto assumed new beauty and dignity, regained a place and position that had been slipping from it.

In this deed of ennobling the concerto Mr. Lhevinne was aided at every turn by Dr. Koussevitzky, who seems always to reflect—as rightly he should—the temper of a soloist.

Polish and Power

With the "Pathetic" the conductor once more proved himself unapproachable as an interpreter of Tschaikovsky. The more superficial Tschaikovsky who still sways the multitude with his frenzies and his passions receives his due at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands, but so does the Tschaikovsky who was master of form and of significant detail. Like that of the concerto before it, the performance of the symphony had polish as well as power. Yet that both performances were of a nature to stir an audience was amply proven by the applause that followed them.

For pianist and conductor there were many recalls. Nor was a greatly deserving orchestra overlooked.

$102,741 GIFT TO SYMPHONY

Orchestra's Deficit Wiped Out by Single Subscription

Post Apr 26

With the receipt of a subscription of $102,741—the largest subscription the orchestra has ever received in one year—the expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were practically covered, it was announced yesterday.

Next Saturday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring to a close the 53d season of the orchestra and his 10th season as conductor. In this season, the orchestra gave 112 concerts, which is five more than the schedule called for, and included a series of three each in Washington and Baltimore, which were so successful they will be repeated next season.

The 54th season of the orchestra will open in Boston on Oct. 12.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Her Apr 26

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Tschaikowsky program: Concerto for Pianoforte in B-flat minor; Symphony No. 6 in B minor. Soloist, Josef Lhevinne.

The second concert of this week's Tschaikowsky festival was played before a huge audience last night in Symphony hall. The Koussevitzky talent for program making is enviously alluded to in the press of other cities. Last night's concert was another example of the conductor's uncanny gift for planning and presenting programs of musical interest.

There is no doubt that Josef Lhevinne, who played the B-flat minor Tschaikowsky Concerto, is one of the greatest pianists of the day. This Tschaikowsky concerto has long been looked upon as Mr. Lhevinne's peculiar and personal vehicle, for he can play it as perhaps no other pianist before the public. He was not always at his best last night, but even those moments were superlatively fine. His success grew with each movement of the symphony. He was recalled many times after the finale, the applause mounting to a height and an intensity seldom heard in Symphony hall.

If Mr. Lhevinne has a fault, it is that he sometimes plays too much for himself, instead of for his audience. He has an almost unlimited range of tonal resources and an ease and facility of technique that are rather fabulous. But even the delicate parts of the slow movement of the Tschaikowsky have to be articulated in a less nebulous manner. It is one thing to play the pearly passages in such solo works as Liszt's F minor Etude de Concert. It is quite another thing to play a delicate passage amidst the colors of an orchestra. There were passages, particularly the end of the first movement and the end of the finale, where the orchestra was unquestionably too loud. No piano in its upper register can compete with unrestrained strings and other instruments in the same tonal vicinity. To the opening chords of the first movement, Mr. Lhevinne brought sonorities of unique power and depth. The principal theme of the second movement was played with rare beauty and unaffected sentiment. The orchestral accompaniment was nobly wrought.

Much has been written about Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Many musicians who have one-fourth the knowledge of music that is Donald Francis Tovey's, are inclined to look with disdain on Tschaikowsy. In his program notes to the "Pathetic," he has the following somewhat provocative remarks: "It is not for sentimental or biographical reasons that Tschaikowsky's sixth and last symphony has become the most famous of his works. Nowhere else has he concentrated so great a variety of music within so effective a scheme; and the slow finale, with its complete simplicity of despair is a stroke of genius which solves all the artistic problems that have proved most baffling to symphonic writers since Beethoven."

The Koussevitzky reading of the "Pathetic" is true to all that is greatest in Tschaikowsky. Here is a conductor who makes everything sound as it should from the proximity of the platform and at the same time projects his ideas with the greatest potency to the uttermost parts of the hall. The performance was wonderfully controlled but never restricted. The Boston Symphony played gloriously.

with Pau… MOVI…

Keith's

Miriam Winslow
director of the Miriam Winslow School
of the Dance, Inc.
presents her pupils in a review of the dance
at the Repertory Theatre
264 Huntington Avenue
Saturday, April 28, 1934
Matinee 2 P. M. Evening 8 P. M.
BENEFIT OF SCHOLARSHIP FUND
For Tickets Telephone Kenmore 5446
or Repertory Theatre Box Office

23

VINS HIM STAR ROLE

Koussevitzky and Shevinne Thrill Symphony Audience

By MOSES SMITH

The second Boston Symphony Tchaikovsky festival program, last night, was an even more exciting experience than the first. A capacity audience, invited from members of the orchestra's regular subscribing listeners, spent so much time applauding the performers that a program containing only the first piano concerto and the "Pathetique" symphony detained the audience through a longish evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was in fine form, his musicians played as possessed demons and the soloist was the distinguished Josef Lhevinne. The resultant music-making had the white heat of incandescence—echt Tchaikovsky, as the Germans would say.

Lhevinne had played this B-flat minor concerto with the same orchestra here in 1926. It has had performances here with other soloists under Koussevitzky. On each occasion, as last evening, it has been demonstrated that, no matter who the soloist, Koussevitzky dominates the performance by his superb drive. making the symphonic lines clear, with the soloist an integral unit of the group.

However much this procedure does violence to the customary rules of etiquette governing soloists' appearances, I am sure that no pianist objects to it in this instance. For the performance is immeasurably enhanced by it, gaining sweep and vitality quite impossible from mere "accompaniment." Certainly Mr. Lhevinne did not play as one strait-jacketed, but as an independent artist catching fire simultaneously with the conductor and the musicians.

Lhevinne's playing was brilliant—that goes without saying. It was spectacular, not in a cheap, showy manner, but by virtue of his unerring precision, bold attack and almost incredible bravura technique. The average pianist who has thumbed the pages of this concerto must have had a heart tremor at the daring speed with which the octave passages of the first movement were played. From the volume of applause that was let loose at the end I suspect there were many pianists in the audience.

Description of the performance of the "Pathetique" symphony resolves itself into the same, repetitious superlatives. If there is a reservation as to the possibly excessive speed of the march movement, that is a matter of personal taste and preference.

It loks like a series of unmitigated triumphs for Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra this week at Symphony Hall. Thus far the votes are unanimous.

THIS CLIPP…
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 26 1934

SINGLE GIFT PAYS DEFICIT.

Boston Orchestra Receives $102,741, Anonymously Given.

BOSTON, April 25 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced tonight that it had received a gift of $102,741 which was sufficient to meet the orchestra's deficit for the year.

The subscription, the donor of which was not disclosed, was the largest ever received in a single year, officials of the orchestra said, and will enable the organization to meet all expenses of the current season, the fifty-third, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring to a close on Saturday night.

The orchestra will have given 112 concerts for the season, including a highly successful series of three each in Washington and Baltimore.

Chaikovsky, Lhevinne and Koussevitzky

Transcript Apr 2…

Concerto with the Pianist as Soloist, and the Sixth Symphony

THAT the Boston audience has accepted the Chaikovsky Festival as a triumph of unusual proportions was plainly evident at the close of the special concert in Symphony Hall last evening. The unshakable popularity of this composer with the great mass of the listening public is acknowledged even by those who still attempt to dispute his right to a place in the sun. Yet the intensity of the ovations which Dr. Koussevitzky and the musicians have received has taken many people by surprise. No less revealing has been the brilliance of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's hand; long familiarity with the peculiar bond of national feeling and musical genius existing between composer and conductor has not been sufficient preparation for predicting the exact character of these festival performances.

Again last evening the program contained no more than two numbers—the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in B-flat minor, and the Sixth Symphony ("Pathétique") in B minor. As in the Monday concert, two items meant an abundance of everything. Mr. Josef Lhevinne, a notably sensitive and discerning musician and an infrequent visitor to this city, played the solo part in the Concerto. Friendly clapping greeted him; sustained and vigorous applause followed him from the stage; a pleasing tumult of approval recalled him repeatedly to the platform before his final departure. During the breath-taking third movement of the Symphony, the audience listened in a concentrated silence that betrayed an inward excitement. Yet the mood of profound pathos which Dr. Koussevitzky evoked in the final division exerted a strangely dampening effect upon the pent-up enthusiasm which the previous measures had aroused. There was an interval of silence as he quietly laid his baton upon the score. Then, a gradually mounting applause. There came, finally, as he made his way to and from the stage before a standing orchestra, bursts of shouting and stamping such as the Symphony Hall audience reserves for occasions of special moment.

Though the Concerto in B-flat minor is by no means a neglected score (it was played here as recently as 1931 with Mr. Horowitz as soloist), it is sufficiently unfamiliar to arouse curiosity and interest. To those who are mindful of the characteristic fulness of Chaikovsky's melodies and the richness of his orchestration, the instrumental piquancy of many passages of the Concerto have a peculiar and an appealing freshness. The separate choirs are often sharply outlined in a manner that has been described as quite modern; the Concerto is in many respects more modern than some of the composer's later pieces. It furnishes an excellent example of his penchant for insistent timpani passages. The strings have many firm-fibered unisons. The figuration is frequently curt and laconic. The woodwinds are strikingly individualized. There are marked contrasts of instrumental color and dynamics, while the versatility of the composer in thematic development is constantly present. It contains some weak stretches in scoring, it is true, despite Chaikovsky's reputed mastery of the orchestra; but it is generally diverting.

Mr. Lhevinne demonstrated that he is kin to Dr. Koussevitzky in understanding the interpretative demands which the music of Chaikovsky places upon the performer. The same emotions stir him; he knows the tonal language in which they are expressed. He believes in the sincerity of the composer. Thus, at every turn, a distinctive style and an inexhaustible technical resource served him last evening. He filled with needed breadth and power the plain chords which open the piece. His limpid tones in the Andantino did not lack firmness for all their neat and exacting shape. (An exceedingly refined touch is one of Mr. Lhevinne's characteristic virtues.) His fingers ran with the syncopated brightness of the final movement at the top of accent. Indeed, the appearance of Mr. Lhevinne at this concert proved to be one of the events of the season.

More familiar than the Concerto, the "Pathetic" Symphony is counted as Chaikovsky's masterpiece. Possibly the performance of it will be remembered as the principal ornament of the Festival; for Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared it in rehearsal with a thoroughness as to detail and honesty as to accent beyond what is generally expected even of the Boston Symphony. Strangely enough, it obtained eloquence as much through restraint and directness as through fervor released. In the opening Adagio, this restraint produced an atmosphere of inescapable sadness. The change to the quicker tempo was of dramatic force. The key to Dr. Koussevitzky's supremacy as an exponent of Chaikovsky, however, is the rightness of his rhythms and the inevitable character of his nuances. It is difficult to imagine the quality of motion in a more irresistible form than that in which it appeared in the Vivace of the Sixth Symphony. The tempo was amazingly rapid. It drove relentlessly forward as though power and speed had become a living force. More remarkable still was the fact that the musicians not only played the notes with an astonishing degree of accuracy, but with an emotional intensity that rose to meet that of the conductor.

N. M. J.

SYMPHONY HALL

Tchaikovsky Festival

Globe Apr 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tchaikovsky Festival was resumed last evening with performances of the B-flat minor Piano Concerto and of the "Pathetic" Symphony, otherwise called Symphony No. 6, in B minor. Josef Lhevinne was soloist in the Concerto.

The concert was open only to subscribers to the regular or supplementary series of Boston Symphony concerts. They were invited to apply for free tickets of admission. No seats were reserved. The same conditions will apply to the program of songs and chamber music to be given this afternoon at 2:30.

The hall was filled. Throughout the evening applause was frequent. But the loudest outburst was accorded Dr Koussevitzky at the end of the concert.

No such tribute was ever more deserved, for the conductor's reading was memorable. This symphony represents—to one listener, at least—the wholly emotional side of Tchaikovsky. It was played in like vein, but neither mushily nor vulgarly.

Mr Lhevinne played the solo part of Tchaikovsky's most popular piano concerto with the technical finish and interpretive persuasiveness to be expected from such a renowned master of the instrument. His reading lacked the spectacular elements of Mr Horowitz' interpretation, but it was most poetic, particularly in the second movement. Mr Lhevinne also came in for an ovation.

C. W. D.

$102,741 PLEDGED TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

Largest Subscription Ever Given in One Year

The receipt of a subscription of $102,741, almost covering this season's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is announced from Symphony Hall. This is the largest subscription the orchestra has ever received in one year. The amount fails only by $7000 of meeting the orchestra's complete expenses for the year past, to which must be added about $11,000 carried over from 1933.

The orchestra this season has given 112 concerts, five more than the schedule of the previous season, and as many performances as are possible within the time and energies of the orchestra and its conductor.

There have been 11 series in Boston and other cities, including series of three concerts each in Baltimore and Washington, which were so successful that they will be repeated next season. Three series showed an actual increase in attendance over last year. The four Boston series alone have found more than 1200 new subscribers to take places reluctantly and temporarily released by others.

Through the foresight and generosity of many friends, the orchestra is now fortunate in owning its own home. The acquisition of Symphony Hall has not increased the orchestra's financial responsibilities. On the other hand, it will result in certain economies.

The 54th season will open on Oct 12.

156

SECOND OF FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Tchaikovsky Concerto and Pathetic by Symphony

Post Apr 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

More Tchaikovsky, with more yet to come. The second concert of the Tchaikovsky Festival with which Dr. Koussevitzky appropriately rounds out his 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Symphony Hall last evening. Like the concert planned for this afternoon, that of last evening was in the nature of a present to those subscribers to the several series of Symphony Concerts whom the hall would accommodate. Needless to say, the demand for tickets exceeded the supply.

CONCERTO AND "PATHETIC"

Two pieces made the programme: B-flat minor concerto for piano and orchestra, with Josef Lhevinne as the soloist, and the "Pathetic" Symphony. To the extent that the performance of this concerto a few seasons ago by Vladimir Horowitz was sensational and electrifying that of Mr. Lhevinne last evening hardly deserves such characterization. Though lacking in neither fire nor brilliance, as such things are commonly understood, Mr. Lhevinne's playing was nevertheless more conspicuous for its musical and musicianly qualities. If in the matter of breadth and power it did not fail the composer, it gave him full measure and more when delicacy and charm were in order. So played, the concerto assumed new beauty and dignity, regained a place and position that had been slipping from it.

In this deed of ennobling the concerto Mr. Lhevinne was aided at every turn by Dr. Koussevitzky, who seems always to reflect—as rightly he should—the temper of a soloist.

Polish and Power

With the "Pathetic" the conductor once more proved himself unapproachable as an interpreter of Tschaikovsky. The more superficial Tschaikovsky who still sways the multitude with his frenzies and his passions receives his due at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands, but so does the Tschaikovsky who was master of form and of significant detail. Like that of the concerto before it, the performance of the symphony had polish as well as power. Yet that both performances were of a nature to stir an audience was amply proven by the applause that followed them.

For pianist and conductor there were many recalls. Nor was a greatly deserving orchestra overlooked.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Her Apr 26

Tschaikowsky program: Concerto for Pianoforte in B-flat minor; Symphony No. 6 in B minor. Soloist, Josef Lhevinne.

The second concert of this week's Tschaikowsky festival was played before a huge audience last night in Symphony hall. The Koussevitzky talent for program making is enviously alluded to in the press of other cities. Last night's concert was another example of the conductor's uncanny gift for planning and presenting programs of musical interest.

There is no doubt that Josef Lhevinne, who played the B-flat minor Tschaikowsky Concerto, is one of the greatest pianists of the day. This Tschaikowsky concerto has long been looked upon as Mr. Lhevinne's peculiar and personal vehicle, for he can play it as perhaps no other pianist before the public. He was not always at his best last night, but even those moments were superlatively fine. His success grew with each movement of the symphony. He was recalled many times after the finale, the applause mounting to a height and an intensity seldom heard in Symphony hall.

If Mr. Lhevinne has a fault, it is that he sometimes plays too much for himself, instead of for his audience. He has an almost unlimited range of tonal resources and an ease and facility of technique that are rather fabulous. But even the delicate parts of the slow movement of the Tschaikowsky have to be articulated in a less nebulous manner. It is one thing to play the pearly passages in such solo works as Liszt's F minor Etude de Concert. It is quite another thing to play a delicate passage amidst the colors of an orchestra. There were passages, particularly the end of the first movement and the end of the finale, where the orchestra was unquestionably too loud. No piano in its upper register can compete with unrestrained strings and other instruments in the same tonal vicinity. To the opening chords of the first movement, Mr. Lhevinne brought sonorities of unique power and depth. The principal theme of the second movement was played with rare beauty and unaffected sentiment. The orchestral accompaniment was nobly wrought.

Much has been written about Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Many musicians who have one-fourth the knowledge of music that is Donald Francis Tovey's, are inclined to look with disdain on Tschaikowsy. In his program notes to the "Pathetic," he has the following somewhat provocative remarks: "It is not for sentimental or biographical reasons that Tschaikowsky's sixth and last symphony has become the most famous of his works. Nowhere else has he concentrated so great a variety of music within so effective a scheme; and the slow finale, with its complete simplicity of despair is a stroke of genius which solves all the artistic problems that have proved most baffling to symphonic writers since Beethoven."

The Koussevitzky reading of the "Pathetic" is true to all that is greatest in Tschaikowsky. Here is a conductor who makes everything sound as it should from the proximity of the platform and at the same time projects his ideas with the greatest potency to the uttermost parts of the hall. The performance was wonderfully controlled but never restricted. The Boston Symphony played gloriously.

Keith's

with

Miriam Winslow
director of the Miriam Winslow School
of the Dance, Inc.
presents her pupils in a review of the dance
at the Repertory Theatre
264 Huntington Avenue
Saturday, April 28, 1934
Matinee 2 P. M. Evening 8 P. M.
BENEFIT OF SCHOLARSHIP FUND
For Tickets Telephone Kenmore 5446
or Repertory Theatre Box Office

VINS HIM STAR ROLE

Koussevitzky and Shevinne Thrill Symphony Audience

By MOSES SMITH

The second Boston Symphony Tchaikovsky festival program, last night, was an even more exciting experience than the first. A capacity audience, invited from members of the orchestra's regular subscribing listeners, spent so much time applauding the performers that a program containing only the first piano concerto and the "Pathetique" symphony detained the audience through a longish evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was in fine form, his musicians played as possessed demons and the soloist was the distinguished Josef Lhevinne. The resultant music-making had the white heat of incandescence—echt Tchaikovsky, as the Germans would say.

Lhevinne had played this B-flat minor concerto with the same orchestra here in 1926. It has had performances here with other soloists under Koussevitzky. On each occasion, as last evening, it has been demonstrated that, no matter who the soloist, Koussevitzky dominates the performance by his superb drive, making the symphonic lines clear, with the soloist an integral unit of the group.

However much this procedure does violence to the customary rules of etiquette governing soloists' appearances, I am sure that no pianist objects to it in this instance. For the performance is immeasurably enhanced by it, gaining sweep and vitality quite impossible from mere "accompaniment." Certainly Mr. Lhevinne did not play as one strait-jacketed, but as an independent artist catching fire simultaneously with the conductor and the musicians.

Lhevinne's playing was brilliant—that goes without saying. It was spectacular, not in a cheap, showy manner, but by virtue of his unerring precision, bold attack and almost incredible bravura technique. The average pianist who has thumbed the pages of this concerto must have had a heart tremor at the daring speed with which the octave passages of the first movement were played. From the volume of applause that was let loose at the end I suspect there were many pianists in the audience.

Description of the performance of the "Pathetique" symphony resolves itself into the same, repetitious superlatives. If there is a reservation as to the possibly excessive speed of the march movement, that is a matter of personal taste and preference.

It loks like a series of unmitigated triumphs for Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra this week at Symphony Hall. Thus far the votes are unanimous.

YORK TIMES

APR 26 1934

SINGLE GIFT PAYS DEFICIT.

Boston Orchestra Receives $102,-741, Anonymously Given.

BOSTON, April 25 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced tonight that it had received a gift of $102,741 which was sufficient to meet the orchestra's deficit for the year.

The subscription, the donor of which was not disclosed, was the largest ever received in a single year, officials of the orchestra said, and will enable the organization to meet all expenses of the current season, the fifty-third, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring to a close on Saturday night.

The orchestra will have given 112 concerts for the season, including a highly successful series of three each in Washington and Baltimore.

$102,741 GIFT TO SYMPHONY

Orchestra's Deficit Wiped Out by Single Subscription

Post Apr 26

With the receipt of a subscription of $102,741—the largest subscription the orchestra has ever received in one year—the expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were practically covered, it was announced yesterday.

Next Saturday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring to a close the 53d season of the orchestra and his 10th season as conductor. In this season, the orchestra gave 112 concerts, which is five more than the schedule called for, and included a series of three each in Washington and Baltimore, which were so successful they will be repeated next season.

The 54th season of the orchestra will open in Boston on Oct. 12.

Chaikovsky, Lhevinne and Koussevitzky

Trans Apr 26

Concerto with the Pianist as Soloist, and the Sixth Symphony

THAT the Boston audience has accepted the Chaikovsky Festival as a triumph of unusual proportions was plainly evident at the close of the special concert in Symphony Hall last evening. The unshakable popularity of this composer with the great mass of the listening public is acknowledged even by those who still attempt to dispute his right to a place in the sun. Yet the intensity of the ovations which Dr. Koussevitzky and the musicians have received has taken many people by surprise. No less revealing has been the brilliance of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's hand; long familiarity with the peculiar bond of national feeling and musical genius existing between composer and conductor has not been sufficient preparation for predicting the exact character of these festival performances.

Again last evening the program contained no more than two numbers—the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in B-flat minor, and the Sixth Symphony ("Pathétique") in B minor. As in the Monday concert, two items meant an abundance of everything. Mr. Josef Lhevinne, a notably sensitive and discerning musician and an infrequent visitor to this city, played the solo part in the Concerto. Friendly clapping greeted him; sustained and vigorous applause followed him from the stage; a pleasing tumult of approval recalled him repeatedly to the platform before his final departure. During the breath-taking third movement of the Symphony, the audience listened in a concentrated silence that betrayed an inward excitement. Yet the mood of profound pathos which Dr. Koussevitzky evoked in the final division exerted a strangely dampening effect upon the pent-up enthusiasm which the previous measures had aroused. There was an interval of silence as he quietly laid his baton upon the score. Then, a gradually mounting applause. There came, finally, as he made his way to and from the stage before a standing orchestra, bursts of shouting and stamping such as the Symphony Hall audience reserves for occasions of special moment.

Though the Concerto in B-flat minor is by no means a neglected score (it was played here as recently as 1931 with Mr. Horowitz as soloist), it is sufficiently unfamiliar to arouse curiosity and interest. To those who are mindful of the characteristic fulness of Chaikovsky's melodies and the richness of his orchestration, the instrumental piquancy of many passages of the Concerto have a peculiar and an appealing freshness. The separate choirs are often sharply outlined in a manner that has been described as quite modern; the Concerto is in many respects more modern than some of the composer's later pieces. It furnishes an excellent example of his penchant for insistent timpani passages. The strings have many firm-fibered unisons. The figuration is frequently curt and laconic. The woodwinds are strikingly individualized. There are marked contrasts of instrumental color and dynamics, while the versatility of the composer in thematic development is constantly present. It contains some weak stretches in scoring, it is true, despite Chaikovsky's reputed mastery of the orchestra; but it is generally diverting.

Mr. Lhevinne demonstrated that he is kin to Dr. Koussevitzky in understanding the interpretative demands which the music of Chaikovsky places upon the performer. The same emotions stir him; he knows the tonal language in which they are expressed. He believes in the sincerity of the composer. Thus, at every turn, a distinctive style and an inexhaustible technical resource served him last evening. He filled with needed breadth and power the plain chords which open the piece. His limpid tones in the Andantino did not lack firmness for all their neat and exacting shape. (An exceedingly refined touch is one of Mr. Lhevinne's characteristic virtues.) His fingers ran with the syncopated brightness of the final movement at the top of accent. Indeed, the appearance of Mr. Lhevinne at this concert proved to be one of the events of the season.

More familiar than the Concerto, the "Pathetic" Symphony is counted as Chaikovsky's masterpiece. Possibly the performance of it will be remembered as the principal ornament of the Festival; for Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared it in rehearsal with a thoroughness as to detail and honesty as to accent beyond what is generally expected even of the Boston Symphony. Strangely enough, it obtained eloquence as much through restraint and directness as through fervor released. In the opening Adagio, this restraint produced an atmosphere of inescapable sadness. The change to the quicker tempo was of dramatic force. The key to Dr. Koussevitzky's supremacy as an exponent of Chaikovsky, however, is the rightness of his rhythms and the inevitable character of his nuances. It is difficult to imagine the quality of motion in a more irresistible form than that in which it appeared in the Vivace of the Sixth Symphony. The tempo was amazingly rapid. It drove relentlessly forward as though power and speed had become a living force. More remarkable still was the fact that the musicians not only played the notes with an astonishing degree of accuracy, but with an emotional intensity that rose to meet that of the conductor.

N. M. J.

SYMPHONY HALL

Tchaikovsky Festival

Globe Apr 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tchaikovsky Festival was resumed last evening with performances of the B-flat minor Piano Concerto and of the "Pathetic" Symphony, otherwise called Symphony No. 6, in B minor. Josef Lhevinne was soloist in the Concerto.

The concert was open only to subscribers to the regular or supplementary series of Boston Symphony concerts. They were invited to apply for free tickets of admission. No seats were reserved. The same conditions will apply to the program of songs and chamber music to be given this afternoon at 2:30.

The hall was filled. Throughout the evening applause was frequent. But the loudest outburst was accorded Dr Koussevitzky at the end of the concert.

No such tribute was ever more deserved, for the conductor's reading was memorable. This symphony represents—to one listener, at least—the wholly emotional side of Tchaikovsky. It was played in like vein, but neither mushily nor vulgarly.

Mr Lhevinne played the solo part of Tchaikovsky's most popular piano concerto with the technical finish and interpretive persuasiveness to be expected from such a renowned master of the instrument. His reading lacked the spectacular elements of Mr Horowitz' interpretation, but it was most poetic, particularly in the second movement. Mr Lhevinne also came in for an ovation.

C. W. D.

AMUSEMENTS

$102,741 PLEDGED TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

Largest Subscription Ever Given in One Year

The receipt of a subscription of $102,741, almost covering this season's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is announced from Symphony Hall. This is the largest subscription the orchestra has ever received in one year. The amount fails only by $7000 of meeting the orchestra's complete expenses for the year past, to which must be added about $11,000 carried over from 1933.

The orchestra this season has given 112 concerts, five more than the schedule of the previous season, and as many performances as are possible within the time and energies of the orchestra and its conductor.

There have been 11 series in Boston and other cities, including series of three concerts each in Baltimore and Washington, which were so successful that they will be repeated next season. Three series showed an actual increase in attendance over last year. The four Boston series alone have found more than 1200 new subscribers to take places reluctantly and temporarily released by others.

Through the foresight and generosity of many friends, the orchestra is now fortunate in owning its own home. The acquisition of Symphony Hall has not increased the orchestra's financial responsibilities. On the other hand, it will result in certain economies.

The 54th season will open on Oct 12.

ING FROM THE AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN-ADVERTISER

APR 27 1934

MORE MUSIC FOR MORE PEOPLE.

(New York Herald Tribune)

Coincidentally with the announcement that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society has raised almost all of the required $500,000 to cover the expected deficits for the next three years and the report from Boston that a single individual has contributed $102,000 to cover this year's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes word from Philadelphia that the Philadelphia Orchestra is planning an even more enterprising season next year, including operas as well as additional concerts.

Despite the fact that these great orchestras not only fail to be self-supporting but have to depend in large measure on a small group of wealthy people to cover their deficits, there is no doubt of the growing interest in music throughout the country—due in no small part to the excellence of the concerts broadcast by these three orchestras. No better music may be heard anywhere in Europe. The quality of the performances is unexcelled—especially when under the leadership of the four great conductors, Messrs. Koussevitsky, Toscanini, Bruno Walter and Stokowski.

It is to the special credit of the last named that he took up the work of broadcasting begun by Mr. Walter Damrosch and made of it a special technical and artistic study. When Mr. Damrosch first started broadcasting it was the fashion among the musical elite to belittle his efforts. But Mr. Damrosch sensed the hunger for music throughout the country, and with rare skill presented his programs so that his millions of listeners could understand them. When Mr. Stokowski finally took to broadcasting he devoted hours of careful attention to all the details of transmission and reception. The result was that he materially raised the quality of the performances that went on the air. The public thus heard not only the best music performed by a great orchestra under a great leader but transmitted with special skill.

The concerts of these three great orchestras of our Eastern coast cities have come to be part of the routine of millions of listeners throughout the country. So long as such a musical education is available for those who have radios and are willing to turn the dial there is no cause to feel despondent about the musical development of the American people. Ultimately our symphony societies and operas should be self-supporting or locally endowed, as is the case in Germany. This will come in time, as the people become more dependent on music.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 27 1934

More Music for More People

Coincidentally with the announcement that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society has raised almost all of the required $500,000 to cover the expected deficits for the next three years and the report from Boston that a single individual has contributed $102,000 to cover this year's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes word from Philadelphia that the Philadelphia Orchestra is planning an even more enterprising season next year, including operas as well as additional concerts.

Despite the fact that these great orchestras not only fail to be self-supporting but have to depend in large measure on a small group of wealthy people to cover their deficits, there is no doubt of the growing interest in music throughout the country—due in no small part to the excellence of the concerts broadcast by these three orchestras. No better music may be heard anywhere in Europe. The quality of the performances is unexcelled—especially when under the leadership of the four great conductors, Messrs. Koussevitzky, Toscanini, Bruno Walter and Stokowski.

It is to the special credit of the last named that he took up the work of broadcasting begun by Mr. Walter Damrosch and made of it a special technical and artistic study. When Mr. Damrosch first started broadcasting it was the fashion among the musical élite to belittle his efforts. But Mr. Damrosch sensed the hunger for music throughout the country, and with rare skill presented his programs so that his millions of listeners could understand them. When Mr. Stokowski finally took to broadcasting he devoted hours of careful attention to all the details of transmission and reception. The result was that he materially raised the quality of the performances that went on the air. The public thus heard not only the best music performed by a great orchestra under a great leader but transmitted with special skill.

The concerts of these three great orchestras of our Eastern coast cities have come to be part of the routine of millions of listeners throughout the country. So long as such a musical education is available for those who have radios and are willing to turn the dial there is no cause to feel despondent about the musical development of the American people. Ultimately our symphony societies and operas should be self-supporting or locally endowed, as is the case in Germany. This will come in time, as the people become more dependent on music.

THIRD OF FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Chamber Music and Songs of Tchaikovsky Heard

Post Apr 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Quite unexpectedly, the most rewarding concert thus far in Symphony Hall's Tchaikovskian Festival proved to be that of yesterday afternoon, devoted to the composer's chamber-music and songs. Like the concert of Wednesday evening, it was open by invitation only to subscribers to the various series of Symphony Concerts.

GREAT IN OTHER WORKS

After all, the symphonies of Tchaikovsky are something of an old story, even as they are currently played by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. Too often in this part of the world we are apt to think of the symphonic Tchaikovsky as the only one that matters. Yet that is very far from being the case.

The afternoon began agreeably, if not exactly stirringly, with a performance of the String Quartet in D major, No. 1, Opus 11, at the hands of the Burgin String Quartet, Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, Lefranc and Bedetti of the Symphony Orchestra. The quartet is that of the far-famed and justly popular Andante Cantabile, to the level of which the other three movements scarcely rise. Yet the Scherzo is piquant and the Finale soundly constructed in the best traditions of chamber-music, reminding us that Tchaikovsky, for all the sensational effectiveness of his orchestral pieces, was master of the composer's trade. The performance, it may be said, was an excellent one.

Seven Rich Songs

Followed seven songs, with Maria Kurenko as the singer and. Benjamin King as the pianist. In one of them, titled in English "The Terrible Moment," Mr. Bedetti supplied the violoncello obbligato. Apparently we know too little of Tchaikovsky's songs. "None But the Lonely Heart" and the "Pilgrim's Song" are neither the whole nor the best of them. Those of yesterday had as common trait a flowing melodic line slightly tinged with melancholy, even when the words did not call for sombre treatment. In style, they are closer to the lieder of Schumann and Brahms than to the songs of Moussorgsky and his colleagues of the Five, yet they are unmistakably Slavic.

Effective Piano Parts

For each the composer has supplied an effective piano part that is far more than mere accompaniment. These were played with exceeding sympathy by Mr. King, while Mme. Kurenko, previously known here chiefly as a singer of coloratura music, sang them all with a true Slavic intensity, with a voice small but of haunting color.

And to the effect of the songs themselves she added that of a charming presence, of an earnest manner and of a certain devotion, as though the occasion had for her a personal meaning.

The Elegiac Trio

This same devotion marked the performance of the final number on the programme, the elegiac Trio for violin, violoncello and pianoforte, written in memory of the composer's friend, Nicholas Rubinstein, and one of the finest flowerings of his genius. In the playing of this richly made, steadily eloquent music Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Sanroma were for the moment as men inspired. It has been said that in this Trio Tchaikovsky writes as though his medium were the concerto for piano and orchestra.

The three performers yesterday often achieved effects of surprising sonority, yet without sacrifice of proper balance. Playing at once so fervent and so carefully controlled is all too rare.

A. W. W.

Herald Apr 27

MUSIC

TSCHAIKOWSKY FESTIVAL

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall the third concert of the Tschaikowsky festival was given before a good-sized audience. The soloist was Maria Kurenko, soprano. Other performers were: the Burgin String Quartet, consisting Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, Lefranc and Bedetti, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist. Mme. Kurenko's accompanist was Benjamin King. The program was as follows:

Quartet in D major No. 1 Opus 11 Tschaikowsky

Songs: If I Only Knew, I Could Foresee: At the Ball: Only You: Lisochek: Lullaby: The Terrible Moment: The Word Trio for violin, 'cello and piano Op. 50.

Although Symphony hall is by rights somewhat large for the most advantageous hearing of chamber music, the concert yesterday did not suffer on that account as much as might be expected. There were times in the quartet and in the trio when certain effects in those pieces could not be successfully made in so large a building. Naturally the songs did not have to face the same handicap.

Maria Kurenko has a lovely voice, of great clarity and under excellent control. She is more a straight singer than a dramatic, if such a distinction can be made on the basis of her singing of these songs. That is she sang them without any obvious striving for effect; but they emerged agreeably, and the intent was clear, thanks to the printed translations of the words. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause for Mme. Kurenko and recalled her many times to the platform. A word of praise might here be added for the skillful accompaniments provided by Mr. King.

The Burgin quartet, with inconsequential exceptions, played this early quartet of Tschaikowsky with admirable taste and skill. They took the andante so simply that one forgot how often that movement has suffered, being ruthlessly sentimentalized in restaurants and popular recitals. Or else one remembered the fact with pleasure at the contrast. Mr. Sanroma joined Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti for a fine performance of the trio. It is possible to reason that in the earlier quartet Tschaikowsky was really writing for the form, but that in the trio he frequently was thinking in much larger combinations. In particular does this seem true of the finale of the trio. A. W. W.

Apr 27 [illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Tchaikovsky Festival

Yesterday's program of songs and chamber music at the Tchaikovsky Festival was, save for the second movement of the D major String Quartet, relatively unfamiliar. This popular andante cantabile has, however, long been popular in every conceivable arrangement purely because of its melodic quality. The quartet was played by the Burgin Quartet (Richard Burgin and Robert Gundersen, violins; Jean Lefranc, viola, and Jean Bedetti, 'cello). Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, joined Mr Burgin and Mr Bedetti in the closing number, the Trio in A minor, Op 50. Maria Kurenko, Russian soprano, sang a group of rarely heard songs.

The audience was large, though materially slighter than that which attended Wednesday evening.

It would not be quite exact to say that Tchaikovsky reveals in his trio a better grasp of writing for a small group of instruments, but the trio is conspicuous for increased concision of ideas. The quartet is subject to a certain confusion in this respect, and is less subtle than the trio, which was composed a number of years later. Both are enjoyable, but a little too long when heard on a program that likewise included a number of songs. They were played beautifully. The Burgin Quartet, should its members by some remote possibility devote themselves entirely to this form of music, would doubtless prove a peer to almost any such group now to be heard in this country.

Mme Kurenko's voice seemed yesterday to have lost much of the shrill quality observed a few years ago, and to have gained in sensuousness of tone. No fault could reasonably be found with her interpretations.

The festival will be concluded with the "regular" Symphony concerts this afternoon and tomorrow night, when the G minor and E minor Symphonies will be heard. C. W. D.

Herald

SYMPHONY HALL TO BE TAX FREE

Assessors' Action Will Mean Saving of $26,000

The claim of the new owners of Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., that the property should be tax exempt as it comes under the qualification of an educational institution, has been recognized by the board of assessors.

Starting the current year, the property, assessed for $800,000, will not be taxed, amounting to about $26,000 less expense to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has never shown a profit in the 53 years of its existence.

Last winter the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., which has been operating the orchestra since 1918, acquired the property by buying up a mortgage and a stock subscription. W. Bentley Warren, Boston lawyer, is president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

When the corporation took over operation of the orchestra in 1918 it did so under the chapter which classified it as an educational institution. The corporation, however, was never able until last winter, when a number of other Boston persons interested in the orchestra made it possible to buy up the mortgage and the stock, to acquire the Symphony Hall building and the land at Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Before April 1, last, the corporation notified the assessors that it had acquired the property and was operating it as an educational institution.

While pointing out that under the law the city could not very well do anything else but recognize the claim, Mr. Warren last night said that from the point of view of civic pride it was a small contribution on the part of the city toward the continued existence of an orchestra known all over the musical world.

Tr. Apr 27

Plays a

The Symphony Orchestra in Two Concerts

End of the Cambridge Season; On with the Chaikovsky Festival Series

YESTERDAY afternoon the Chaikovsky festival at Symphony Hall proceeded to a concert of chamber-music and of songs. The Burgin String Quartet (Richard Burgin, Robert Gundersen, Jean Lefranc, Jean Bedetti) played the early Quartet in D major, Opus 11; Maria Kurenko, soprano, sang seven songs; Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Sanromá played the trio Opus 50. The audience filled floor and first balcony, with no more than a small scattering of people in the second balcony.

In freshness of interest nothing done or still to be done at the festival can exceed the seven songs chosen by Madame Kurenko. "If I Only Knew, If I Could Foresee" tells of the maiden who loses her heart to the tall man on the horse who passes her window but whom she never meets. "At the Ball," in its turn describes the wonderings of the young man who has just met a damsel whose memory continues to haunt him: "Do I really love thee—I wonder, and yet I suspect that I do," he finally concludes. "Only You" is the story of fullest understanding, which nevertheless does not ripen into love: "Only you understood my suffering. . . . Only you gave me your hand when my heart was full of blood and anguish. . . . And you never, never loved me!" "Lizochek" and "Lullaby" were two delightful children's songs. "The Terrible Moment" (with violoncello obbligato) pictures the mental anguish of the lover awaiting the decision of the loved one—will it be a dagger in the heart or will it be paradise? "One Word" desires to send love to the beloved, wherever he may be.

The songs of Chaikovsky, except for a very few hardy perennials, are little known hereabouts. Yet Chaikovsky wrote about one hundred songs, ranging in their opus numbers from 6 to 73 (the Pathetic Symphony is Op. 74). The program gave no information about the identity of these songs other than their titles. It does seem as if at least the opus numbers might have been given. The songs, one and all, were little short of a revelation. The Chaikovsky of whom they tell is certainly far removed from the Chaikovsky of the last three symphonies. In these songs he does not "wear his heart on his sleeve." In them he indulges in no excesses of statement. Nor does he seem as close to German or Italian models as is often his habit in larger works. In them he is far closer to certain of the Nationalist Five than in any of the things by which he is more generally known. The sentiment of these songs he expresses subtly and with restraint, yet fully and admirably. The melodic flow is such as holds the hearer's interest, yes, rivets his attention upon the songs, and at the same time avoids the obvious. It appears from a single hearing to be the sort that would stand considerable repetition. If these songs are a fair sample of Chaikovsky's hundred, then that hundred is a mine well worthy of careful exploration.

Yet they may constitute a pitfall for the average singer. Yesterday the seven were sung in Russian by a singer who had an evident flair for them. As the songs added appreciably to the appreciation of us "foreigners" for the Russian Chaikovsky, so this same Chaikovsky allowed Madame Kurenko to appear to the best advantage in which she has yet appeared to a Boston audience. Though one might have thought that her light voice, in its brightness and its clarity would hardly have been adapted to the genuine and often deep expressiveness of the songs, such did not prove to be the case. Never has her voice appeared more attractive and generally pleasing. Never, also, save only with a Shalyapin singing them have Russian songs equally received their due. Surely this was a high point in the Chaikovsky festival.

A close match for it was the playing of the two pieces of chamber music. The quartet, once much played, has received little or no recent hearing—always excepting the popular and ever-present Andante cantabile. The quartet contains much that is of lasting value. The finale is especially well constructed. In performance the Burgins lavished upon it every care. Here was not a hastily thrown together reading of an ensemble score. Here was a neatness in the realization of the art of quartet playing, a penetration into the character of the music, which would have done credit to a quartet which has no other duties than those of the cultivation of chamber music.

The same thing is true of the playing of the trio. This is more expansive Chaikovsky which stands about midway between the fourth and fifth symphonies. It runs through three movements, an elegiac first movement, a theme with variations, a finale. The chief interest probably centers in the variations. That each of them, as Mrs. Newmarch says, "is supposed to have been written by Chaikovsky with special reference to some characteristic of his departed friend," i. e. Nicholas Rubinstein, is hardly to the point. More pertinent is it that here is a folk-theme of real charm, well worthy of any musician's most careful treatment. Through the nine variations the composer shows the theme in new lights, each, for the most part as fascinating as its neighbor. The presence of the usual Chaikovskian cheap waltz as one of the variations need provoke no more than a passing smile.

As in the quartet, so here, Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Sanromá gave a revealing performance. A special word is due to the discretion with which Mr. Sanromá handled the piano part. In the first movement particularly, it is written in such a way as easily to overbalance the strings. That there was no more than a slight suggestion of this fact is entirely due to the insight of the pianist. For the rest, the give-and-take which one found in the playing of these three brought out to the full the content of the trio, held at high pitch the interest of the audience. In the ensemble pieces as in the songs, this concert must rank as one of the most significant of the festival.

A. H. M.

At Sanders Theater

Visitors to these shores from other lands and cities generally include a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of the principal objectives of their coming. When their stay is brief, they are particularly fortunate if they are able to hear the orchestra in one of the concerts of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater. At Symphony Hall they might chance upon one of Dr. Koussevitzky's "Festivals" or special programs with which the conductor enriches the season; this would disclose but one aspect of the orchestral picture. In Cambridge, however, it is not at all unlikely that they would find a whole season condensed into one program.

Such was the case in the final Cambridge concert last evening. Four composers contributed to a review of the characteristic highlights of a Koussevitzkian performance. Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12, upheld the glories of the strings—their sensuous warmth, their serene strength, their impressive depths. Debussy's Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," reviewed a familiar delicacy and grace of line and cool brilliance of individual instrumental tone. D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," gave proof of the manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations are able to draw out the essential truth and beauty of a score frequently misunderstood or generally overlooked. The Second Symphony of Brahms expanded into the sunny measures which gave to the performance an air of happy satisfaction and friendly leave-taking.

It is a matter of no little wonder how conductor and orchestra are able to retain their fresh approach to each day's work throughout a full and strenuous Chaikovsky festival. In the Prelude of Debussy and in the variations of D'Indy, there may have been noted an occasional stridency and forcing of tone as well as a lack of spiritual contact with the music. There was no doubt an overflow into Sanders Theater of the intensities demanded by Chaikovsky in Symphony Hall. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky turned to the task of disclosing the "Istar" theme with as much elation as though it were still a mission of discovery. The players answered with tones of glowing strength. No detail was overlooked in transmitting the light-streamed and shadow-tinted Prelude of Debussy; the woodwinds gave their purest tones; the strings found their finest lines for this misty, soft-quivering impression. Handel's concerto began with a grave and stately motion. It continued through many middle passages as though carried forward by its own impetus while the conductor rested his baton and merely watched the flowing figures. The largo was solid and deep. The final Allegro held an animated fascination.

By every sign of interest and applause, the Second Symphony of Brahms not only was the most substantial and satisfying portion of the program but had in addition the significance of an apotheosis of the now completed season. Certainly, in the matter of performance it demonstrated the proverbial virtuosity of the Boston players, and our visiting listener had every reason to feel enlightened; while in spirit, it was transfused with the sincerity and illuminating fervor with which we of the Boston and Cambridge audience are familiar. The audience last evening acknowledged Dr. Koussevitzky's bow by rising to applaud as though moved by a common impulse.

N. M. J.

Items of the Day

Receipt of subscriptions totalling $102,741 to the deficit this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced in the program book for the Chaikovsky Festival. This is the largest amount that the orchestra has ever received in one year. It fails to meet the expenses of the past year by only $7000. To the deficit, however, must be added $11,000 carried over from 1933.

RDAY, APRIL 28,

FESTIVAL AT FINAL MATINEE

Tchaikovsky's First Enters Symphony's Repertoire

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The final matinee of the current Symphony season brought yesterday the concluding programme of the Tchaikovsky Festival and the initial performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the Russian composer's First Symphony. That of the Fifth Symphony, which yesterday companioned the First, so stirred the audience that Dr. Koussevitzky's leave-taking was accomplished in a mild pandemonium.

GOOD MUSIC IN FIRST

No such demonstration had been provoked by the earlier work, yet there had been enough applause to bring about the orchestral bow that at the Symphony Concerts is the hall-mark of popular approval.

This reminder that Tchaikovsky's symphonies did not begin with the Fourth was one of the welcome incidents of the Tchaikovsky festival with which Dr. Koussevitzky marked the conclusion of his 10th season among us. It stirred curiosity, too, regarding the Second and Third Symphonies, which have not been heard here since the 'nineties. Now and then the lesser works of composers are unjustly overshadowed. As yesterday's performance proved, this First Symphony did not deserve its long neglect.

Seems Strangely Frail

The actual Boston premiere of the work occurred two or three seasons ago, at a concert of the orchestra of the MacDowell Club under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. The impressions received then were in the main renewed and intensified yesterday, though not unnaturally the performance was more flattering to the music.

"A suggestion of Russian folk-song gives racial character to the first and second movement of this "Winter Dreams" Symphony, themselves entitled, respectively, "Winter Journey Dreams" and "Dark Country, Hazy Country." The forthrightness and assurance that we have come to associate with Tchoikovsky's orchestral writing are here lacking. For him the music seems strangely frail, yet there is in it both youthful earnestness and youthful charm. The Scherzo hints at the orchestral virtuosity that was later to come; its trio is music of the salon.

Noisy Conclusion

In the fourth movement a melancholy beginning and a noisily energetic conclusion are coupled and contrasted in true Tchaikovskian fashion.

The yonng man of 26 is here father to the matured composer. And after all, from the standpoint of artistic righteousness there is not so much to choose between this Finale with its bustling vulgarity in the manner of a comic opera overture and that of the Fifth Symphony, exciting as the latter is to the average audience.

The Mighty Fifth

From the outset the Fifth Symphony has been one of Dr. Koussevitzky's most mettled steeds of battle. At times yesterday he yielded to the ever-present temptation to gild the Tchaikovskian lily, as in the sentimentalizing of the second subject of the first movement. Yet if censure is here to be given, it is not easy to say whether it should be directed against the conductor or the composer.

Tchaikovsky's own disapproval of the Fifth Symphony was hardly warranted; some of us cannot share his decided preference for its immediate predecessor. But too frequent hearings tend to emphasize its occasional obviousness, its descent, in the Finale already mentioned, into something close to claptrap.

Old-Time Prestige Restored

In conclusion it may well be remarked that a decade of Dr. Koussevitzky has restored to the Boston Symphony Orchestra all of its one-time prestige.

No conductor has excelled him in the range and catholicity of his programmes. And if each and every novelty that he has introduced here has not proved of enduring worth, at least he has saved us from lethargy and complacence. He has reminded us that, however great its achievements in the past, music is still a living art and should be treated as such.

Monitor Apr 28

Boston Symphony Season

By L. A. SLOPER

A TCHAIKOVSKY FESTIVAL (April 23-28) brought to a close the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five concerts were scheduled. These included the last concert of the Monday evening series, the final pair on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and two invitation concerts, on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon, open to subscribers to any of the regular series.

Thus Tchaikovsky enters into the select company of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, the only other composers to be thus honored by the Boston Symphony under the Koussevitzky directorate. The Russian composer's name was a singularly appropriate addition to the list, for Dr. Koussevitzky surely has no superior as an interpreter of the orchestral scores of his great compatriot.

* * *

The programs were arranged with the conductor's usual discrimination. The symphonies chosen included the First (never before played by this orchestra), the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth. Mr. Josef Lhévinne was soloist in the B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto. The Serenade for Orchestra, op. 48, which had gone unheard in Boston for 16 years, the First String Quartet, the Piano Trio and some songs completed the list. Mme. Maria Kurenko was the singer; the Burgin String Quartet and Mr. J. M. Sanromá, the orchestra's pianist, played the chamber pieces.

Only words of praise may be written of the performances. The orchestra today stands at the peak of its achievement as a virtuosic and expressive musical instrument. Only such an orchestra could meet the demands made upon it; could take, for example, the Allegro molto vivace of the "Pathetic" or the Finales of the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies at the pace required by the conductor without losing precision or clarity. Nor could a finer interpreter be found, probably, for the concerto than Mr. Lhévinne, whose finished technique and musical sensibility find here a congenial vehicle. For good cause the audiences clapped, stamped and even cheered at the orchestral reunions, and the recalls were many.

Through these trying times, the Boston Orchestra has continued with its artistic standards unlowered. The established number of concerts has been given, the usual proportion of novelties has been submitted and the quality of performance has been unwaveringly maintained. Moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky continues, while maintaining a balance between classics and modern pieces, to give liberal representation to the American composer. Three composers were represented this season for the first time on Boston Symphony programs, and all three were Americans—Roy Harris, Randall Thompson and Emerson Whithorne. Other Americans represented were Bloch, Hill, Loeffler and Piston.

First performance was given to Harris's "Symphony: 1933," Whithorne's "Moon Trails," Berezowsky's Symphony No. 2 and N. Tchérepnin's Three Pieces for Orchestra. Of these Harris's Symphony made the best impression. It is individual if not original; and if it is not precisely American, it has at times an authentic American flavor. Berezowsky's Second Symphony proves that he is at least loyal to his Russian predecessors. Tchérepnin's musical version of Poe's "Masque of the Red Death" is notably less interesting than the story. Whithorne's sketches are rather conventional tone paintings, less characteristic than some of his earlier works.

* * *

Ten works were played for the first time at these concerts. These included—oddly enough—Arnold Schönberg's "Pelleas und Melisande." The composer as guest conductor directed this and his "Verklärte Nacht" to the pleasure of the Boston audiences, who perhaps wondered, however, that he had not taken the opportunity of letting them hear some of his later and more characteristic works.

Mr. Thompson's Second Symphony won an immediate popular success. It is ingratiating music, easily grasped, which employs the jazz idiom with discretion. M. Honegger merely repeats himself in his "Mouvement Symphonique No. 3." Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn" is another exercise by a brilliant pupil. Mr. Hill's Concertino is an amusing bit of light music. Piston's Concerto for Orchestra presents Stravinsky in the mold of Handel.

Besides Schönberg, Sir Henry Wood was guest conductor for a pair of concerts. The English leader was tremendously popular with orchestra and audiences. We were charmed with his arrangement of a Purcell Suite, and we were again persuaded, by his interpretation of the "Enigma" Variations, that humor is a special gift of English conductors.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns next season, and the personnel of the orchestra remains virtually unchanged.

Music Lovers Rejoice

Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, with fine generosity, has contributed $100,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and thereby has relieved the financial arrears which have hung over this institution.

Let us say it with pride and let us say it because it is the fact that Boston Symphony Orchestra is the outstanding instrumental assembly in the world today.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians have brought added lustre to the reputation of Boston. And he has not sought to confine the appreciation of good music to those of our people who can afford to be patrons of the Symphony concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky has long nourished the idea of Sunday afternoon concerts to which the public would be admitted by the payment of a moderate or small fee. Let us hope that the directors will permit him to establish this departure next season.

As a consequence of it, larger numbers of our people who know and really enjoy fine music would share in its delights. And gentlemen of Mr. Dane's generosity would not be required to contribute so handsomely to the annual deficit.

---

okin

Tcha
Se
E

Trav

Most glorio sevitzky and chestra bring series of grea certs in Symph noon. The symphony No.
symphony No.
tained the fina kovsky festival
ress during the
The mighty towering fourth
as it had neve een before. Th us, lifting an e to a frenz
The staid, q end the Frida
ances are not strative. Yet ment of dram clusion, they shouting and s tinued unabat
Time after tim out to the podi
ing slightly, a teristic gestur chestra, as if audience that sible for the m
not he.
But the sy ter than that the more. At sky congratula violinist and c chestra, and companion. T around the li desk musicians
All during t ence was on i
the finale of th appearance of greeted. Such custom at the ginning of the applausive au
the end, simil of the city sh
of Dr. Kousse complishments
The making another exam conductor's r range concert vitzky would sky's masterf
his little know
It is inter though this t tra's 53d se symphony ha on any of it and hearing work, named come at so omewhat sc nce it gave the technical showed signs
econd mover
ex. Hazy C and distinct hemes were developed wi is to be found oser's writin
The fifth ring Russia familiar to th reading of vitzky confi grown steadi
Tchaikovsky
other living authoritative pretations of
When the t announce ent was so
so thrilling
laced to Dr. ton Symphon ition climax creates con lable debt
the virtuoso

Tchaikovsky Series Is Ended

Trav Apr 28

Most gloriously did Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra bring to a close the season's series of regular Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program, Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 1 in G minor and his symphony No. 5 in E minor, also contained the final numbers in the Tchaikovsky festival which has been in progress during the week.

The mighty fifth symphony with its towering fourth movement was played as it had never been played in Boston before. The climax was tremendous, lifting and stirring the vast audience to a frenzy of wild enthusiasm.

The staid, quiet, Bostonians who attend the Friday symphony performances are not prone to become demonstrative. Yet yesterday, after a moment of dramatic silence at the conclusion, they burst into cheering and shouting and stamping of feet. It continued unabated for many minutes. Time after time Dr. Koussevitzky came out to the podium, smiling gently, bowing slightly, and making those characteristic gestures of his toward the orchestra, as if trying to persuade the audience that the players were responsible for the magnificent interpretation, not he.

But the symphony-goers knew better than that. They but applauded the more. At long last Dr. Koussevitzky congratulated Richard Burgin, first violinist and concert master of the orchestra, and then Burgin's first desk companion, Theodorowicz, and so on around the little semi-circle of first desk musicians.

All during the excitement the audience was on its feet. And it was in this fashion that Dr. Koussevitzky's first appearance of the afternoon had been greeted. Such indeed is the pleasant custom at these concerts. In the beginning of the season a standing and applausive audience and orchestra, at the end, similar doings, and thusly we of the city show our great appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky and his many accomplishments.

The making of this last program was another example of the distinguished conductor's remarkable ability to arrange concerts. Who but Dr. Koussevitzky would have coupled Tchaiskovsky's masterful fifth symphony with his little known first symphony?

It is interesting to note that although this is the end of the orchestra's 53d season, Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony had not previously appeared on any of its regular concerts. Report and hearing both indicated that this work, named "Winter Dreams," had been cut considerably. That may have somewhat accounted for the enjoyment it gave. As was to be expected the technical handling of the material showed signs of immaturity, but the second movement, named "Dark Country, Hazy Country," proved especially and distinctively delightful. In it themes were smoothly and melodiously developed without the harshness that is to be found in a number of the composer's writings.

The fifth symphony with its recurring Russian national themes is familiar to most persons. By his superb reading of it yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky confirmed a feeling that has grown steadily during the week of the Tchaikovsky Festival—namely, that no other living conductor can equal his authoritative and understanding interpretations of Tchaikovsky's music.

When the Tchaikovsky Festival was first announced not a few thought that such an undertaking, to put it mildly, was too much to attempt. That it was so thrillingly successful is tribute indeed to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony! In every respect it was fitting climax to a season that increased considerably Boston's incalculable debt to the great conductor and the virtuoso orchestra under him.

W. T. C., Jr.

Apr 28

THE BOSTON HERALD,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Tschaikowsky program: Symphony No. 1 in G minor; Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

Yesterday's concert at Symphony Hall brought the final program of the Tschaikowsky festival which was also the final program of the season. At the conclusion of tonight's concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will bid his orchestra and audience farewell until the autumn.

One of the engaging elements of the Boston Symphony programs is the conductor's invariable capacity for finding novelties to feature with familiar works. We have no recollection of having ever before heard Tschaikowsky's First Symphony, and we feel sure that it was entirely new to more than four-fifths of the audience. It would perhaps not be difficult to explain why the first three symphonies of the Russian master are not played more often. But it was exceedingly interesting to notice certain early traits of a composer and to hear them again as they become veritable landmarks in a work of such maturity as the E minor symphony, which completed the program.

It is very evident in listening to these two symphonies, that in the early work Tschaikowsky was hampered by a lack of contrapuntal facility and by an inability to achieve a sense of movement that makes a symphonic style possible. The G minor symphony opens with modest proportions. (It is interesting to note how many times Tschaikowsky gives a restatement of a melodic phrase or the first statement of a secondary theme to the cellos). The slow movement is of a delicate wistful mood and of unassuming character. It has been said that the first movement is the most satisfactory; that the scherzo is the least original movement; and that the brass choir becomes master of the composer in the last movement. If this last statement is true, it must only be true of the printed page, for in the Koussevitzky readying yesterday there was no evidence of excessive or unbalanced use of those instruments.

The entire symphony was presented with a sympathetic, even affectionate, regard and comprehension of Tschaikowsky's aims and ideas. The composer was very fortunate in having his ineffective efforts discreetly veiled and his best moments made conspicuous.

Tschaikowsky's "Fifth" was long a warhorse of Artur Nikisch, from whom we heard it many times. With it he used to stir Berlin and other audiences to a point of frenzied enthusiasm. We can safely say that not since Nikisch had we heard such a thrilling performance as that given by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday.

The work itself has been praised and blamed times without number. Persons of a literal turn of mind see no reason why a symphony should have an out-and-out waltz in place of the usual scherzo. This waltz "has turned the symphony into a suite,". whatever that may mean. Undoubtedly the movement is of no great musical importance, The vulgarity is not in being unimportant, but in demanding that it shall be important.

Certainly the movement shows Tschaikowsky's melodic and orchestral facility in a very favorable light. There have been experimental features in symphonies since Tschaikowsky that have been no more dignified and that have had far less charm. But pedantic protests over Tschaikowsky's individual concept of such a movement are of no more weight than the dogmatic assertion by Cherubini that every fugue shall have a "stretto," a theory unheeded by J. S. Bach.

There are places in the second subject of the first movement where Dr. Koussevitzky slows the tempo down to a point that to us seems to decrease its expressive power, but to dwell on that would be to forget how very convincingly he does it. His Tschaikowsky interpretations are extraordinarily vivid, yet not at the expense of balance. They are certainly not surpassed by any other conductor. There is no praise too great for the superb playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra with this great leader at its head. At the beginning and at the end of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky was given that most significant gesture, an audience and orchestra that rose en masse to applaud him.

This symphonic season has been rich in its offerings—possibly a bit too rich in Strauss of the "Domestica" and the "Heldenleben"—and abundantly satisfying to the experience of those privileged to attend regularly. The new season begins Oct. 12.

MUSIC

Globe Apr 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

When Tchaikovsky wrote his First Symphony, in G minor, at the age of 26, he was, of course, not fully developed in style nor free of the influence of the masters whose music he had studied not long before. But yesterday's performance of the work, the first at a Boston Symphony concert, proved conclusively the presence, even at that age, of his essential individuality. This youthful work was adroitly selected to pair with the Fifth Symphony, a masterly work of maturity, upon the final program of the Tchaikovsky Festival.

Yesterday's performance of the G minor Symphony was also, probably, the second ever to have taken place in Boston; two years ago Arthur Fielder put it upon a program of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, announcing it as "first time in Boston." This, Tchaikovsky's first composition of broad scope, betrays in its derivative qualities and occasional technical ineptitudes, that its creator was young. Yet the easy flow of melody, typically sensuous phrases for strings and sonorous, even noisy ones for brass, and a pervading melancholy sentiment in their "Winter Dreams" symphony indicate clearly the young man's future style. Although the texture is coarse and heavy, none but a budding genius could have, at 26, written so fluently for orchestra.

The Fifth Symphony, on the other hand, is a product of Tchaikovsky's 48th year, and remains perhaps his greatest masterpiece. Tchaikovsky was nearly always emotionally moving, but the Fifth Symphony possesses a command of rhythmic subtlety not to be found in either the Fourth or the "Pathetic" symphonies. The texture is in general more intricate and in some respects more refined.

Dr Koussevitzky read both symphonies with his customary distinction. The chances are no one could improve upon his clairvoyant and temperamentally sympathetic interpretations.

With the repetition of this program tonight, both the Tchaikovsky Festival and the Boston Symphony 53d season will be ended. The Festival has been eminently successful, though it offered neither so wide a range of representative music as the festivals given here in the past by Dr Koussevitzky, nor did it include more than two specimens of Tchaikovsky's less familiar work. But it did serve to parade the finest achievements of one who has suffered in recent years from undeserved castigation.

Dr Koussevitzky was greeted upon his entrance by a rising orchestra and audience. At the end of the concert there was a prolonged and fervent exhibition of the popular approval which he enjoys. There was an unconventional element in the waving of hankderchiefs and program books. In the ensuing minutes of tumult Dr Koussevitzky graciously shook hands all around with the first desk men.

C. W. D.

"PRAISE FROM SIR HUBERT"

Sir Henry Wood, the eminent English orchestra conductor, returns to London full of enthusiasm for the audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

"Never have I known an audience to listen in such absolute silence," says Sir Henry. "There was not a rustle of a programme, not a cough, not a movement of any kind. There was no need to tap my baton before beginning. So soon as I appeared on the platform there was absolute stillness."

"Praise from Sir Hubert is praise, indeed"—only in this case it happens to be Sir Henry. But to Bostonians it is bestowed on a very ordinary matter; they are not in the habit of coughing down a pianissimo passage or of rattling their programmes at any time when music is being played. Still we thank Sir Henry for the compliment.

Post Mar 17

THE ORIGINAL
HENRY ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 29 1934

PADEREWSKI PRIZE CONTEST

PADEREWSKI'S fund of $10,000, which the Polish pianist established in 1900 to encourage creative effort by musicians of American origin, has already earned the gratitude of one generation in the country which he sought to honor, even as America has so long and loyally honored him.

A $1,000 prize from the fund's income has been announced for the 1934 competition, closing on Oct. 1 next. A birth certificate, or proof of American parentage if born abroad, must be submitted with the sealed name and address accompanying each competitor's pseudonym and manuscript. The work must be one not performed or submitted in any contest before.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rehearse three of the symphonic works submitted, if these are found worthy, and the judges' first choice will then be played in a public concert. The trustees of the Paderewski Fund may be addressed through their secretary, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Allen, 294 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony's 53d Season

The three staccato chords in E major which serve as final punctuation to the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky last evening brought the Tchaikovsky Festival and the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conclusion. Like all Boston Symphony seasons, this just over passed too quickly; it seems that last October was but the day before yesterday.

The orchestra kept to the path and the standards which have for more than half a century been a criterion for the rest of this country, through a time when most of us kept one hand on our pocketbooks and an eye cocked upon our family budgets. Dr Koussevitzky's 10th year as conductor was distinguished in several ways: First, by the Beethoven Cycle which occupied the concerts in the Tuesday supplementary series, and during which were heard familiar masterpieces and rare specimens—chiefly of antiquarian value—by that supreme master of symphonic form. Secondly, by first performance in Boston of three scores which may indicate a considerable future for each of the American composers involved. These were the Symphony: 1933 of Roy Harris, Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra, and the Second Symphony, in E minor, of Randall Thompson. No feeling of artistic chauvinism, but a firm conviction of the merits of these compositions prompts one to say that of all the new music brought forward this season, only these proved worthy of remark.

Dr Koussevitzky once more exercised his commendable propensity for performing new music, and as has been the case many times in the past, we observed several indications of which way the musical wind seems to be blowing in European and American quarters. Most of them, inevitably turned out merely to be cross-currents. But that should of course be no deterrent to continuation of the practice. The function of any orchestra includes exhibition of new music purely because it is new. Such music may not live, but that of seeming interest deserves at least an initial airing. There were two pieces, agreeable though minor, which might profitably be heard again, the "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" of Pierne, and Lourie's inimitable "Sinfonia Dialectica."

Performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," with Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton for soloists, was musically rewarding. The idea is not new, but it is worthy of occasional employment in the case of great masterpieces. Certainly this city has heard no such music as well performed, orchestrally, in the opera house. The reason is obvious.

The Boston debut of Egon Petri, Dutch pianist; the first appearance with orchestra in this city of Yehudi Menuhin; the first public appearance in this country of Leonard Shure—following his sojourn in Germany, and the splendid piano playing of Artur Schnabel were notable occurrences insofar as soloists were concerned. Richard Burgin's beautiful interpretation of the Sibelius Violin Concerto once more indicated the exceptional powers of the concert master of the Boston Symphony, powers which ought not to be taken for granted.

The guest conductors, Sir Henry Wood and Arnold Schoenberg, were of distinctly higher order than has been the rule in the past several years.

And so, with the assurance that Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be on hand, next Oct 12, for another season, we who listen and we who record can with peace of mind take up neglected golf sticks and walking boots to enjoy a little first-hand observation of nature.

160

Trans Apr 30

Plays and Players ---

The Festival, The Season, The Programs

Pro and Con Koussevitzky's Choice of Music for the Symphony Concerts

SATURDAY evening's symphony concert was in every way a duplication of Friday's. All the enthusiasm recorded about Friday's concert was again in evidence on Saturday. In addition, for the sake of the record, let it be said that a large wreath, half the size of a man, stood beside the conductor's desk through the concert. Another was presented to Dr. Koussevitzky while the applause was at its height after the concert. That concert marked the end of the Chaikovsky festival, the end of the fifty-third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the end of ten years of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership. No other conductor has had so long an unbroken rule in Boston. Wilhelm Gericke's second term was one of eight years, the nearest approach in length to that of Dr. Koussevitzky. The total of Gericke's two terms, however, amounts to thirteen years. The total of Dr. Muck's two terms amounts to eight years. Other than these no conductor has held this position for longer than five years. This in itself is a remarkable tribute to the present conductor. Last Saturday's concert was also the last which he will conduct before he attains the age of sixty. The date on which he will pass that important milestone in his life is June 30. Would that he might be here so that Boston could properly honor the event.

The time for remarks upon the season which has just closed is at hand. By way of criticism a letter signed by nine young people from the seats of learning across the Charles may be quoted. One is glad to print this letter because of its zeal in the interest of maintaining the integrity of a highly idealistic position; because of the loyalty of the young people to the best the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever given; because it ably presents a view exactly opposite to that of an epidemic of letters printed some years ago. The letter, dated April 23, 1934, is in part as follows:

"When a Chaikovsky Festival was announced as conclusion to this year's symphony concerts, there seemed good reason to believe that at last one would hear some of the composer's unfamiliar symphonic works, such as his first three symphonies, his Manfred Symphony and his overtures to 'Hamlet' and 'The Tempest.' In the first place, while most conductors in America never leave the beaten track which their own natural indolence and lack of imagination marks out for them, Dr. Koussevitzky has, in the past, distinguished himself by a widely ranging and comprehensive repertory, in fitting accordance with the traditions of the Boston Orchestra, which has always had eclectic and catholic conductors. In the second place, performance of the works enumerated above would have been justified on more than one ground. True, critical opinion differs somewhat with regard to the respective merits of the 'Hamlet,' the 'Manfred' and the 'Tempest'; but this much is certainly true: that there is not a single one of these three works which has not found some intelligent critics for admirers. Balakirev, for example, gave high praise to the 'Tempect,' and his opinion is endorsed by Rosa Newmarch; while both Mr. Edwin Evans and the late James Huneker agree in ranking the overture to 'Hamlet' and the Manfred Symphony (for all their admitted defects) among Chaikovsky's best works. (It might also be noted that Toscanini played both the 'Manfred' and the 'Tempest' in New York last winter.)

"As to the first three symphonies, one might reasonably have expected that they would be played at a Festival, if for no other reason than that of showing the composer's historical development, for each of the last five symphonies (with the possible exception of the Sixth) represents an advance over its predecessor. But there is more than a mere historical interest to recommend at least the Second and Third Symphonies for performance. The Third is a very attractive work, as those who know it from the gramophone records can testify, while the Second has a final movement which, in Mr. Edwin Evans's words, 'ranks as one of Chaikovsky's finest achievements.'

"In spite of all this, however, it now appears that the Chaikovsky 'Festival' will be limited almost exclusively to thrice-familiar works such as the Fourth Symphony, the inescapable Sixth, and that true and tried battle-horse of the conductor, the Fifth. Add to these the comparatively well-known Piano Concerto in B-flat Minor and what remain as novelties of the orchestral programs of the 'Festival'? Only the First Symphony (a surprising concession!) and the Serenade for Strings.

"It looks indeed as though the 'Festival' has been organized along the lines of least resistance after the fashion prevailing in New York and Philadelphia. Except for the First Symphony, the orchestral programs have all the banality that commonly characterizes the programs of Mr. Stokowski, and that is something one did not expect from Dr. Koussevitzky."

The letter then proceeds to a couple of paragraphs sternly inquiring of this department whether it is going to maintain its traditional policy of hostility "to banality and perfunctory routine." In passing, one may remark how delightful it is to see these crusaders for the new also militantly championing that which has become traditional. The letter, after this digression, addresses itself again to the main point, now raising objections to the conductor's program-making in the current season:

"Why, for example, did the conductor play Sibelius's Second Symphony again this season, at three different concerts in Boston and one in Cambridge, when the same symphony had been played last season at all four of the series of Boston concerts as well as at the Cambridge series, and when, furthermore, in the season before that the symphony had also been played, twice in Boston, once in Cambridge? The symphony has now had twelve performances in Boston and vicinity within three successive seasons, three from a guest-conductor in 1932, and nine more since then from Dr. Koussevitzky—far too many for a symphony which is neither a masterpiece like Brahms's First (another perennial) not a work representative of the best of the composer, like Chaikovsky's Fifth. Indeed, the Second Symphony of Sibelius is today not representative of the composer at all, and to play it as much as Dr. Koussevitzky has been doing lately is not only unfair to the composer but gives a totally wrong idea of him to people who do not happen to know his mature works. The last four symphonies of Sibelius (and measurably the Third also) require a good deal of hearing to be understood; the Second does not. Why then did it, of all the seven, have to be played at all the supplementary concerts this year and last year (except this year's Tuesday series, which, being consecrated to Beethoven, fortunately escaped it)?

"Again, what good reason was there for putting all four of Brahms's symphonies again on the Friday and Saturday programs this season, when they all were heard last season? Why could not—and indeed why should not—another of Brahms's masterpieces that was revived last year for the first time in six seasons, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, have been played again this year instead of one of the symphonies? And what about the Double Concerto, also unheard, until the Festival, for many a long season and welcomed last year with tumultuous applause?

"The conductor's Debussyan repertory also calls for criticism; but having indicated so much, we think that any further instances of the conductor's newly-developed tendency to follow the line of least resistance in program-making may be left to the department of the Transcript whose business it is—or at least has been [hear! hear!]—to record such things. At the end of each symphonic season it was H. T. P.'s habit to take stock of the pleasures and disappointments which it had brought forth. This particular season, now concluding with a 'Festival' made up almost exclusively of hackneyed pieces, he might well have characterized as the least interesting of all Dr. Koussevitzky's ten seasons in Boston."

The letter bears the following signatures: Ernest Willetts, Jr., Herbert C. Crooks, Jr., Eric Durand, Beatrice Howell, Louis Harap, Elmer L. Olsson, W. W. Rust, Jr., W. Seidel, George Henry Lovett Smith.

Dear, dear, dear! And so we take it, unless the Transcript does something about it, the programs of the good, old Boston Symphony Orchestra are certain to go quickly and ignominiously to the dogs! Well, anyway, this department gives all manner of proper thanks for the compliment involved. As to the Chaikovsky festival, there is probably no concert-goer in Boston who takes his concerts more seriously than as mere entertainment, who would not have liked to hear more of the unknown Chaikovsky. In addition to the works mentioned in this letter, one would have liked to hear one of the suites, which while slight, are full of charm and represent a very real side of the composer. The erudite Karl Muck did not consider himself above playing one of them. Excerpts from the operas would also have been interesting.

Undoubtedly the reason why all these desirable things were not done, is to be found in the above letter itself, plus a very little simple arithmetic. The writers, in stating that each of the symphonies is an improvement on its predecessor, admit that the last three symphonies are the greatest of the composer's symphonic works. This being true, they could hardly have been omitted from a festival, no matter how hackneyed they may be. Including them leaves only three half-programs vacant. In the interests of variety, a piano concerto was placed on one of the programs. It might have been advisable to play the rare Second Concerto, which dates slightly later than the Fourth Symphony, rather than the First. But with a concerto included, only two half-programs were left. One of them was filled by one of the first three symphonies, exactly as the protestants desired. The remaining half-program originally contained both a movement from the "Manfred" symphony and the String Serenade. The inclusion of both made the program too long. So the "Manfred" was sacrificed, probably because the String Serenade gave the greater variety to the program as a whole. That in spite of its entirely negligible musical matter, it was a revelation through the sheer power of its sonorities, the concert proved. And there is the symphonic program of the festival. Though much was omitted that might well have been heard, it is difficult to see how there could have been a better logic of program making. Nor should one forget the interest which the singing and the songs sung by Madame Kurenko added to one program.

When our nine letter writers complain about the repetitiousness of the programs of succeeding seasons, they are on much more solid ground. One need not multiply examples. It might well be made a rule of program construction at Symphony Hall that no piece which belongs to the group that may roughly be termed "standard classics" (of course, right down through Stravinsky), no minor work, or no easily understood work, be repeated in successive seasons. The most casual glance through the records of performances in the past would seem to indicate that to a very considerable extent such a principle has been in force in certain portions of the orchestra's history; and that at a time when the total repertory was appreciably smaller than at present. Important novelties or revivals from the past might well be repeated in the year after their first performance, but it would seem difficult to find a valid reason for such repetition in the classes of works just enumerated.

The season has not brought as much extension of repertory as have most previous seasons. First performances have been fewer. Nor have there been those revivals of great things out of the past which have in other years been represented by Mahler's Ninth Symphony, "Das Lied von der Erde" and others. It may be argued, of course, that Dr. Koussevitzky has so extended the repertory of the orchestra in his long reign here, that it is becoming increasingly more and more difficult to find new fields to conquer. That is true, but the limit has by no means been reached. There are English fields worth exploring. The Italian field remains untouched. A suggestion here is that suites from Malipiero's operas are liked in Italy. The essential Schönberg still has not been heard here. Possibilities from Chaikovsky have been mentioned above. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" symphony might well be revived. Sibelius outside of the symphonies has significant things. American works on which the ink has dried might well be investigated more fully.

It is not the function of this department to find reasons or motives for the facts that exist. When a letter, however, suggests "indolence" or a "line of least resistance" as explanation for a Koussevitzkian course, it may be said that this is the poorest guess that could have been made. Anyone who knows the man knows that indolence and Koussevitzky are sworn enemies, that they have less affinity for each other than fire and water. Nor does one give credence to the supposition, not imputed in the letter, that the conductor may have capitulated in part to those who request that "you play for me my old favorites."

A more likely explanation of the year's programs (if one must be given) is that they spring out of the economic situation. When the previous season closed the Roosevelt Administration had been in office less than two months. The banking holiday was still the vivid memory of a horrible nightmare. Men's hearts were filled with fear, their minds with confusion. It would have been neither surprising nor unreasonable had the powers under these circumstances persuaded Dr. Koussevitzky that a course of retrenchment was necessary. As an expedient in depression times one can admit such a position. If adopted permanently it would impair the prestige of the orchestra. As an aside be it remarked that even with some economies, we in Boston have fared in sumptuous luxury compared, for example, with the New York Philharmonic with its program-"book" reduced to a single sheet.

For all this, the season has brought one successful experiment which may be very fruitful for the future. Recognizing that the fields to conquer for the repertory are growing appreciably smaller, Dr. Koussevitzky embarked upon the project of concert performance of extended portions of operatic works by giving the whole first act of "Die Walküre." The fineness of the performance, the enthusiasm of the audience, proved the success of the venture. It holds all manner of possibilities for future exploration.

It is interesting to note that of the 84 works performed 34, or about two-fifths, were by composers now living; 41 or almost exactly one-half were by "modernists" (beginning "modernism" for the purposes of this classification with Debussy). Figuring by nationalities, 37 (a terrific preponderance) were German or Austrian, 16 Russian, 9 French, 7 American; English, Finnish and Spanish with 6, 3, 2, respectively, and with a single work by Bloch who appears now to be a sort of man without a country. Performance, which in past years has tended toward increases in breadth, depth and intensity, has this year added to these virtues that of increase in clarity. The conductor never stands still, he is always adding to what he already has. Appreciation has never run higher than this year—due probably in part to the influx of 1200 new subscribers who took the places of those for whom the financial conditions of last summer made it impossible to renew their subscriptions.

A. H. M.

Whiting of Marlborough street. 3:30, 5:20 and 7:45.

Koussevitzky's Personality Has Led Symphony Upward

By MOSES SMITH

The heart of the Boston musical season is the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last of which was given on Saturday night last. There are many and varied other musical affairs, though they were fewer during the past season than in previous seasons. There remain even a few to come. Furthermore, we have now for two months and more the Pops concerts. Later there will be, in all likelihood, outdoor concerts.

But these things have not the artistic importance of the Boston Symphony concerts, even though they may attract a far larger number of listeners. With the number of other concerts declining, and with no opera season worthy of the name, Boston may be said to have, musically speaking, its best eggs in one basket—its famous orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky.

ARTISTIC HEIGHTS

This is emphasized by the fact that neither the orchestra nor its concerts suffered any decline during the past season. The orchestra gave five more concerts than during the preceding season. Its subscription lists held up very well, considering the times. And it ended the season practically without a deficit. So far as I know, it is the only important American orchestra which has not been seriously hit or perilously close to dissolution this year.

The principal reason for this state of affairs is, I think, the personality of Serge Koussevitzky. Granted that he has a magnificent group of musicians who have made possible the scaling of artistic heights. Yet hs himself made this orchestra. Further, by his and their eloquent music-making it has been possible to continue to draw money into the box-office. Beyond this, by his tact and magnetism he has made and retained friends of the orchestra who might not otherwise have been its friends.

Above all, by his rare courage, he has prevented a reduction in the size and quality of the orchestra—this I state on excellent authority. The musicians of the orchestra have Koussevitzky to thank for the fact that their pay cuts were no larger than they were. He has identified his cause with theirs, for during the past ten years Koussevitzky's life has been the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

MORE CONCERTS

A few concerts are still scheduled as the Pops close in to take almost entire possession of the musical scene. Tonight at Jordan Hall a trio of excellent Boston artists—Howard Goding, pianist; Alex Thiede, violinist, and Karl Zeise, 'cellist, play works by Beethoven (D major, opus 70), Turina, and Brahms (B major, opus 8).

Over in Cambridge at the same time a different kind of trio will share a program sponsored by the Radcliffe Musical Association in Agassiz House. The enlisted talents are Jean Bedetti, 'cellist; Felix Fox, pianist, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

Two 'cellists and a pianist will play in Agassiz House tomorrow evening. The pianist is Frederic Tillotson; the 'cellists are Henriette d'Estournelles de Constant, and her husband, Yves Chardon.

Carl Friedberg, an eminent pianist who ought to be heard more often in Boston, will be the artist at the Ritz-Carlton Morning Musicale on Thursday. Music by Beethoven and Brahms makes up most of his program.

* * *

And though the following doesn't come strictly under the heading of music, many concert-goers will be attracted by the dance recital of Pauline Chellis in the Repertory tonight.

161

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAY 2 - 1934

As a matter of record it may be stated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., has acquired the title to the Symphony hall property at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. The site was originally acquired through the generosity of the late Major Higginson. Hitherto the property has been held in the name of the New Boston Music Hall. The corporation which now takes over the property was created in 1918 as the result of Major Higginson's request to be relieved of the responsibilities which he had shouldered for so many years.

Interesting announcement on the eve of the close of the Boston Symphony's season was that of one gift of $102,741, enough to meet the deficit for the year's 112 concerts.

It was the largest gift from one person in a single year.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

3 - 1934

Boston Symphony Ends Outstanding Season of Concerts

The name of Ludwig van Beethoven led all the composers represented in the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just come to a close. This master was included nine times in the orchestra's programs. TschaiKovsky, with six works performed, was second, while Mozart and Richard Strauss shared third place with five compositions each. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, directed all four of the Brahms symphonies during the season. Ravel was also represented four times, and Sibelius and Bach three each.

Eighty-four separate compositions were performed in the 112 concerts of the season, according to the report issued for the trustees by President Bentley W. Warren. Forty-seven composers are represented in the season's repertoire, three of them for the first time. The orchestra performed 10 works in Boston for the first time, and four which had never previously been given public performance anywhere. These last-named included Berezowsky's "Symphony No. 2," Roy Harris's "Symphony: 1933," Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra," and "Moon Trails" by Whithorne.

Mr. Warren, in an encouraging foreword to his report, announces that the concerts have gained 1200 new subscribers to take places "reluctantly, and in many cases temporarily released . . . . last spring."

"The trustees," he added, take especial pleasure in announcing an unprecedented subscription of $102,741.07 of this year's deficit. "The deficit, he reports, has now been reduced to $18,000, a sum which, the trustees hope, will be cleared up by the end of the orchestra's fiscal year.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented twice in the Bushnell Concert Series here next season.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

MAY 2 - 1934

"Shut Up, You . . ."

Sir Thomas Beecham was not the first conductor to turn upon his audience with a peremptory demand for silence. If memory serves, Serge Koussevitsky did the same thing some years ago, and shocked the Brahmins by warning them not to babble through the Brahms. But in the long run they learned he was right and now none will hear chattering in Boston's Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon. He also trained the listeners not to interrupt between the movements of a symphony with handclapping, claiming that there should be nothing to break the sequence of the music until the last strains had died into nothingness. And then? Ah, then, applaud, and the more the merrier!

Sir Thomas should be given a vote of gratitude on the part of all music lovers. For there is nothing more exasperating than to hear whispers from the pit during the rendition of any music. He was right when he referred to such rudeness as an "incredible piece of barbarism." He said that if it ever occurred again he would "stop and address the house, asking them if they are savages or the fine flower audiences of the greatest city in the world."

There is a time to talk of Mrs. Smith's hat, to make remarks about Mrs. Jones' gown, ("This is the second Friday afternoon she has worn that thing!"), and that's why they have intermissions. But the time is not while Stravinsky's dissonances are wailing the rites of spring, or even while, on request night, the orchestra is pounding its way through the Polonaise of 1812. So, three cheers for good old Beecham and may his admonition to "shut up, you——" ring in the ears of all dowagers who feel the urge for expression more than the desire to bask in sweet music's strains. His words should be engraved above the busts of Beethoven and Bach in music halls everywhere.

Drama · Mus

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony's 53d Season

The three staccato chords in E major which serve as final punctuation to the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky last evening brought the Tchaikovsky Festival and the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conclusion. Like all Boston Symphony seasons, this just over passed too quickly; it seems that last October was but the day before yesterday.

The orchestra kept to the path and the standards which have for more than half a century been a criterion for the rest of this country, through a time when most of us kept one hand on our pocketbooks and an eye cocked upon our family budgets. Dr Koussevitzky's 10th year as conductor was distinguished in several ways: First, by the Beethoven Cycle which occupied the concerts in the Tuesday supplementary series, and during which were heard familiar masterpieces and rare specimens—chiefly of antiquarian value—by that supreme master of symphonic form. Secondly, by first performance in Boston of three scores which may indicate a considerable future for each of the American composers involved. These were the Symphony: 1933 of Roy Harris, Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra, and the Second Symphony, in E minor, of Randall Thompson. No feeling of artistic chauvinism, but a firm conviction of the merits of these compositions prompts one to say that of all the new music brought forward this season, only these proved worthy of remark.

Dr Koussevitzky once more exercised his commendable propensity for performing new music, and as has been the case many times in the past, we observed several indications of which way the musical wind seems to be blowing in European and American quarters. Most of them, inevitably turned out merely to be cross-currents. But that should of course be no deterrent to continuation of the practice. The function of any orchestra includes exhibition of new music purely because it is new. Such music may not live, but that of seeming interest deserves at least an initial airing. There were two pieces, agreeable though minor, which might profitably be heard again, the "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" of Pierne, and Lourie's inimitable "Sinfonia Dialectica."

Performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," with Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton for soloists, was musically rewarding. The idea is not new, but it is worthy of occasional employment in the case of great masterpieces. Certainly this city has heard no such music as well performed, orchestrally, in the opera house. The reason is obvious.

The Boston debut of Egon Petri, Dutch pianist; the first appearance with orchestra in this city of Yehudi Menuhin; the first public appearance in this country of Leonard Shure—following his sojourn in Germany, and the splendid piano playing of Artur Schnabel were notable occurrences insofar as soloists were concerned. Richard Burgin's beautiful interpretation of the Sibelius Violin Concerto once more indicated the exceptional powers of the concert master of the Boston Symphony, powers which ought not to be taken for granted.

The guest conductors, Sir Henry Wood and Arnold Schoenberg, were of distinctly higher order than has been the rule in the past several years.

And so, with the assurance that Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be on hand, next Oct 12, for another season, we who listen and we who record can with peace of mind take up neglected golf sticks and walking boots to enjoy a little first-hand observation of nature.

"Pops" Open Wednesday

A 49th season of "Pop" concerts will open in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening. Arthur Fiedler likewise begins his fifth season as conductor. The orchestra this year will number 85 players. The decorations of Symphony Hall, and the refreshments served at the tables will suit the Summer season, and will once more lend to the "Pops" their characteristic and inimitable atmosphere.

The second night, Thursday, has been taken by the Christopher Shop for the benefit of their organization, and will have a Spanish program with music in Spanish rhythm, not only by Spanish but French and other composers. There will also be dance numbers by Hans Wiener, and by Miriam Winslow. Monday, May 7th, has been similarly taken by the New England Medical Center, and will have Sanroma as soloist. On Tuesday, May 8th, there will be an all-Russian program.

The programs for this week are as follows:

Opening Night, Wednesday—March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; "The Medieval Castle," serenade for strings, Bolzoni; "Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils, R. Strauss; "The Saporogian Cossacks," Glibre; "Irish Reel," for strings, Pochon; "The Pines of Rome," symphonic poem, Respighi; "Girls of Baden," waltz, Komzak; "Jazz Nocturne," Suesse; "Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Wagner.

Friday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgor; "The Bartered Bride," overture, Smetana; "Whispering Flowers," Blon; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; prelude to "The Deluge," violin solo, J. Theodorowicz, Saint-Saens; "The Cid," suite, Massenet; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "Roses From the South," waltz, Strauss; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens.

Saturday—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Largo, Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Estudiantina," waltz, Waldteufel; American Patrol, Meacham.

Tuesday, May 8—"Le Coq d'Or," introduction and wedding march, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Eugene Oniegin," selection, Tschaikowsky; "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," orchestral sketch, Borodin; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Scheherazade," finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; Andante Cantabile, Marche Slave, "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Eschaikowsky; Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov.

ILY HERALD, MONDAY, NOVEM

the morning after

Boston Symphony

It is time to mention the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Providence concert of the season on the evening of December 5, in the Metropolitan Theatre.

As in past years there will be student tickets available, but since these will arrive during the coming vacation, it would be well for those interested to get in touch with Professor Coolidge in the near future and make reservations. This year I am told there will be more than in past years, but even so, in all probability there will be the usual great demand. In addition, those who want seats more advantageously placed may still buy season tickets from the management.

This year we find in addition to the three concerts usually conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky there will be one under the baton of guest conductor, This season will bring the renowned Englishman, Sir Henry Wood to our city.

The symphony for the first concert will be that of Beethoven, "Eroica", his number three symphony.

The second part of the program will consist of Gabriel Pierne's "Divertisments on a Pastoral Theme", a series of entertaining variations including a Viennese waltz, "blues", and a "gigue". Also we will hear the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina", and Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks", after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner in rondo form.

We may expect a fine presentation of a well-balanced program. Remember the date, December 5th; tickets from Professor Coolidge at "36 Prospect".

J. E. F., Jr.

161

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAY 2 - 1934

As a matter of record it may be stated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., h[illegible] the title to the Symphony hall property at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. The site was originally acquired through the generosity of the late Major Higginson. Hitherto the property has been held in the name of the New Boston Music Hall. The corporation which now takes over the property was created in 1918 as the result of Major Higginson's request to be relieved of the responsibilities which he had shouldered for so many years.

Interesting announcement on the eve of the close of the Boston Symphony's season was that of one gift of $102,741, enough to meet the deficit for the year's 112 concerts.

It was the largest gift from one person in a single year.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAY 3 - 1934

Boston Symphony Ends Outstanding Season of Concerts

The name of Ludwig van Beethoven led all the composers represented in the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just come to a close. This master was included nine times in the orchestra's programs. TschaiKovsky, with six works performed, was second, while Mozart and Richard Strauss shared third place with five compositions each. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, directed all four of the Brahms symphonies during the season. Ravel was also represented four times, and Sibelius and Bach three each.

Eighty-four separate compositions were performed in the 112 concerts of the season, according to the report issued for the trustees by President Bentley W. Warren. Forty-seven composers are represented in the season's repertoire, three of them for the first time. The orchestra performed 10 works in Boston for the first time, and four which had never previously been given public performance anywhere. These last-named included Berezowsky's "Symphony No. 2," Roy Harris's "Symphony: 1933," Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra," and "Moon Trails" by Whithorne.

Mr. Warren, in an encouraging foreword to his report, announces that the concerts have gained 1200 new subscribers to take places "reluctantly, and in many cases temporarily released . . . . last spring."

"The trustees," he added, take especial pleasure in announcing an unprecedented subscription of $102,741.07 of this year's deficit. "The deficit, he reports, has now been reduced to $18,000, a sum which, the trustees hope, will be cleared up by the end of the orchestra's fiscal year.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented twice in the Bushnell Concert Series here next season.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
MAY 2 - 1934

"Shut Up, You . . ."

Sir Thomas Beecham was not the first conductor to turn upon his audience with a peremptory demand for silence. If memory serves, Serge Koussevitsky did the same thing some years ago, and shocked the Brahmins by warning them not to babble through the Brahms. But in the long run they learned he was right and now none will hear chattering in Boston's Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon. He also trained the listeners not to interrupt between the movements of a symphony with handclapping, claiming that there should be nothing to break the sequence of the music until the last strains had died into nothingness. And then? Ah, then, applaud, and the more the merrier!

Sir Thomas should be given a vote of gratitude on the part of all music lovers. For there is nothing more exasperating than to hear whispers from the pit during the rendition of any music. He was right when he referred to such rudeness as an "incredible piece of barbarism." He said that if it ever occurred again he would "stop and address the house, asking them if they are savages or the fine flower audiences of the greatest city in the world."

There is a time to talk of Mrs. Smith's hat, to make remarks about Mrs. Jones' gown, ("This is the second Friday afternoon she has worn that thing!"), and that's why they have intermissions. But the time is not while Stravinsky's dissonances are wailing the rites of spring, or even while, on request night, the orchestra is pounding its way through the Polonaise of 1812. So, three cheers for good old Beecham and may his admonition to "shut up, you——" ring in the ears of all dowagers who feel the urge for expression more than the desire to bask in sweet music's strains. His words should be engraved above the busts of Beethoven and Bach in music halls everywhere.

Drama · Mus

Globe Apr 29

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony's 53d Season

The three staccato chords in E major which serve as final punctuation to the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky last evening brought the Tchaikovsky Festival and the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conclusion. Like all Boston Symphony seasons, this just over passed too quickly; it seems that last October was but the day before yesterday.

The orchestra kept to the path and the standards which have for more than half a century been a criterion for the rest of this country, through a time when most of us kept one hand on our pocketbooks and an eye cocked upon our family budgets. Dr Koussevitzky's 10th year as conductor was distinguished in several ways: First, by the Beethoven Cycle which occupied the concerts in the Tuesday supplementary series, and during which were heard familiar masterpieces and rare specimens—chiefly of antiquarian value—by that supreme master of symphonic form. Secondly, by first performance in Boston of three scores which may indicate a considerable future for each of the American composers involved. These were the Symphony: 1933 of Roy Harris, Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra, and the Second Symphony, in E minor, of Randall Thompson. No feeling of artistic chauvinism, but a firm conviction of the merits of these compositions prompts one to say that of all the new music brought forward this season, only these proved worthy of remark.

Dr Koussevitzky once more exercised his commendable propensity for performing new music, and as has been the case many times in the past, we observed several indications of which way the musical wind seems to be blowing in European and American quarters. Most of them, inevitably turned out merely to be cross-currents. But that should of course be no deterrent to continuation of the practice. The function of any orchestra includes exhibition of new music purely because it is new. Such music may not live, but that of seeming interest deserves at least an initial airing. There were two pieces, agreeable though minor, which might profitably be heard again, the "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" of Pierne, and Lourie's inimitable "Sinfonia Dialectica."

Performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," with Elsa Alsen, Paul Althouse and Fred Patton for soloists, was musically rewarding. The idea is not new, but it is worthy of occasional employment in the case of great masterpieces. Certainly this city has heard no such music as well performed, orchestrally, in the opera house. The reason is obvious.

The Boston debut of Egon Petri, Dutch pianist; the first appearance with orchestra in this city of Yehudi Menuhin; the first public appearance in this country of Leonard Shure—following his sojourn in Germany, and the splendid piano playing of Artur Schnabel were notable occurrences insofar as soloists were concerned. Richard Burgin's beautiful interpretation of the Sibelius Violin Concerto once more indicated the exceptional powers of the concert master of the Boston Symphony, powers which ought not to be taken for granted.

The guest conductors, Sir Henry Wood and Arnold Schoenberg, were of distinctly higher order than has been the rule in the past several years.

And so, with the assurance that Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be on hand, next Oct 12, for another season, we who listen and we who record can with peace of mind take up neglected golf sticks and walking boots to enjoy a little first-hand observation of nature.

"Pops" Open Wednesday

A 49th season of "Pop" concerts will open in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening. Arthur Fiedler likewise begins his fifth season as conductor. The orchestra this year will number 85 players. The decorations of Symphony Hall, and the refreshments served at the tables will suit the Summer season, and will once more lend to the "Pops" their characteristic and inimitable atmosphere.

The second night, Thursday, has been taken by the Christopher Shop for the benefit of their organization, and will have a Spanish program with music in Spanish rhythm, not only by Spanish but French and other composers. There will also be dance numbers by Hans Wiener, and by Miriam Winslow. Monday, May 7th, has been similarly taken by the New England Medical Center, and will have Sanroma as soloist. On Tuesday, May 8th, there will be an all-Russian program.

The programs for this week are as follows:

Opening Night, Wednesday—March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod: "Mignon," overture, Thomas; "The Medieval Castle," serenade for strings, Bolzoni; "Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils, R. Strauss: "The Saporogian Cossacks," Glibre: "Irish Reel," for strings, Pochon: "The Pines of Rome," symphonic poem, Respighi: "Girls of Baden," waltz, Komzak; "Jazz Nocturne," Suesse; "Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Wagner.

Friday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgor; "The Bartered Bride," overture, Smetant; "Whispering Flowers," Blon; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; prelude to "The Deluge," violin solo, J. Theodorowicz, Saint-Saens; "The Cid," suite, Massenet; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "Roses From the South," waltz, Strauss; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens.

Saturday—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Largo, Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Estudiantina," waltz, Waldteufel; American Patrol, Meacham.

Tuesday, May 8—"Le Coq d'Or," introduction and wedding march, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Eugene Oniegin," selection, Tschaikowsky; "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," orchestral sketch, Borodin; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Scheherazade," finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; Andante Cantabile, Marche Slave, "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Eschaikowsky; Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov.

---

nov 27

ILY HERALD, MONDAY, NOVEM

the morning after

Boston Symphony

It is time to mention the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Providence concert of the season on the evening of December 5, in the Metropolitan Theatre.

As in past years there will be student tickets available, but since these will arrive during the coming vacation, it would be well for those interested to get in touch with Professor Coolidge in the near future and make reservations. This year I am told there will be more than in past years, but even so, in all probability there will be the usual great demand. In addition, those who want seats more advantageously placed may still buy season tickets from the management.

This year we find in addition to the three concerts usually conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky there will be one under the baton of guest conductor, This season will bring the renowned Englishman, Sir Henry Wood to our city.

The symphony for the first concert will be that of Beethoven, "Eroica", his number three symphony.

The second part of the program will consist of Gabriel Pierne's "Divertisments on a Pastoral Theme", a series of entertaining variations including a Viennese waltz, "blues", and a "gigue". Also we will hear the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina", and Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks", after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner in rondo form.

We may expect a fine presentation of a well-balanced program. Remember the date, December 5th; tickets from Professor Coolidge at "36 Prospect".

J. E. F., Jr.

A Decade of Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Apr 29

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

In the publicity sent out from Symphony Hall, there has been very little anxiety apparent as to the immediate future of Boston Symphony Orchestra. That in itself is the answer to any question relative to the orchestra's condition at the end of ten years under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. And why this noticeable current of assurance during a period of great uncertainty? Because the achievements of the orchestra under its present conductor have left an imprint on the sensibilities of its audiences that makes its security and general welfare matters of necessity. No other answer is needed.

It is, of course, impossible to adequately review within the limits of a Sunday article, even the high points of the activities of orchestra and conductor during the past ten years. More potent than detailed accounts of works played are some excerpts from the recently published statement of Bentley W. Warren for the trustees:

"The Trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra desire to express their thanks to the patrons of the orchestra and to the subscribers to its funds for their support during the coming year.

"During the present symphony season the orchestra will have given 112 concerts; 66 in Symphony Hall, 46 elsewhere......For the four Boston series alone, more than 1200 new subscribers were found to take up places reluctantly and in many cases temporarily released by subscribers last spring.

"Through the foresight and generosity of many friends, the orchestra is now fortunate in owning its own home. The acquisition of Symphony Hall has not increased the orchestra's financial responsibilities. On the other hand, it will result in certain economies.

"The Trustees take especial pleasure in announcing an unprecedented subscription of $102,741.07 to this year's deficit. There still remains, however, an estimated deficit of approximately $18,000, which includes about $11,000 from the year 1933 and about $7,000 for the current season. It would give the Trustees great satisfaction if this remaining deficit were cleared before the close of the fiscal year on July 31 and they will welcome any contributions for this purpose from subscribers and patrons who feel generously disposed towards the orchestra."

Behind this modest and dignified statement is a record of accomplishment which should be a matter of pride for everyone connected with the Boston Symphony. If governments could come as near balancing their budgets, the world would sigh with relief. If governments functioned as effectively as the Boston Symphony does under the esthetic discipline of Dr. Koussevitzky, there would be little need of economic or even disarmament conferences.

We have in addition to the public statement of Mr. Warren, information that the enthusiasm and support which have become a part of the natural life of this great orchestra in Boston, have been equalled in other cities on the regular visiting schedule of the Boston Symphony. There has been a series in New York, Brooklyn and Providence, with the last Providence concert breaking all records for symphony attendance in that city. Baltimore and Washington used to be allotted one concert each per season. This past year the one concert was increased to three in each city and the same number is announced in each case for the next season. When the Boston Symphony played in Chicago this past season, that city's critics literally impoverished their vocabulary in an effort to do justice to the orchestra.

In fairness to the earnest, searching quality of his musical nature it cannot be said that the Serge Koussevitzky who came to Boston ten years ago was as great an artist as the Dr. Koussevitzky of today. The early Koussevitzky experiences in this city were not without opposition. But opposition and unbelief have made way for respect and admiration. Entire agreement on the part of everyone with the interpretations of Dr. Koussevitzky would mean stagnation for himself and eventual lack of interest on the part of his audiences.

A perpetual and successful striving for greater catholicity and more profound and important values has been the aim of this remarkable conductor, for himself and the offerings of his orchestra. We wonder whether any other orchestra gives its audiences a more varied fare. Besides representing the established works of the orchestral literature, the Boston Symphony has introduced many novelties by European and American composers. And what orchestra can do more magnificent justice to new works? Its conductor's sympathy with the output of living composers has, through contact with a great number of new works, built up a unique technical and temperamental adaptability.

Koussevitzky is the true servant of his public. He spares no effort to keep himself in superb physical condition. This accounts for the untiring enthusiasm and the unflagging artistic qualities which are as apparent in the final as in the opening concerts of each season.

We were recently asked if we had found the present Boston Symphony season interesting. It has been one of the most stimulating events of our entire musical experience. During the past 10 years. Dr. Koussevitzky has, with admirable co-operation from all concerned, built up an instrument that has but few peers.

Tchaikovsky Festival Will End Tonight

By MOSES SMITH

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was played yesterday afternoon and will be repeated tonight ends the current Tchaikovsky Festival and the symphonic season as well.

These final concerts round off a decade during which Serge Koussevitzky has been leading the famous orchestra—the longest continous tenure any conductor of that organization has enjoyed. The present season has been notable for many remarkable performances, interesting new and semi-new works, and unusually fine soloists.

A review of the season, as well as a general survey of Mr. Koussevitzky's long reign, may for the moment be postponed.

ARISE FROM SEATS

It is enough to say here that the nature of his great achievements must have at least flitted through the minds of the people in the audience yesterday as they arose from their seats to greet him at the begining of the concert. And it must have been partially responsible for the tremendous ovation that broke out when the concert was finished.

The music itself was something to excite the listener. The program consisted of only two works—the first and fifth symphonies of Tchaikovsky, in G minor and E minor. The latter work is familiar here, especially in the rendering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

BALANCE DESCRIBED

The performance of yesterday was typical—only more so. It was superbly planned, the various episodes were beautifully balanced. The contrasts in dynamics and movement were almost hysterical sharp—but this is Tchaikovsk And everything the conducto asked from his men he got.

The G minor symphony, writte almost 80 years ago, when Tcha kovsky was in his mid-twenties ha never (believe it or not!) bee played at a Boston Symphony cor cert. In its dramatic moments an in touches of orchestral coloring i predicts the composer of the late symphonies. To the extent that th lyrical mood prevails, however, thi is the Tchaikovsky of approximately such a work as the piano piece "Troika." There is no intention t be snobbish in this statement, fo the symphony has an old-worlc charm. It was well-liked by yesterday's audience, who heard wha seemed like an excellent perform ance.

Enthusiasm to Mark the End Of a Season

Apr. 21

Dr. Koussevitzky's Farewell To the Friday Matinee Audience

WITH the concerts of yesterday and of this evening the Chaikovsky festival and the fifty-third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the tenth under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, come to a close. Beginnings and endings of seasons have become occasions for ceremonial. Yesterday the ceremonial elements were heightened above those of other years. At the beginning of the afternoon the orchestra rose to greet the entering Koussevitzky, applauding, orchestral fashion, by tapping bows on backs of violins. The audience quickly took its cue from the orchestra, rose also by way of expressing esteem for a conductor about to lead his men through the last concert of the season.

All this was as usual on last Fridays. What occurred after the concert was unusual. To say that applause was loud and lasted long would be understatement of the fact. The audience quickly rose to its feet, supplemented the usual clapping of hands with stamping of feet, waving of handkerchiefs, umbrellas, hats, anything that happened to be at hand to add to the demonstration. Dr. Koussevitzky, after a few bows, brought the orchestra to its feet to share the applause. More bows, but no abatement in applause. The conductor shook Mr. Burgin's hand. The applause increased rather than lessened. At this new outburst, Dr. Koussevitzky enlarged upon precedent, shook hands all around the circle of first-desk string players, went into the wood-wind section, shook hands with principals there. Still the demonstration continued. The conductor was visibly affected. His bright confident smile gave way for a moment to a look of serious gravity when the full significance of this expression of esteem and satisfaction took full hold of him. More applause, more bows under the influence of an emotion which the conductor was obviously struggling to control, a return of the smile of complete self-possession, presently an abatement of the ovation, and the Fridays of the 1933-34 symphony concerts in Boston had passed into history.

The program at this occasion, the last of the Chaalkovsky festival, consisted of the composer's First and Fifth Symphonies. The First had not previously been heard at these concerts. The Fifth is Chaikovsky's acknowledged masterpiece. The First is a youthful work which the composer wrote immediately after finishing his studies at the Conservatory of what was at that time St. Petersburg. During the summer and early fall, after leaving his formal studies he labored at it. Intense labor and a nervous breakdown it cost him. When it was finished he sent it back to his former teachers, Anton Rubinstein and Zaramba, who pronounced it unworthy of performance. He went to work upon revisions. There were a few performances of individual movements. Not until two years had elapsed did it receive a full performance. Then the public received it with every expression of approval. Chaikovsky is on record as having said that throughout his life he retained more than a passing fondness for this symphony. But he also admitted at one time that this may have been because of the undue amount of work he was forced to spend on it.

That the performance yesterday revealed the symphony in its most favorable light goes without saying. That there is much of genuine charm in it, that it contains many a pleasing quality is equally patent. And that it contains the germs of the whole of the future Chaikovsky—of course with less certainty of handling—must have been evident to all who followed it closely. The symphony, with title "Winter Dreams" runs through the usual four movements: the first, Allegro tranquillo, bears also the title "Dreams of a Winter Journey"; the second, Adagio cantabile, has been labelled by English translators both "Rugged Cloudland" and "Dark Country, Hazy Country"; the scherzo (Allegro scherzando giocoso) and the finale (Andante lugubre; allegro maestoso; allegro vivo) have no programmatic titles.

Witness the essential Chaikovsky in this early work: There were the long-flowing sensuous melodies, attractively modelled, which were later to assume the intensity of dark passion. There was at least one point at which one heard the growling harmonies of instruments playing closely together in low registers—and that in the manner which one gets only in Chaikovsky. There was the bright decorative use of flutes. There was suggestion of the imitative counterpoint which is so persistent a quality of his later style. There was the use of the melancholy folk-song. There was the colorful use of the orchestra in which Chaikovsky later became a master. In the slow movement there was, for example, a division which strongly suggested to the writer the glittering, crunching snow of a winter's landscape. The ever-present Chaikovskian waltz already made its debut as the trio of the scherzo.

Undoubtedly the list could be lengthened, but these suggestions reveal sufficiently how the musical personality of Chaikovsky was an essential unity, how it made itself felt from the beginning. Embryos all, these qualities in time made the master. Nor should one overlook the manner in which the youthful composer set to work to put all that he had not yet included in the symphony into the finale, to show also his young skill in combining many diverse elements. This finale begins with a melody in the true Chaikovskian vein; utilizes Russian dance formulas; continues with a somewhat extended fugal passage; at the end works up an intense climactic portion with material suggesting the future Marche Slave and in a manner prophetic of the later Chaikovskian apotheoses. Thus the young composer was unconsciously foretelling the course of his future musical life.

There is not much doubt that most complete fulfillment came in the much played and well known Fifth Symphony. Description is here unnecessary, attempt at new comment virtually impossible. For years the conductor has given of his best to this symphony. His every performance of it praises him. The men of the orchestra vie with him in the degree in which they can wring from it every ounce of Chaikovskian effect. Yesterday's performance, like other performances of the familiar works during the festival, seemed to add fire to readings of the symphony as remembered from the past. Challengingly the proclamations of the motto rang out. In their most essential form one heard the themes of the first movement. The horn solo of the Andante cantabile came with a smoothness and yet with a magnificence which must draw a word for Mr. Böttcher. Again the Chaikovskian waltz for third movement, but with what a difference from the other waltzes heard this week! And at the last, as climax of climaxes, for symphony, day and week, the final movement. That conductor and men rose to the occasion is proved by the scene, already described, which followed. That scene gave thanks for another year of the conductor and the orchestra which he has fashioned in his image. But it was kindled by the sumptuous fury of this finale. Without it emotions in the audience would hardly have reached the high pitch they did.

A. H. M.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops, which begn their season at Symphony hall on Wednesday night.

Pop Con
Opens

Tomorrow will night of the Pop phony hall. Arthu his fifth season as Pops conductors.
symphony players w
The refreshments and the decoration
mer season and characteristic atmo
There will be tw
the Pop concert o
has been taken by t
and will have a Spe

Wiener and 30
Dancers will appe offering an unusua
"Andalusian Love
of Monday, May
the New Engla
Arthur Fiedler an program for Tues
The opening pr
lows:
March from "The Q
"Mignon," overture
"The Medieval Ca
strin
"Salome," Dance o
"The Saporogian C
"Irish Reel," for
"The Pines of Rom
"Girls of Baden,"
"Jazz Nocturne"
"Tannhauser." Ent
into the Wartb

POPS S READY

Fiedler Sta
as Bosto
To

The 49th seas will open in Sy evening at 8:3
Fiedler conducti
85 symphony
bidding. It wi
Fielder's fifth
these concerts.
As in previo
will be gay wit keeping with Brightly-colored floor and refres usual.
Throughout acteristic atmo part of the B foreign and y tonian. For n nings of fine
tinctly unique
The program will begin wit music of Goun of Sheba," wil of popular and including Rich the Dance of t opera "Salyom
the entrance Wartburg from opera Tannhau
The complet evening follows
March from "Th
"Mignon," over
"The Medieval strings
"Salome," Danc
"The Saporogian
"Irish Reel," fo
"The Pines of R
"Girls of Baden,
"Jazz Nocturne"
"Tannhauser," E
into the Wart

Arthur Fie
To Con
Whic

Arthur Fie drive, will baton for th season at Sy nesday, May musical fare and delightf
Pop Specials have become tidings of M time invok moods in t musical mel
Time has tuate Mr. stinctive m vast techni acumen a become we concert tou early Fall,
Cecilia Soci
peared so
Boston S
The MacD
The Bosto
tra, The F
besides co test to h
in all of
—to mor
An ea public a
May 2nd
Boston S
tra.

163

Trav. May 1

Pop Concerts to Opens Tomorrow

Tomorrow will bring the opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall. Arthur Fiedler will begin his fifth season as the most popular of Pops conductors. An orchestra of 85 symphony players will be at his bidding. The refreshments served at the tables and the decorations will suit the summer season and lend the Pops their characteristic atmosphere.

There will be two benefit concerts—the Pop concert of Thursday, May 3, has been taken by the Christopher Shop and will have a Spanish program. Hans Wiener and 30 of the Hans Wiener Dancers will appear on this program, offering an unusual interpretation called "Andalusian Love Story." The concert of Monday, May 7, has been taken by the New England Medical Centre. Arthur Fiedler announces an all-Russian program for Tuesday, May 8.

The opening program of May 2 follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod
"Mignon," overture..................Thomas
"The Medieval Castle," serenade for strings..........................Bolzoni
"Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils. R. Strauss
"The Saporogian Cossacks"..........Gliece
"Irish Reel," for strings............Pochon
"The Pines of Rome," symphonic poem. Respighi
"Girls of Baden," waltz............Komzak
"Jazz Nocturne"......................Suesse
"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg...............Wagner

---

He is a director of many

POPS SEASON READY TO OPEN

Trav. May 1

Fiedler Starts Fifth Year as Boston Conductor Tomorrow

The 49th season of the Pops concert will open in Symphony hall tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock with Arthur Fiedler conducting and an orchestra of 85 symphony players following his bidding. It will be the beginning of Fielder's fifth season as conductor at these concerts.

As in previous years Symphony hall will be gay with tasteful decorations in keeping with the summer season. Brightly-colored tables will fill the floor and refreshments will be served as usual.

Throughout there will be that characteristic atmosphere, now so much a part of the Pops, that is somewhat foreign and yet very definitely Bostonian. For now these informal evenings of fine music have become distinctly unique to this city.

The program for the opening night will begin with the familiar march music of Gounod's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," will run through a series of popular and semi-popular selections including Richard Strauss's music to the Dance of the Seven Veils from the opera "Salyome," and will end with the entrance of the guests into the Wartburg from Wagner's well known opera Tannhauser.

The complete program for tomorrow evening follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod
"Mignon," overture..................Thomas
"The Medieval Castle," serenade for strings..........................Bolzoni
"Salome," Dance of the Seven Veils. R. Strauss
"The Saporogian Cossacks"..........Gliece
"Irish Reel," for strings............Pochon
"The Pines of Rome," symphonic poem. Respighi
"Girls of Baden," waltz............Komzak
"Jazz Nocturne"......................Suesse
"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg...............Wagner

---

Arthur Fiedler To Conduct "Pops" Which Start May 2

Arthur Fiedler, of Memorial drive, will again assume the baton for the current "Pops" season at Symphony hall, Wednesday, May 2nd, which offers a musical fare no less tempting and delightful than its famous Pop Specials. These concerts have become one of the welcome tidings of May-time and spring time invoking gay and happy moods in tune with sparkling musical melodies.

Time has but served to accentuate Mr. Fiedler's string instinctive musical sense and his vast technical resource until his acumen and discernment have become well-nigh infallible. A concert tour of the South in the early Fall, his direction of the Cecilia Society Chorus which appeared so creditably with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, The MacDowell Club Orchestra, The Boston University Orchestra, The Robin Hood Operetta, besides considerable teaching attest to his devotion to music in all of its ways and by-ways—to more and more work.

An eager and enthusiastic public awaits his appearance on May 2nd as conductor of the Boston Smyphony Pops orchestra.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

MAY 1 - 1934

To the Pops

Many from Lowell are intending to be present for the opening of the summer series of the Boston Symphony "Pops" at Symphony hall on Wednesday evening. Arthur Fiedler, beginning his fifth season as conductor of the popular series, will direct a program including such favorites as the march from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," the "Mignon" by Thomas; "The Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss "Salome"; Pochon's Irish Reel for Strings; Komzak's Waltz, "The Girls of Baden"; a Jazz Nocturne of Suesse and others. On Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings there will also be programs suited to the most discerning, while on all occasions, there will be opportunity for refreshment both on the main floor and in the lobby of the first balcony. As in the past, too, there are to be many special nights with dancers and various other attractions.

With the closing of the formal season of the Boston Symphony and the opening of the Pops series, announcement has already come that the 54th formal season of the ensemble will begin on Oct. 12. It is interesting to note that one of the outstanding events of the season that is now past was the acquisition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., of the Symphony hall property at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Through the generosity of the late Major Henry L. Higginson and other leading citizens, the site was acquired and the building erected in 1900, the property being held in the name of the New Boston Music Hall.

Pop Concert Opener Wins High Favor

By MOSES SMITH

Spring has come. If you have followed the calendar, or observed the weather, you have been deceived by appearances. For, as every Bostonian should know, spring does not really begin until the opening of the Pops Concerts at Symphony Hall.

This fundamental truth has been established during the course of 48 years. Last night's opening of Pops' 49th season, restated an axiom in familiar terms. The hall was crowded with people, whose outward aspect was springlike, and whose inner mood was in corresponding harmony. The redecoration of the hall itself was consistent with the prevailing atmosphere.

Opening night at Pops reminds you of many things: Of the pleasure of hearing light music well played; of being permitted to eat and drink and smoke while listening; of the urbanity which allows a gentle conversation behind the screen of music without the inevitable 'shushing" which would greet such an affront to a formal winter concert.

Almost always one starts by forgetting the music and ends by listening attentively. For if you have any music in your soul you cannot help being reminded of it by an orchestra which is substantially the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, and which is led by an able conductor.

Arthus Fiedler, who has directed four previous seasons of Pops, was again on the stand last night. He had arranged a well-balanced program, which began and ended with operatic selections, contained several light and characteristic numbers, and paused to renew acquaintance with three works from the symphonic repertoire— the dance from Richard Strauss "Salome," the exciting "Saporogian Cossacks" of Gliere, and Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome."

During the course of the concert Mr. Fiedler was not content to wave his stick with routine precision, but sought as well to interpret the musical score, whether it was the pretentious work of Respighi or a light, flavorsome "Jazz Nocturne" of Suesse (a lady who arose from her seat on the floor several times to acknowledge the hearty applause). For the most part the musicians responded with performances bettering in quality those of preceding sessions. Of all the program, Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra were probably most successful in the Gliere composition.

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM

Tonight will be "Spanish Night" at the Pops in Symphony Hall, the concert being given for the benefit of the Chrstopher Shop. Dancers upon the stage, and costumes in the auditorium will enliven the occasion. The program follows:

March, "Los Banderillos"..Volpatti
"Carmen," Suite ....Bizet
"La Goyescas," Intermezzo .... Granados
Capriccio Espagnol .... Rimsky--Korsakov
"Espana," Rhapsody ......Chabrier
Miss Miriam Winslow:
Andalouse from "The Cid" .... Massenet
Orgia from Danza Fantastica .... Turina
Bolero ....Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" "Love the Sorcer.r") ....de Falla
Hans Wiener and Dance Group

SINGS A SPNES

29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

And now the formal music season has ended and the Pops begin! With the conclusion of last evening's Symphony Concert the Boston orchestra completed its 53d season, and Dr. Koussevitzky his 10th as conductor of that band. Incidentally that concert also brought to a close the Tchaikovsky Festival which celebrated the completion of that decade of directorship.

* * * *

In some ways this has been a banner year for the Boston Symphony. For one thing the subscription towards its expenses has been the largest ever received in a single season, and leaves for the year 1934 the comparatively trifling deficit, as orchestral finances go, of but $7000. (To that, unfortunately, must be added the deficit of $11,000 carried over from 1933, but even then the balance-sheet makes a better showing than might have been anticipated.) Furthermore, the orchestra has given during the past season a total of 112 concerts—five more than the schedule of the preceding year. And to the list of subscribers to the four series of Boston concerts have been added 1200 new names. That some of these took the places of other former subscribers who for one or another reason were forced to release their seats is a regrettable corollary of this increase, but the fact remains that symphonic audiences in Boston have thereby been enlarged and appreciation of symphonic music made proportionately more wide-spread.

* * * *

The passing of the actual ownership of Symphony Hall to the Boston Symphony Orchestra is another event of the season just ended. And so, under altogether auspicious circumstances, the orchestra plans its 54th season to begin on Oct. 12, as Dr. Koussevitzky prepares to depart for Europe and the Pops take over Symphony Hall.

* * * *

The Pops will open on Wednesday evening, with Arthur Fiedler beginning his fifth season as their conductor. Again there will be an orchestra of 85 symphony players, again refreshments will be served at tables on the floor and in the lobby of the first balcony, and again there will be many special nights, with dancers and various other added attractions. The programmes of this opening week are given in detail on this same page.

* * * *

The 1934

The Pops to Usher in the Spring Season

With Light Wines Now to Add To the Festivity of The Occasion

IN the three days after the close of the concert season Symphony Hall undergoes a great transformation. The rows and rows of seats are whisked away, tables and chairs take their place. Green and white lattice work encircles the stage. An ornate chandelier adds to the picture. The walls of the auditorium have become a rich green. And the observant will have noted that new green cloth coverings have been added to the backs of the chairs. The "Pops" are with us.

It was practically a sold-out house that listened to Arthur Fiedler and his men last evening. One was a bit dismayed when one looked over the house at exactly 8.30, when Mr. Fiedler briskly stepped to the conductor's podium and began the opening march without a moment's hesitation. For many of the tables were still vacant. But latecomers filled them presently, coming singly and in large groups, between numbers and breaking in during one number. "It is exactly like opera," said a neighbor to the right; "and adds immensely to the festiveness of the occasion," answered the neighbor to the left. But before the first intermission not a vacant table could one see—with galleries full as they always have been.

On the part of many there was quick scanning of the program-book. It fell open naturally to its center pages, with their captions, "To Eat, To Drink, To Nibble, To Smoke." For the first time in many a year "Beer and Ale" headed the half-page entitled, "To Drink." But the page before carried also a list of some forty-odd imported and California wines. And the trade which the waitresses were doing in these various liquid refreshments indicated their great popularity. That popularity never became great enough that any in the large crowd lost the sense of decorum.

The program matched the festiveness of the occasion. Marches and waltzes had their place. In the last group tunes popular in current movies were popular here also. Each of the three groups ended with a "classic"—the first with the languorously voluptuous "Dance of the Seven Veils" out of Strauss's "Salome," the second with Respighi's symphonic poem in four connected movements, "The Pines of Rome," the last with the scene of the "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from "Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The second group was the "heavies" of the three, following a principle of program making long established at the Pops. A touch of novelty it added with Glière's "Saporogian Cossacks." But the audience indicated its most enthusiastic approval for two of the encores. When after Pochon's string arrangement of an Irish reel, the audience saw the word "wine" in the title of the encore-card for the piece, "Wine, Women and Song," a wave of approval swelled tremendously through the already existing applause, to be quieted only when Mr. Fiedler raised his baton. But even this was eclipsed by the announcement, after the "Girls of Baden" waltz, of the "Carioca." And in this case the audience was not quieted by the playing of the piece. Nothing would do but that this encore had to be played twice. After the second playing the audience subsided.

Glière's "Saporogian Cossacks" was inspired by a painting by Ilia Rêpin of a group of rough Cossacks, sitting about a table, writing a letter. The Sultan Mahomet IV of Turkey had sent them a letter commanding that they cease their raiding and their lawlessness and surrender and submit to him. Most of the sultan's letter consists of the high-flown titles which he liked to give himself. The Cossacks of course refuse. In their letter they match the sultan's terms of compliment with terms of derision and contempt. They end their letter with "Go to hell and" three words much worse, necessarily deleted. Glière's piece proceeds through an introduction, a section devoted to the composing and reading of the letter, another to the laughter of the Cossacks, a final one to their rejoicing and their dancing. Glière points his scheme in a mildly modernistic manner. Of special interest are the contrapuntal chatterings of the Cossacks while writing their letter, the Russian dances in the final section, the climax to which this section rises. Mr. Fiedler conducted as if he thoroughly believed in the piece, and the men with the same will and the same enthusiasm that they might have displayed had they been the Cossacks themselves.

The perennial "Pines of Rome" can also be counted on to interest a Pops audience. It did not fail so to do last evening. There must have been many who had not heard the piece, for the phonograph record of the nightingale singing in the Pines of the Janiculum obviously came as a surprise to many. Incidentally, those who rent this music must have sent a new record, for there was not the scratchiness which one observed at the last previous hearing. Also, one interested in such matters, might have noticed that last evening's nightingale sang with much fuller voice than when the piece was introduced at a regular symphony concert some years ago—due no doubt to the many improvements made in phonographic reproduction in the intervening years. The climax made by the concluding movement, with its march of the Roman legions past the Pines of the Appian Way, is always highly effective. Mr. Fiedler played it stirringly, making most of the effect of the striding legions, the cumulative excitements of the martial rhythms.

Similarly Mr. Fiedler caught admirably the spirit of languorous sensuality which breathes from every page of Strauss's and Salome's "Dance of the Seven Veils." Nor did a single one of the men of the orchestra fail to respond to indications of conductor and composer. It is a music full of solo passages. Various wood-winds, various strings at one time or another contribute them. In them all one heard the expressive playing of virtuosi in an expressive music. It matters not a whit whether this is first-rate, second-rate or third-rate Strauss: it makes its desired effect, and when it has performance such as that of last evening it gives much pleasure.

Finally, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been noted for its outstanding abilities in the playing of the many and varied types of popular music which it has become the loose and erroneous to group together as "jazz,"—when it is given the opportunity. Through the "Carioca,"—the "Jazz Nocturne" which is really an expansion of "My Silent Love," and through the Gypsy Tango it had full opportunity. And it acquitted itself up to the highest expectations. Not in the movie itself, with the accompaniment of the actual dancing, was the "Carioca" half as effective. It was something more than a mere desire for this type of popular music which caused the audience to call for it a second time. It was the sheer compulsion of the performance that created the demand. Through the succeeding weeks the Boston public will have many another opportunity at hearing these orancestral artists in their "version" (as the announcers say) of jazz. A. H. M.

At the Pops Tonight

Spanish Night

March, "Los Banderillos".....Volpatti
"Carmen," Suite ....Bizet
"La Goyescas," Intermezzo....Granados
Capriccio Espagnol....Rimsky-Korsakov
"Espana," Rhapsody.. ....Chabrier
Miss Miriam Winslow:
Andalouse from "The Cid"..Massenet
Orgia from Danza Fantastica..Turina
Bolero ....Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer") ....de Falla
(Hans Wiener and Dance Group)

(Conductor: A. Fiedler)

~~164~~

POPS OPEN WITH ICE CREAM SODAS

Post may 3

But 20 Bottles of Wine Consumed at First Intermission With 42 of Best Brands on the List

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

The quieter folks filled up the balcony seats to capacity and listened serenely. The younger edition of the pre-prohibition days took possession of the floor table seats at the opening of the Pops season last night at Symphony Hall. They looked smart, pert and interested. They passed complimentary comments on Mr. Fiedler's well chosen programme of romantic lighter music, including "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils" of Richard Strauss. They perused the wine list, but when the first intermission came to an end they had consumed only 20 bottles of that long-awaited continental wine.

Continued on Page 6—Fourth Col.

Continued From First Page

The hard liquors were omitted, but there was that tantalizing Liebfraumilch, just the bottle to accompany Komzak's waltz, "The Girls of Baden." But, it seemed that in the 16 years of the pre-repeal era, the Pops audience got used to chocolate ice cream along with their lyrical music, and even the seductive appeal of the orchestra could not get them into that sweet-carefree mood that must sip wines of the River Rhine. Chocolate ice cream was the best seller, alas, and the more daring souls chose to quaff the brimming glass of foamy beer.

It was a night of superlatively romantic music, chocolate ice cream, beer and an assortment of some very pretty ladies. There was no clatter, and there was plenty of the old-fashioned lemonade in demand. Girls served the drinks.

42 Wines on the List

The atmosphere was much as it had been in other years. It seemed as if the crowd that came was waiting to see what the other chap was going to do, but the other chap waited too. There were 42 varieties of wines on the list and 16 were domestic. There was no champagne and the highest price was $3.25 for a bottle of sherry. There was a brave attempt made to serve the same varieties served at the continental beergartens, featuring music.

Sauterne was the best seller, but when this new generation gets over its opening night stage fright, those who know believe that they let the music warm them up sufficiently to talk in terms of "Hermatige la Tour Blanche," just a red burgundy, vintage 1928, which may be a very good vintage year, but anyway very soothing for a Pops night, or perhaps a bottle of Sweet Marsale when Mr. Fiedler chooses some Italian gondola tunes to intersperse the mood of relaxation.

Mr. Fiedler's Opinion

Or is it, perhaps, that during the lonely years between 1918 to 1933 folk just got used to coming to the Pops to listen to the music. Mr. Fiedler thinks so. We talked with him during the intermission, and he thinks it is the music that gets them, not the drinks. Mr. Fiedler was drinking good, old-fashioned American icewater, and he thinks that habits have changed somewhat. They came to the Pops when there was only lemonade and ice water for 16 years.

However, despite this nonchalant observation of the gentleman who leads the musicians, makes the programmes and is known as the Pops maestro, there is something to be said for the appeal of the music itself. The biggest crowds were in the balconies. There was not an empty seat. On the floor there were a few seats to be had. Here and there on the floor was an old timer or two, but the majority were a younger crowd. They listened for the most part, couples holding hands, and some were married, too, which speaks well for the music.

Mostly Informal

There were some big floppy hats that one would expect to see at the Pops, some print dresses, some attempts to look quite formal. But the majority accepted the Pops in the same informal spirit that the musical programme suggests — not too classical and not too light.

During the intermissions half the audience remained in its seats and half took a little promenade. It was a nice, leisurely, good-natured audience, that looked as if it accepted the Pops as a custom and will come again.

HOLD WIFE AS STABBER

Despite stories told by both her husband and herself that a stab wound in his side from which he is in serious condition at City Hospital was accidental, Mrs. Ruth Ingalls, of 121 Park drive, Back Bay, was held in $500 bail after police obtained a warrant charging her with assault with the knife on her husband, David Ingalls, 40.

BASEBALL RESULTS

AMERICAN LEAGUE

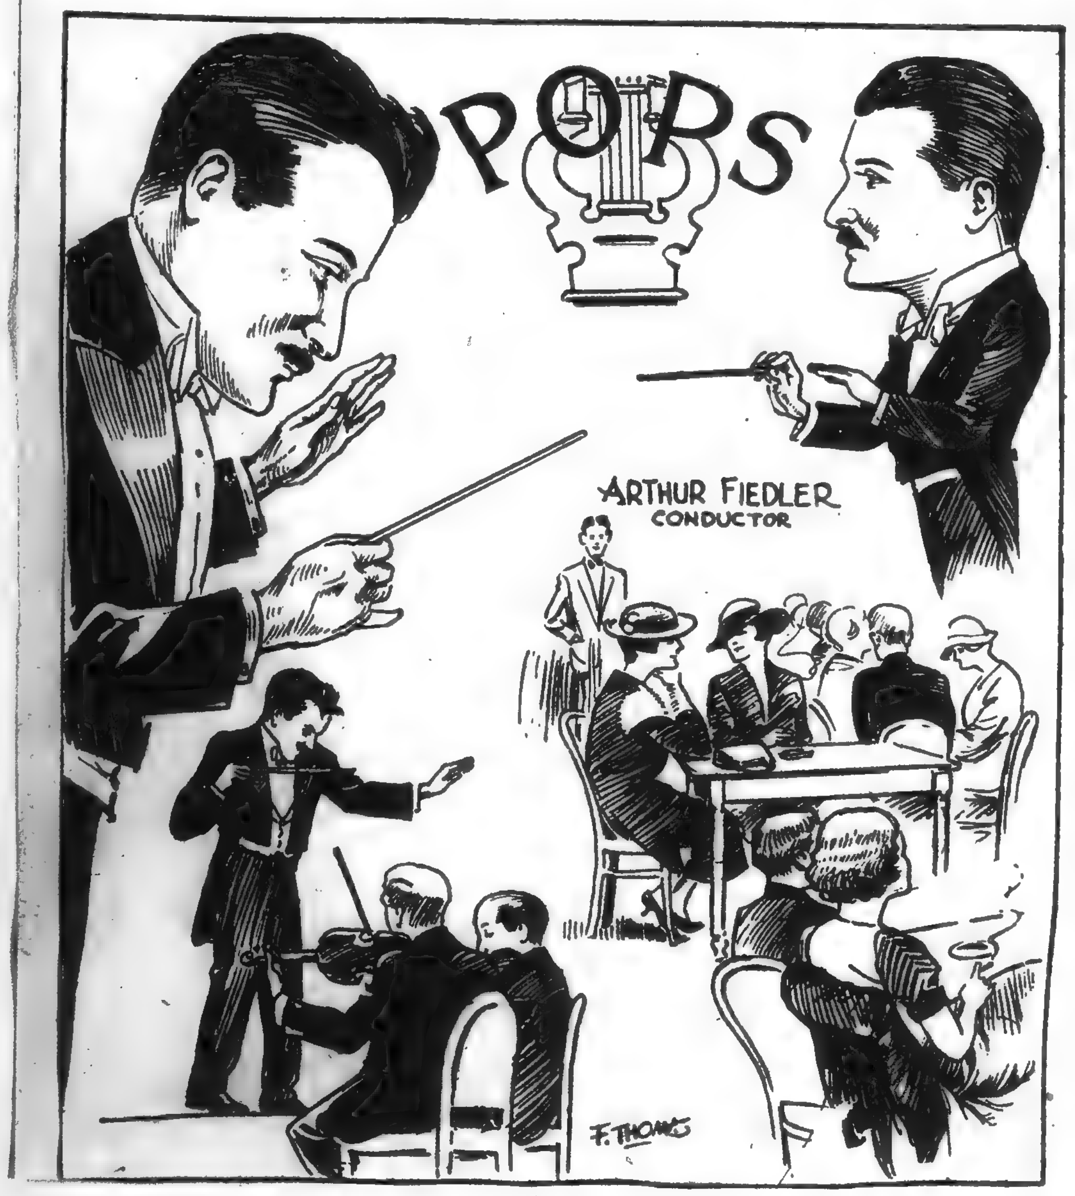
Philadelphia 12, Boston 11.
St. Louis 5, Detroit 2.
Washington 6, New York [illegible]
Only games scheduled.

NATIONAL LEAGUE

New York 6, Brooklyn 5.
Pittsburg 4, Chicago 2.
St. Louis 4, Cincinnati 1.
Only games scheduled.

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1

Pops Season Opened With Little Wine Sold



Fiedler's Fifth Year

Conductor Leads Band With Authority and Elasticity He Has Heretofore Repressed—Exacting List Superbly Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Time flies. It seems not long ago that Arthur Fiedler was being suggested as the logical one to succeed Alfredo Casella as conductor of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. And there he was last evening entering upon his fifth season in that capacity, while the concerts themselves, and most auspiciously, began their 49th.

Four years of conducting the Pops, with concerts on the Esplanade along the way, have done much to enlarge and ripen Mr. Fiedler's abilities. Last evening he conducted not only with authority but with an elasticity and with a play of individualizing temperament that he had scarcely shown before. When his orchestra turned its attention to such items from the symphonic repertory as the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss' "Salome" or Respighi's "Pines of Rome" of the phonograph-nightingale and Caesar's (or Musolini's) advancing legions, these pieces were played in a manner befitting their place and position.

As a descendant of Viennese forebears it might be expected that Mr. Fieldler would be the very man to play a waltz of Johann Strauss or Komzak, yet in times past he has led such pieces a trifle stiffly. Last evening the former's "Wine, Women and Song" and the latter's "Girls of Baden" emerged in their true estate. There was the proper rubato, the right accentuation, the genuine Viennese swing.

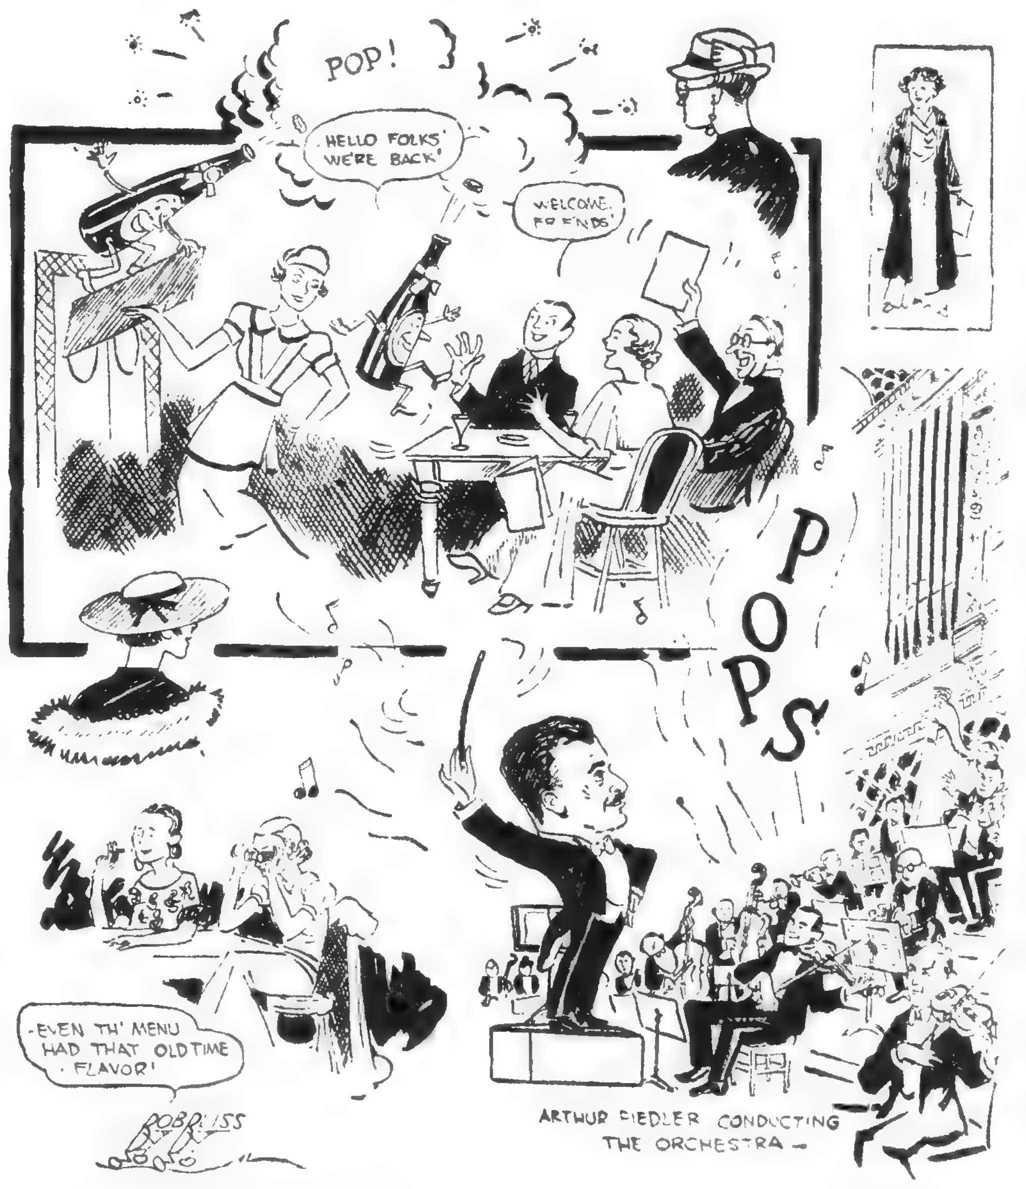
Since it is plain that the public has come to look upon the Pop Concerts primarily as musical entertainment and not—even in these days of repeal—as a place where beer and wine are to be enjoyed to the accompaniment of incidental music, it is altogether suitable and satisfactory that Mr. Fiedler should make of them musical entertainment that would bring to anyone both enjoyment and profit. His programme of last evening might at one time have seemed a little exacting for the Pops, though it was lightened by the usual encore tidbits. But the programme was no whit too exacting for last evening's audience. The pieces by Richard Strauss and Respighi were applauded more vigorously than any others. And every number was heard with absorbed attention. While the music was being played the claims of thirst and of conversation went largely unheeded.

Besides the items mentioned, last evening's programme included a March from Gounod's almost forgotten opera, "The Queen of Sheba"; the Overture to Thomas' "Mignon," which still holds place upon the stage; a Serenade for strings by Bolzoni; a descriptive piece, "The Saporogian Cossacks," by Gliere; an Irish reel for strings by Pochron; a Jass Nocturne by Suesse, and finally the March from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Once again Symphony Hall had shed its winter raiment of red and had donned its summer garb of green and gold. Except that the alcoholic content of the beer and wine had advanced from last season's 3.2 to whatever is proper to them, there was no outward change in last evening's concert. Save for a few seats in the first balcony, the hall was filled, and by an audience whose general mood has already been described. It may be suggested that the attitude of a present Pop audience compared with that of 15 or 20 years ago is one of the surest signs that the American public has become musically minded.

HE BOSTON GLOBE—THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1934

WINE COMPLETES TRANSFORMATION OF FIRST "POP" CONCERT OF SEASON



ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING THE ORCHESTRA—

In some respects, the beginning in Symphony Hall last evening of another season of "Pop" concerts—the 49th Boston has enjoyed—was much the same as in other years. The audience was large and plainly out for a good time; conversation at the tables on the floor of the hall seemed quite as ubiquitous and absorbing as the music that issued from the stage; an aura of tobacco smoke rose serenely from unnumbered cigars, pipes and cigarettes and hovered about the distant chandeliers; the decorations of stage and floor were substantially the same as last year.

But there was something different. That something was to be found in the tall and squat, dark-colored glass bottles that soon appeared in company of glistening stem ware; it appeared in the list of refreshments under many somewhat nostalgic "furrin'" names. That something was wine, which has at last made its appearance at the "Pops" under dispensation of the New Deal, and which is almost certain to restore a measure of the individual flavor which clung to these concerts in the days that were "old," but not essentially better than these.

Last year 3.2 beer made its somewhat impish debut, and now the aromatic, deeply-colored liquid fruit of the vine has completed the transformation. The "Pops" punch which flourished particularly during the arid days now happily past was excellent, still is excellent, but it never could make up for wine. As any poet would instantly affirm.

This season is the fifth of Arthur Fieldler's tenure as conductor. His personal popularity has not diminished; that was plain from the frequent handclapping throughout the evening. His program naturally contained a preponderance of pieces tried, true, and "adored"—as one gushing young woman put it—at the "Pops," together with a sprinkling of up-to-date popular numbers, and two notable scores from the symphonic repertory: "The Dance of the Seven Veils" from the opera "Salome" of Richard Strauss, and Ottorino Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome." Then there was Gliere's robust tonal depiction of the Saporigian Cossacks, in connection with which the program book held an excellent "note," contributed presumably by J. N. Burk, whose writings in the program books upon the new music at the Symphony concerts during the season just past, have been admirable.

The audience displayed its proverbial divided opinion upon the rectitude—and comfort—of evening dress. Yet, as one observing matron pointed out, taking the audience by couples, there seemed to be more men in dinner jackets than women in evening gowns. Call for a psychologist to tell us why!

A further touch of the "old days" was to be found in the appearance of bus boys to assist the waitresses who brought refreshments. But their crisp white coats still were a considerable distance from the black suiting-and-apron-tied-around-the-middle of waiters in the rapidly dimming past.

Through the months of May and June, these "Pop" concerts will continue, with smoking and serving of refreshments at the tables, and in the foyer of the first balcony. They still remain a typical Boston institution—one hopes they always will.

Tonight will be "Spanish Night," and a benefit for the Christopher Shop, for which Mr Fiedler has announced the following program:

March, "Los Banderillos," Volpatti; Carmen, suite, Bizet; La Goyescas, intermezzo, Granados; Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakov; Espana, rhapsody, Chabrier; Miriam Winslow (dances with orchestra), Bolero, Ravel; El Amor Brujo ("Love the Sorceror"), ballet, de Falla; Hans Wiener and his dance group.

C. W. D.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1934

Opening of Pops Season Is Notable

Spanish Night

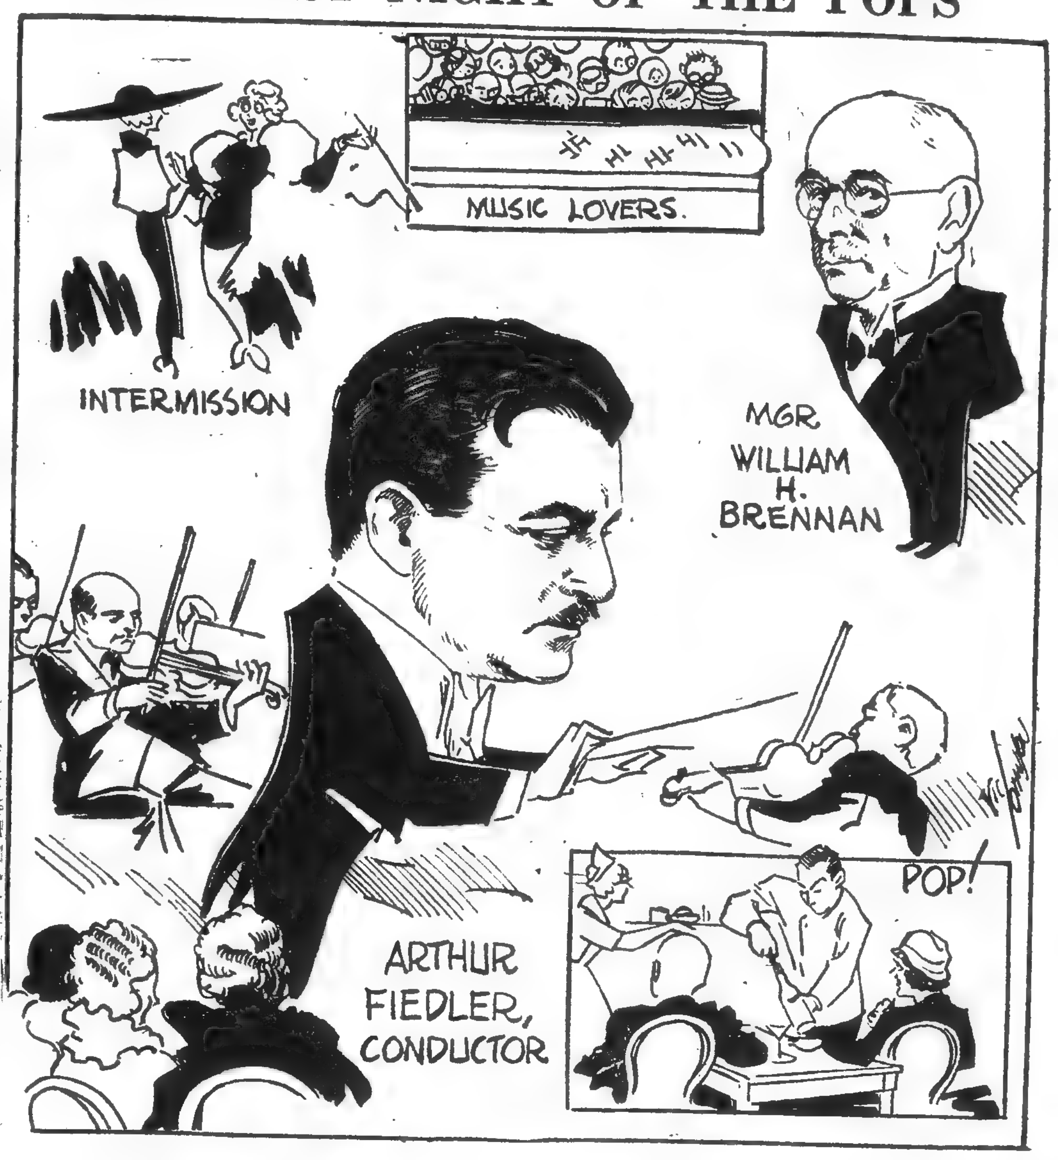
If it was the senoritas who gave charm to last night's Spanish Pops, in the red and yellow bedecked Symphony Hall, it was the duennas who gave it authority. Their heads high, their motions stately, they brought out the dignity rather than the coquetry of Spanish custume. For the most part, the men contented themselves with the usual evening clothes. Here and there was a braver man; bravest of all those in complete panoply who ventured on the stage for the grand march of compeitors for the costume prize. Yet few of these men looked happy; the others walked with a sheepish swagger, conspicuously absent in the careless grace of Frederic Tudor, who escorted his fiancee, Miss Polly Cushman.

But most of the women looked very pleased with themselves and life and justly, for the dresses became them, even if many of them suggested Boheme rather than Castille. The honors of the evening, that went officially to the authentic Spanish lady who won the costume prize, should also have been shared with Mrs. Neill Phillips, whose rather sombre beauty was never more striking than it was last night, set off with a black mantilla and a red rose, the whole given a final fillip by just perceived red silk stockings.

In the entrance hall,, Miss Faith Lamont's purple hat was very active, while Miss Cynthia Waters, in black and white, suitable for gardenia peddling, did a rousing trade.

Mrs. Wilbur Higgins's red and white was enormously becoming, and even more becoming was her daughter, Miss Rosamond Higgins, a beguiling page. Other observations: Mr. and Mrs. Shaw Sprague, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln Boyden, she dark and superb. . . Miss Gwendolen Livermore. . . . Mr. and Mrs. John Codman, with Alexander Bright and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Putnam Smith. . . . Miss Felice Leeds, in an exquisite mantilla of dull silver lace, talking with Dwight P. Robinson, Jr. . . . Frederick Winsor, with a tremendous cigarette holder. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Georges Peter, he the son of the Swiss minister. . . . William Chamberlain, being amorous with the magnificent fur scarf, which was the lady's first prize. . . . Carl Collins, Burnham Porter, Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr., David Crockett, Dr. John Hawes. . . . A Pops waitress, a red flower in her hair, whose still, pale beauty when her face was in repose made nearly everyone else look overdressed. . . . The red and yellow traffic lights suddenly going on as the crowd began to stream out of the hall, the police department's tribute to Spain, and, incredible, but true, to greet the outcoming tortoise shell combs, a stray tortoise shell cat on the steps.

AT FIRST NIGHT OF THE POPS



MUSIC

First Pop Concert After Repeal Becomes Historical Occasion

Last evening at Symphony hall, Arthur Fiedler conducted 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following program for the opening night of the Pops:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
The Medieval Castle, Serenade for Strings	Bolzoni
Salome, Dance of the Seven Veils	R. Strauss
The Saporogian Cossacks	Gliere
Irish Reel, For Strings	Pochon
The Pines of Rome, Symphonic Poem	Respighi
Girls of Baden, Waltz	Komzak
Jazz Nocturne	Suesse
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg	Wagner

Last evening Symphony hall was the scene of a distinctly historical scene: the first Pop Concert following repeal. If any one expected a wildly hilarious gathering singing "Sweet Adeline" and clinking beer steins, he would have been disappointed. The gathering was very large but very sedate, only bursting out in excited pleasure following the playing of Vincent Youmans' "Carioca"—an encore, itself, which had to be repeated. Suiting the program to the festive nature of the occasion, Arthur Fiedler was generous in his waltzes and dance numbers, providing here and there a little serious but not too heavy music, such as Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and the classic riots of Gliere's "Saporogian Cossacks." Beer seemed to be the most popular item of refreshment, being consumed by the young and frivolous, the middle-aged and sedate, the old and experienced alike, though the sight of a real wine list—absent these 15 years and more—inspired many to wilder flights of imagination.

Symphony hall, putting on its frivolous spring attire—green walls, green lattice work behind the orchestra, with draperies to soften the severity of the stage and a crystal chandelier to add a lighter touch—was filled almost to its capacity by an audience quite different in mood from the hysterical gathering that bade Koussevitsky an affectionate farewell last Saturday evening. No formality, though a considerable portion of those present were in evening dress, the usual solemn silence exchanged for the incessant murmur of conversation, the clinking of glasses and, most cheerful of all, the popping of corks, all these were pleasant manifestations of spring and a determination to make the best of a thoroughly pleasant evening. The people who go to the Pops are as entertaining as the Pops themselves, but they come to enjoy the music as well as the drinks, and Mr. Fiedler was generous in his response.

Opening with the resounding march from "The Queen of Sheba" by Gounod, the orchestra continued with the melodious sentiments of Thomas' overture to "Mignon," responding to demands for an encore with MacDowell's "To a Waterlily." Of course, no Pops program would be complete without some Strauss and following the turbulent "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome" by Richard came Johann's even more welcome "Wine, Women and Song." Some gay Irish reels came next, winning as encore the inevitable "Flight of the Bumble Bee." What would orchestra leaders do without it?

The second section of the program, distinguished by a fine performance of the Respighi composition, was also the scene of a mild riot when the motion picture influence, exemplified by the "Carioca" from "Flying Down to Rio," fairly stopped the show. It seemed a pity that the floor was so filled with tables: plenty of those present indicated a desire to get up and dance, not only to the Youman's music but to the Strauss and Komzak waltzes and Gade's popular "Jealousy" tango. The playing of Dana Suesse's "Jazz Nocturne" gave the audience the unusual spectacle of saxaphones on the stage and won the composer and orchestra much applause. For a sonorous conclusion, though somewhat inappropriately titled, Mr. Fiedler offered "The Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from "Tannhauser."

There may not have been song, but there was wine, there were women and the "Pops" were welcomed back with unmistakable pleasure.—E. L. H.

SPANISH NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight will be "Spanish Night" at the Pops in Symphony hall, the concert being given for the benefit of the Christopher Shop. Dancers on the stage, and costumes in the auditorium will enliven the occasion. The program follows:

March, "Los Banderillos"	Volpatti
"Carmen," Suite	Bizet
"La Goyescas," Intermezzo	Grandados
Capriccio Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakov
"Espana," Rhapsody	Chabrier
Miss Miriam Winslow:
Andalouse from "The Cid"	Massenet
Orgia from Danza Fantastica	Turina
Bolero	Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorceror")	de Falla
Hans Wiener and Dance Group

"BROKEN SHOES"

Trans May 5

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—An orchestra of Boston Symphony players, with Arthur Fiedler, conductor, in a series of concerts each evening at Symphony Hall. Refreshments are served as usual, with light wines now added to the list of beverages. Programs for the week run mainly to familiar music. On Monday there will be a Schumann concerto with Mr. Sanromá for pianist; and two selections from popular composers, one from Kern's "Roberta" and the other "Wintergreen for President." The concert will be for the benefit of the Boston Dispensary, Floating Hospital and Tufts Medical School. Tuesday will have an all-Russian program, with the wedding march from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'Or," Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onégin" and Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry" among the items. On Wednesday, two pieces played during the latter part of the symphony season will be done: "The Rio Grande" with Mr. Sanromá for pianist and the Cecilia chorus, and the Polovetzkian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Thursday will be for the benefit of the Boston Lying-In Hospital with a program called "Spring in Vienna" and music drawn in part from the Viennese composers, though it will also include Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Spring." On Friday the Orphean Glee Club will take part with a group of songs alone, and with the orchestra in Elgar's "The Snow" and Foudrain's "Carnaval." Saturday evening the scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony will be the principal item.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAY 6 - 1934

Few realize that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, renowned leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also a business men. He is the proprietor of a Russian music publishing house in Berlin (Russische Musikverlag) which he founded in 1909.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 5 - 1934

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS FINE YEAR

Orchestra to Appear Twice at Bushnell Coming Season.

A total of 112 concerts is the record of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season just ending, according to the report of the president, Bentley W. Warren. of these concerts, sixty-six were given in Boston and forty-six elsewhere.

The mangement of the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall has arranged to present the Boston Symphony orchestra here twice in the Bushnell concert series next season.

At a time when orchestras in other cities are suffering acutely from the depression, the Boston group appears to enjoy comparatively good financial health. Mr. Warren announces the "unprecedented subscription of $102,741.07 to this year's deficit." An estimated deficit of about $18,000 remains, however, but it is the hope of the trustees that this will be cleared before the close of the orchestra's fiscal year on July 31.

"The loyalty and enthusiasm of all the audiences," Mr. Warren writes, "have been unusual. Attendance has also been encouraging. . . . For the four Boston series alone, more than 1,200 new subscribers were found to take up places, reluctantly and in many cases temporarily released by subscribers last spring."

Eighty-four works by forty-seven composers were performed by the orchestra this season. Bethoven led the list with nine compositions, three of which were symphonies. He was followed by Tchaikowsky, who was represented six times, four of these works being symphonies. Mozart and Richard Strauss were each played five times. Brahms is represented by all four symphonies, and Ravel by four works. Sibelius appeared on the Boston programs three times.

Composers represented at the concerts for the first time included Roy Harris, Randall Thompson and Emerson Whithorne. The orchestra performed four orchestral works which had never previously been given a public hearing. These are Berezowsky's "Symphony No. 2;" "Symphony: 1933," by Harris; "Three Pieces for Orchestra," by Tcherepnin and Whithorne's "Moon Trails."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

MAY 6 - 1934

Science a

By LEONARD LIEBLING

For me, the orchestral top of the New York season was achieved by Arturo Toscanini and the Philadelphia Orchestra, even though it did not consistently play at its best. Second came Leopold Stokowski and the Phiharmonic Orchestra, always performing at its best. Bruno Walter shone in leadership of Mahler's first symphony, and Serge Koussevitzky did a noble job in the fine American symphony by Roy Harris.

"WINE, WOMEN AND SONG"

A church paper quotes Prof. Rexford Tugwell as saying that "one of the oldest and quietest roads to contentment lies through the conventional trinity of wine, women and song," and the Rev. Fred C. Tyler of Portland, Or., has condemned this assertion as being distinctly "un-American." Most Bostonians, however, will be inclined to absolve the distinguished brain-truster of subversive heterodoxy at least on that score.

"Wine, Women and Song" are back at Symphony hall, both in fact and in melody, and the city does not appear to be in peril. Last year, to be sure, 3.2 beer added a faint Germanic gaiety to the Pops. Now, for the first time in fifteen years, the "Overture 1812" and "Peer Gynt" are being punctuated by authentic pops of Rhine wine bottles and the tinkling of iced punches. The women—or should we say, ladies?—have remained faithful during the drought and are more lovely and charming than ever. The song—well, if the Pops still do not favor community singing in the Muenchener Hofbrau spirit, there is no objection if one hums quietly to one's self during the more pretentious numbers or bursts into a brief hey-hey during the orchestra's daring excursions into jazz.

As an appropriate gesture on the opening night, Mr. Fiedler led the band in Johann Strauss's grand old waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Perhaps, as a friendly bow in the direction of the North station, he will give us Deems Taylor's hippodromic suite, "Circus Day," before the season is over. It is a lively reminder of another famous institution, to which the sensitive Oregonians could hardly object.

[166]

A Bit of Old Spain Brought to Boston

Amer Mar 8

HARRY P. HEALEY, JR. MRS. HAROLD WALKER

Spanish shawls, high combs and black mantillas turned Symphony Hall into a blaze of color last night at the Pop concert of Spanish music under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Society turned out en masse and the balconies were filled to overflowing with those who came to hear the music and see the color. Harry P. Healey, Jr., and Mrs. Harold Walker were photographed at their table. (Pictures by Boston Evening American Staff Photographer.)

ELSIE PERKINS MRS. PHILLIP WRENN, JR.

Miss Elsie Perkins and Mrs. Phillip Wrenn, Jr., were caught by the cameraman talking over the events of the evening. (Pictures by Boston Evening American Staff Photographer.)

Serge Koussevitzky Attends Pops; Sanroma as Soloist

Amer Mar 8

By MOSES SMITH

The program of last night's so-called "popular" Pop concert did not consist entirely of light music. Three consecutive numbers out of the nine might have graced a mid-season program of the most high-brow symphonic organization. They were the Wagner "Tannhaeuser" overture, Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and the Schumann piano concerto.

Only one of these three received as hearty applause as that accorded the rest of the program—the concerto, in the performance of which Jesus Maria Sanroma developed such speed that the most sluggish person must have been stirred. The speed of the last movement, indeed, was too much for the sensitive listener, and too much, I am afraid, for Mr. Sanroma. Brilliant pianist though he is, he could not, at such a pace, expose the intricate passage-work with his accustomed clarity.

There were other debatable matters in Sanroma's presentation, such as the undue contrast in tempi during the first movement. His performance, however, exceeded expectations, since his forte is not Romantic music like Schumann's but the brilliant, rhythmic, percussive music of our day. The orchestral accompaniment, under Arthur Fiedler, kept pace at every turn with Sanroma. The ensemble between soloist and orchestra was rare in this respect, it would have been better on the whole if the wind instruments had been more accurately in tune with the piano.

The rest of the program, well played under Fiedler's direction, gave great pleasure to a large audience attracted partially by the fact that the concert was for the benefit of the New England Medical Center. In the audience, incidentally, was Serge Koussevitzky, attending Pops for the first time since he came to Boston ten years ago, and enjoying the proceedings hugely.

SYMPHONY HALL FACES TAX PROBE

Is Exempted Because of a Change of Ownership

Claiming that the ownership of Symphony Hall has been transferred in such a manner as to exempt the owners from paying to the city any taxes this year on the property which has been formerly assessed at a value of $800,000, City Councillor Joseph McGrath yesterday called upon the city assessors to provide the Council with the complete information. The hall has been turned over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a gift, Bentley W. Warren said last night.

Continued on Page 11—Sixth Col.

SYMPHONY HALL FACES TAX PROBE

Continued From First Page

The Dorchester Councillor asserted that the Symphony Hall building had always been taxed, but that he learned that the title to the real estate had been transferred this year previous to April 1, tax day.

Officials of the assessing department stated last night that the matter had not been brought formally to their attention, but that they had been informed that the ownership of the property was being changed and the policy of operation altered so that it would not be taxable under the law.

Bentley W. Warren, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night admitted that Symphony Hall had been turned over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a gift, after all the stock held by outsiders had been purchased.

Exemption as Mattor of Course

"The stock was acquired through purchase made possible by gifts," Mr. Warren said. "Some of it was given to us by the holders and the rest purchased. The hall was then transferred to the orchestra, which has taken over the property.

"The Symphony Orchestra is exempt from taxation on real estate which it uses for the purposes of the orchestra, just as a church property is not taxed. There were about 3000 or 4000 shares and they were acquired.

"I don't see what all the excitement is about. If the people of Boston do not want the Symphony Orchestra, they need only say so."

Query About Repertory Theatre

The Council, at the request of Councillor McGrath, also asked the assessors on what basis the Repertory Theatre could be exempted from the 1934 real estate taxes in this city. The assessors pointed out that the Repertory Theatre was exempt from taxation from 1925 to 1931, but that it was taxed during the past two years and will be taxed this year by the city.

Councillor Clement A. Norton of Hyde Park secured the passage of an order calling upon Mayor Mansfield to appoint a survey committee to determine why real estate is taxed higher in Boston than in Cleveland and Detroit.

Evening at Pops

Observations made at Symphony Hall last night during the "Popular Pop Concert," given for the benefit of the New England Medical Center:

The audience changing its moods with the music—subdued after the Tannhauser overture; gently melancholic during the Strauss Tales of the Vienna Woods; hilarious with the first bars of Carioca. . . . The smoke, the claret punches, the laughter. . . . Miss Catherine Richardson's vivid young profile seen for a swift moment against a cloud of smoke. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Heard at a table down front with Mr. and Mrs. William Gray (Mrs. Gray had pinned some small scarlet flowers in her hair to set off her black gown; very successful. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Manfred Bowditch with Major and Mrs. A. Hamilton Gibbs (Mrs. Gibbs is the Jeannette Phillips Gibbs whose novel, Copy for Mother, has just been published) . . . Mrs. Robert Soutter, Miss Ruth Richardson and Mrs. J. Lewis Stackpole at a table together. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner H. Fiske, George Greener, Mrs. Christian Herter and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ely Danielson nearby. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Harris and Mr. and Mrs. Edward Sturgis, Jr., filing down the aisle during an intermission. . . . Miss Gwendolen Livermore, Miss Astrid Rice, Miss Nancy Cabot forgetting their flower selling for a moment to listen pensively to Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, the theme song of the 1933-34 debutantes by right of repetition. . . . Fair Harvard smoking its pipe at every third or fourth table. . . . Mrs. Francis Harding with her daughter, Miss Dorothy Harding, and Dr. and Mrs. Francis Rackemann. . . . Mr. and Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Dewey across the aisle (Mr. Dewey's sunburn, achieved on a recent trip out West, had its only rival in Miss Polly Ehrlich's, achieved in Bermuda). . . . Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Hobbs, Mr. and Mrs. Glover Crocker, Dr. and Mrs. John Cousens, Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis, all in one section of the room. . . . Miss Rosamond Lockwood, looking very lovely as she pinned a flower to her dark coat. . . . Mrs. Richard Lawrence in a soft black chiffon dinner gown and gardenias, on an urgent quest to fid somebody to draw the lucky number. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Arthur G. Rotch, who had given a dinner at the Jar-Ptiza especially to hear Vincent Spozino sing, sitting near the front with their daughter, Miss Lydia Rotch, and George Weld. . . . Henry Sawyer, Jr., sliding into a seat as the Schumann concerto began. . . . Mr. and Mrs. William Burnham listening intently to the Ravel waltz. . . . Mr. Fiedler's coat tails flying madly during the Tannhauser climax. . . . The nonchalant plaster statues ranged around the heights of Symphony Hall, the only unmoved listeners to the rhythms of Carioca and Wintergreen for President.

[167]

Herald May 8 - 34

THE ROVING REPORTER

At Pops with Little Old Lady—Her Cabriolet of Other Days Stalled Among Limousines—And They Bring Her Pop Punch, Non-Alcoholic—An Error Promptly Put Right

The little old lady thrust her black beehive bonnet out the window and surveyed the traffic situation. Just ahead on Symphony Hall a large sign reading POPS alternately flashed on and off, but the little old lady's ancient cabriolet was bogged down in a metal sea of limousines and taxicabs.

"Let's walk, said she. "Merwin isn't getting anywhere."

Merwin shook his head and heaved a sigh.

"It wasn't like this back in 1908, Madam," he said sadly.

"Of course it wasn't," snapped the little old lady, clambering out of the car. "Come along, Rover. I want to see if there any kick to the claret."

Holding her umbrella before her like a sword, the little old lady cleaved a way into the lobby of Symphony Hall. One clawlike hand dived into the depths of an ancient evening bag and brought forth a pair of tickets which she handed to the Rover. By the time the ticket taker had ripped them in half, the little old lady was deep in debutantes selling programs and flowers.

"No, no," the Rover heard her say petulantly. "What do I want a program for?"

"There's a wine list in it," suggested one winsome miss, giving the Rover a dimpled smile that immediately enrolled him in her cause.

"In that case," said the little old lady, "I'll take two. Someone always spills claret on one of them. I remember back in 1906, it was the Spanish consul. Such a handsome man, too." She sighed.

"Buy a gardenia?" inquired another debutante.

The Rover looked at his duenna for instructions.

"Be adamant. Make her work for it," she whispered.

The Rover looked grimmish.

"Well. I don't know," he said.

The young gardenia seller dropped her eyes, appeared on the point of tears. "I've only got one left. Really, it's a very lovely one."

"She's got lots more in the icebox, the hussy," whispered the little old lady. "Hold out another minute."

The Rover held out.

"Please," said the girl, giving the reporter a wistful smile.

The little old lady feigned impatience.

"Come, come, young man," she cried. "Stop mooning at that girl. Either buy that flower or don't buy it, but let's get on. I'm getting thirsty."

The Rover bought the gardenia.

"Does my heart good to see those debbies descend to sordid trade," chuckled the little old lady as they moved on. "Not that a season isn't exhausting enough, my, no. I should never have survived mine if the war hadn't intervened and put an end to the nonsense."

"Spanish-American?" suggested the Rover.

"Don't try to be gallant," snapped the little old lady. "You Americans can't get away with it. Now the Spanish..."

She gazed around Symphony hall, its balconies hung in the royal red of Spain and draped with gorgeous golden shawls. Here and there towering mantillas moved sedately in the aisles, nodded over long stemmed glasses for it was Spanish night and many of the people were in costume. Upon the platform, scarce seen in the haze of smoke or heard above the buzz of conversation, Arthur Fiedler and his 85 musicians were busy with a Rimsky-Korsakov fandango.

The little old lady surveyed all this with satisfaction, opened her program by instinct to the wine list, and beckoned a waitress.

"One claret punch for me," she said. "A beer for the boy."

A young man with a megaphone took the place of the orchestra which had finally given up and gone off stage. He sent out a call for those in costume to appear and make themselves seen.

One by one they obeyed the injunction and mounted the steps, to scurry across the stage before judges and audience. Some ran this gauntlet very gracefully. Others swung their hips and minced in Minksy fashion. Others walked as though their feet hurt them.

"Quite possibly they do," said the little old lady. "Now where's my claret? I want my claret!"

She reared up angrily, even as the waitress placed a glass of reddish liquid in front of her. With the light of anticipation in her eyes, the little old lady sipped this concoction. Her expression changed as she swallowed a bit of it. She frowned, summoned the waitress with an imperious bony forefinger.

"What do you call this?" she demanded.

"Pop punch," said the girl. "It's non alcoholic."

"And what made you think I wanted something non alcoholic?" said the little old lady, her eyes glittering dangerously. "Don't answer me. Take this stuff away. I want claret punch. Accent on the punch."

The glass was borne away. The orchestra returned. It embarked upon Ravel's Bolero. First a thin fluting in the distance. Then a mounting on the ever louder beating pulse of the drums. At the crescendo of the piece the waitress placed a glass in front of the little old lady.

Eagerly she snapped at the straw, inhaled an inch of the liquid. "Thank heavens," shouted the little old lady, above the applause, "there's a pop to the Pops again."

Hr. May 10

FIEDLER IS HONORED BY CECILIA CHORUS

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops," was presented a hammered silver brush set inscrbed "A. F." in musical notes engraved on a staff last night by A. J. Jackson, president of the Cecilia Chorus, to mark his fifth year as conductor of the chorus. Formed to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the chorus under Fiedler's direction has become one of the outstanding choral groups in the country, according to Serge Koussevitzky. During last night's "Pops" concert the chorus accompanied by the orchestra sang Lambert's "Rio Grande" and Borodin's "Polovetzkian Dances."

Pops Features Variety

Am. May

By MOSES SMITH

Music for many tastes filled an enjoyable program at last night's Pop concert at Symphony Hall. Artistically the most important of Arthur Fiedler's list were the Goldmark "Sakuntala" overture, the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," the Polovetzkian Dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin, and the now popular "Rio Grande" of Constant Lambert.

In the latter two works Mr. Fiedler had the assistance of the Cecilia Society chorus, of which he is the regular conductor. In the exciting music of Borodin the chorus sang with freshness and vigor of tone which matched the tumultuous orchestral sound, so that the performance had the barbaric spirit which it ought to have.

In contrast, the singers graduated their voices with unusually sensitive nuance in "The Rio Grande." The solo singing here of Marie Murray had rare beauty, though it has acquired a slight self-consciousness since her first stunning performance two or three seasons ago. Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma's diabolical virtuosity in the brilliant piano solo of this work is now familiar to Boston concert-hall habitues. As to Mr. Fiedler's conception of the score, what it sacrifices in the way of plasticity of tempo it more than gains in forward movement and jazz-like rhythm.

The applause of the large audience following the playing of "The Rio Grande" was demonstrative. The concert contained other stimulating incidents, not the least of which was the performance of Hamilton Harty's tasteful setting of the lovely "Londonderry Air."

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

MAY 1 0 1934

In Baltimore

— with —

Billy Bachelor

This is one of those days when we find ourselves overcome with an almost irresistible impulse to "go musical."

And with the fate of the Lyric trembling so appealingly in the balance, it seems to be a timely occasion to obey that impulse and spread the news of just a few of the major concerts already announced for next season, and that would be lost, except for our major auditorium.

For the Boston Symphony, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has chosen November 13, January 29 and April 2 for the Baltimore visits of the great ensemble, whose return for a season of concerts last winter was the cause of much rejoicing among the city's devotees of music.

Since the World War we have had to content ourselves with, at the most, one performance each winter by this splendid organization, and it is appalling to think of once more losing what has been regained.

The Boston Symphony gave 112 concerts last season, 66 in their "home town" and 46 elsewhere. Among the box reservations in Baltimore were those of Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Cotten, Mrs. Frank Hambleton, Mrs. Thomas Willing Balch, Mr. and Mrs. Dushane Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Symington, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Randall, with many more, most of whom already have engaged their places for 1934-35.

The National Symphony, under Dr. Hans Kindler, has set a date a month later for its return, the first appearance being planned for December 5, followed by two more concerts on January 15 and March 19.

This youthful organization—by comparison with the Boston's hoary fifty-odd years—has made the most gratifying progress in general esteem during its three or four seasons, and in Washington a sustaining fund is rapidly being raised for its future support.

Many of the same names as for older ensembles are to be found on its list of boxholders, as well as those of Mrs. P. Lea Thom, Mr. and Mrs. Walter W. Abell, Dr. and Mrs. Kemp Malone, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Distler, and many more.

Evening of Russian Music at the Pops

Mr. Fiedler with a Program Drawn from Elder and Younger Composers

Tran. May 9

LAST evening the Pops presented a program of Russian music. Mr. Fiedler carried out his scheme rigorously, encores as well as stated numbers being Russian. The program ranged widely: opera, the symphonic literature, Russian folklore were all represented; the great ones of a generation or two ago as well as the latest symphonic thriller only a few years old, all had place. Once more Symphony Hall was all but sold out. The cause is not to be found in the freedom from prohibition, in spite of the busy large corps of waiters on the floor. For both balconies—to which waiters and waitresses do not have access—were filled, so that the eye could not discover a single empty seat. And few were the empty tables on the floor.

For the first part of his program Mr. Fiedler played the Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Golden Cockerel," a selection from Chaikovsky's opera "Eugene Oniegin," Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry." The extras were a march from one of Chaikovsky's suites, Musorgsky's Russian dance, "Hopak." The selection from the opera which is probably Chaikovsky's most important one, creates a desire to hear more of it. Melodies, as played last evening by 'cello and brass instruments, remind one of the melodies of the best songs rather than of the thick, swollen melodies of the known symphonies. One was interested also in the presence of the usual Chaikovskian devices, the appearance in one portion, of the heroic "motto," the waltz, the rhythmic excitement. The delineative and pictorial qualities of Borodin's music about the Asiatic steppes are well known. But the illusion which they create came with freshness last evening from Arthur Fiedler and his men. This is picture music which marvellously makes its desired effect.

It is the irony of fate that the newest piece on the evening's program should already have become the one that is most in the popular mind. Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry" was written for performance at Symphony concerts. But in many a place it seemed too "strong" for such concerts. In Boston in its first season (if memory does not play tricks) it went directly to the Pops without taking the usual course of such works through the regular winter concerts of the orchestra. And it has remained a Pop repertory piece ever since. It is unnecessary at this late date to comment especially on its unusual features, the incessant pounding on the big gong, the almost frantic use of other percussion instruments, the rising of the horn players at certain points to make their part stand out, the shaking of the big iron sheet in the last portion. All these are sufficient to make a noise by the side of which Honegger's locomotive seems like a tin whistle. And Mr. Fiedler with his men made the noise.

The second part of the program—which in the present routine of Pops programs has become the "heavy" part—brought the last movement of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," the Andante Cantabile out of Chaikovsky's first string quartet, the same composer's "Marche Slave." To which Mr. Fiedler added a Spanish dance by the Russian Glazunov, "Panaderos," and Rimsky's ever-present "Flight of the Bumble Bee." Mr. Fiedler paces some of these "heavier" things a bit rapidly in these concerts. Thereby they become increasingly suited to their new environment. A great masterpiece is all the greater if it possesses those chameleon-like qualities whereby it can make itself adaptable to all sorts of different circumstances.

For conclusion group—the "popular" group—the program contained four movements from the suite which Chaikovsky drew from his ballet, "The Nutcracker"; Agide Jacchia's poetic arrangement of the Volga Boatman's Song; Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Procession of the Sardar." A Russian dance of Chaikovsky was the only extra. Chaikovsky was never in happier vein than when writing these little suites. They are as great masterpieces in miniature as the last three symphonies are in the large. The orchestra played these movements from one of them with fine effect.

A. H. M.

Big Gain in Catch of

Pt May 10

IRED AT CHARGE BY SYMPHONY

$300 Hall Hire to Be Fought, Says Dr. Lyons

Although Symphony Hall has been allowed a tax exemption amounting to about $800,000, the management wants the city to pay $300 for the use of the building to conduct graduation exercises. This was brought out last night by School Committeeman Dr. Joseph V. Lyons, who said the school committee will not pay that amount, in addressing members of the Boston Schoolmen's Economic Association at their annual dinner at the City Club.

HOTEL HUNTINGTON

[168]

Houses Tomorrow

Trav May 10

Noted Composer

Bainbrdge Crist, whose new score, "Spring Night in Vienna" has been dedicated to the Viennese program to be given at the Pops in Symphony hall tonight. Mr. Crist will be present to hear this first performance of his music.

New Crist Piece At Pops Tonight

Bainbridge Crist, the noted American composer, has dedicated a new score, "Spring Night in Vienna," to the Viennese program to be given at the Pops in Symphony hall tonight, for the benefit of the Boston Lying-in Hospital. Mr. Crist will be present at this, the first performance of his music.

Bainbridge Crist, a Bostonian, has long been well known for his numerous works in larger and smaller forms. Among his songs the Chinese Mother Goose Rhymes are perhaps the best known, and of his piano piece, the "Egyptian Impressions" and the "Retrospections," have had a long vogue. Mr. Crist has studied and spent a number of years in Europe, but now is more contented to make his home in his attractive Cape Cod cottage at South Yarmouth.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the following program tonight:

March, There's Only One Vienna	Schrammel
Die Fledermaus, Overture	Strauss
The Old Refrain	Kreisler
Wine, Woman and Song, Waltz	Strauss
Spring Night in Vienna, Waltz	Crist
Unfinished Symphony (first movement)	Schubert
La Valse, Choreographic Poem	Ravel
By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Waltz	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue Piano soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma	Gershwin
Strike Up the Band	Gershwin

BUTLER RE-ENGAGED

Koussevitzky to Point a Contrast

Plans for Six Conductors in New York; Comparisons With Boston

AS a result of its campaign for funds to guarantee the future of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the expression of opinions which accompanied contributions, the directors have become convinced that the largest portion of the public is interested mainly in hearing the classic masterpieces, that a considerable number particularly of the younger generation wish to hear the important works of contemporary composers and that a small but growing group wants to know what America is producing musically. All this is set forth in a recent announcement of plans for next season.

To meet the varied demands of its supporters the directors have decided to divide the season among six conductors in the following ratio: Toscanini, ten weeks; Walter, six weeks; Klemperer, four weeks; Rodzinski, two weeks; Janssen, two weeks; Lange, three weeks, with three weeks' programs "reserved for special features."

In the course of an article in the New York Times, in which he considers the characteristics of the conductors who will take part in the coming programs, Olin Downes takes occasion to draw attention to the policies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in these words:

"The problems of an orchestra in New York, aside from those created by a sophisticated and sometimes capricious public, are endless. That so many conductors in a season as the number here cited is not for the best good of an orchestra is obvious. One leading conductor for a season, with short periods of rest, when a guest conductor or the orchestra's assistant conductor takes the reins, is the solution reached by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra is extremely fortunate to have at its head a man who unites the qualities of a hard and efficient worker; a virtuoso leader and maker of programs as Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky has the qualities of a program maker that apparently requires six Philharmonic-Symphony conductors to equal! He is of all the conductors in the country the most progressive-minded as regards new music. This applies equally to the music of a Stravinsky or Sibelius, an Arthur Foote or an Aaron Copland.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has done more per season for the American composer than any other conductor the country has known. In him the rising generation has had a real opportunity to try its wings and test its accomplishments through performance. And if Mr. Koussevitzky has unearthed no transcendent genius of American compositions, he has certainly presented a very considerable amount of worth-while American music to his audiences. No such modernist and program maker has yet been secured by the Philharmonic-Symphony, but it is also to be remembered that there is probably no one conductor who could face the stress and the strain of an entire Philharmonic-Symphony season."

Herald May 10

AMERICAN ACADEMY ELECTS 70 FELLOWS

Arts and Sciences Group Here Also Names Officers

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences, with headquarters at 28 Newbury street, elected 70 fellows and nine foreign honorary members, including 15 Harvard professors and eight professors of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at its annual meeting last night.

Aside from teachers, the elections of the greatest local interest were those of Alfred E. Smith of New York as a fellow and of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a foreign honorary member.

Officers elected were the following: George Howard Parker, president; James Flack Norris, vice-president for class I; Walter Bradford Cannon, vice-president for class II; Edwin Francis Gay, vice-president for class III; Arthur Stanley Pease, vice-president for class IV; Tenney Lombard Davis, corresponding secretary; Walter Eugene Clark, recording secretary; Ingersoll Bowditch, treasurer; Alfred Church Lane, librarian; Robert Payne Bigelow, editor.

Other elections were as follows:

FELLOWS

Edgar Anderson, Arnold Arboretum; Clarence G. Campbell, New York City; John M. Clark, Columbia Univ.; Charles J. Connick, Boston; Franzo H. Crawford, Harvard Univ.; Otto G. C. Dahl, Mass. Inst. of Tech.; Samuel Foster Damon, Brown Univ.; Winthrop M. Daniels, Yale Univ.; Chester L. Dawes, Harvard Univ.; Jacob P. Den Hartog, Harvard Univ.; John F. Ebersole, Harvard Univ.; Griffith C. Evans, Rice Inst., Texas.

Sterling P. Fergusson, Blue Hill Observ.; Cyrus H. Fiske, Harvard Univ.; Ralph E. Freeman, M. I. T.; John F. Fulton, Yale Univ.; Edgar S. Furniss, Yale Univ.; Robert M. Haig, Columbia Univ.; Austin M. Harmon, Yale Univ.; Hudson Hoagland, Clark Univ.; Jerome C. Hunsaker, M. I. T.; Henry Jackson, Jr., Harvard Univ.; Donald F. Jones, Conn. Agric. Station; Matt B. Jones, Boston.

Albert G. Keller, Yale Univ.; Edwin B. Kemmerer, Princeton Univ.; Henry P. Kendall, Boston; Roland G. Kent, Univ. of Pennsylvania; Frank H. Knight, Univ. of Chicago; Kurt Koffka, Smith College; Clarence C. Little, Bar Harbor, Maine; Robert M. MacIver, Columbia Univ.; Louis W. McKeehan, Yale Univ.; Donald H. Menzel, Harvard Univ.; Richard S. Meriam, Harvard Univ.

Harry A. Millis, Univ. of Chicago; Harry R. Mimno, Harvard Univ.; Leroy M. S. Miner, Harvard Univ.; Arthur E. Monroe, Harvard Univ.; Edward L. Moreland, Boston; Philip M. Morse, M. I. T.; Walter H. Newhouse, M. I. T.; Edwin G. Nourse, Washington, D. C.; William A. Oldfather, Univ. of Illinois.

Leigh Page, Yale Univ.; Robert H. Pfeiffer, Harvard Univ.; William C. Quinby, Harvard Univ.; Alfred N. Richards, Univ. of Pa.; Oscar Riddle, Cold Spring Harbor, N. Y.; David M. Robinson, Johns Hopkins Univ.; Carl-Gustaf A. Rossby, M. I. T.; Arthur H. Ruggles, Providence, R. I.; Erwin H. Schell, M. I. T.; Sumner H. Schlichter, Harvard Univ.; Theodore L. Shear, Princeton Univ.; Edmund W. Sinnott, Barnard College.

Alfred E. Smith, New York City; Gilbert M. Smith, Stanford Univ.; Leighton B. Smith, M. I. T.; Eugene E. Speicher, New York City; Frederick J. Teggart, Univ. of California; Lewis M. Terman, Stanford Univ.; Charles F. Thwing, Cleveland, Ohio; Edward L. Thorndike, Columbia Univ.; John H. Van Vleck, Univ. of Wisconsin; Jacob Viner, Univ. of Chicago; Leo Wolman, Columbia Univ.; David E. Worrall, Tufts College; Lawrence C. Wroth, Providence, R. I.; Carle C. Zimmerman, Harvard Univ.

FOREIGN HONORARY MEMBERS

Gustav Cassel, Stockholm; Ronald Aylmer Fisher, London; Archibald Vivian Hill, London; Arthur Holmes, Durham, England; Paul Janet, Paris; Sergei Koussevitzky, Parts (and Boston); Luigi Lombardi, Rome; Peter B. Struve, Belgrade; Richard Willstutter, Munich.

WALSH TESTIFIES

"Mammoth Spring"

Trans May 11

"Wien und der wein, und nicht allein" . . . "Spring in Vienna." The Pops last night turned out the town for the benefit of the Boston Lying-in Hospital and packed that very sizable music hall called Symphony to the toes of the timeless statues in the niches above the second balcony. Standing in the middle of the hall at 9.30, when everyone had finally arrived, one knew at last what "a sea of feces" meant. Looking down from the balcony, a carpet of heads stretched from wall to wall—fair, brown, black and white—a challenge in pattern and color to Arabia and Turkey. The green tables were packed in as closely as was geographically possible, but it irritated no one. It is impossible to be irritated in an tomosphere of gaiety and gentle pleasure . . . on a warm spring evening with one's every possible friend within hailing distance . . . an imposing roster of refreshments to hand . . . and music to joy the soul.

Bevies of young maidens moved up and down the corridors and aisles with bevies of gardenias and orchids on their trays; or selling chances on the car to be given away: Miss Emily Dick, Miss Catherine Blake, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Eleanor Shaw, Miss Harriette Sturgis, Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Miss Mary Strong, Miss Anne Torbert, Miss Leonora Kimball, Miss Astrid Rice, Miss Eleanora Eustis, Miss Frances Turner, Miss Jane Hawes, Miss Eliza Bowditch fiance Edward Bond Wheelwright, Jr. also present), Moss Agnes Osborne, Miss Molly Wheeler. . . .

Among the many hundreds to be seen: Mr. and Mrs. J. Brooks Feno, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Irving, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Burrage. . . . Miss Anne Peabody promenading with a swain during the intermissions. . . . Miss Alice Clark ditto. . . . Miss Mary Elizabeth ditto with John N. M. Howells. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Richard Thompson at a table where Mrs. Francis came to rest frequently from her flower-vending. . . . Mr. and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk at a table near Miss Lucy Fantoul. . . . Miss Dorothy West, Miss Isabella Stewart Gardner, Miss Anne Sortwell, all in the same party. . . . Miss Gwendolen Livermore with her mother, Mrs. Robert Livermore. . . . Mrs. C. Rogers Burgin swathed in a crimson velvet wrap arrivnig early. . . . Mrs. Horace Binney also swathed in red velvet and also arriving early with Mr. Binney. . . . Walter Merriam Pratt ditto. . . . Miss Serita Bartlett resting rather wearily at an aisle table. . . . Miss Isabel Lawrence nearby. . . . Mrs. Roger Cutler handsome in black lace. . . . Roger Hallowell, Jr., escorting a fair creature. . . . Miss Jane Dinsmore, George Bingham, Miss Grace Madden, all at various tables far to the rear of the hall. . . . Mr. and Mrs. John Maddox, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Cushman. . . . Flower girls and ushers resting in a few stray chairs aganst the wall toward the end of the program, when it became definitely blue to the delight of everyone, with "Rhapsody in Blue" on top of the "Blue Danube." . . . Miss Rosomond Lockwood, Miss Margaret Hinckley, Miss Charlotte Sherburne seen exiting. . . . The orchestra inspired by the thousand worshipers in its audience and playing with such abandon that the diamond ring on the picolo player's hand gleamed and flashed like a beacon light.

Interior of Symphony Hall Like Old-Fashioned Garden

By PAULINE WARREN

AS BRIGHT AND APPEALING as an old-fashioned garden was Symphony hall last evening for the "Spring in Vienna" pop concert staged to benefit the Boston Lying-In Hospital. Decorations were of the springtime sort—masses of vividly-colored flowers were banked on the stage and green boughs were set against white panels at intervals all the way around the balcony rails. On each small table was a small vase filled with still more flowers and innumerable pretty girls, gowned in flower-like prints, flitted about with huge trays of corsages and boutonnieres of gardenias and orchids.

The parterre was crowded to overflowing with many of Boston's best known socialites—all brightly arrayed for the occasion and in a gay lighthearted mood, a mood so pervasive throughout the hall that few escaped its contagion. Fine old wines and champagnes were served—the perfect accompaniments to the soft sweet strains of the Schubert and Straus music on the program.

Mr. Arthur Fiedler, who might well be termed "The Waltz King" among conductors, outdid himself and exhorted his Symphony men to pour out waltzes that were so incomparably played it was agony to listen to them sitting down.

Highlights of the evening were the announcing of the winner of the brand new car standing so glittering in the lobby (Mrs. James Lawrence won it, the lucky thing!) and Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma's playing of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." When he finished the applause actually became uncontrolled and yodels for more rang from every corner of the parterre. Everyone was having such a good time by then that nobody cared how loud they yelled and both Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Sanroma's efforts to still the tumult were unavailing. Mr. Fiedler finally had to swing into the next number as quickly as he could to quiet the crowd.

As you must know by now, the entire hall was completely sold out the day before the concert. People who had put off buying their tickets to the last minute were going around wildly trying to get them at any price. One musical critic we know, who had planned on entertaining a party of five, was left high and dry and had to call his party off.

So the Lying-In Hospital must be a good deal richer today than it was yesterday. But how hard those poor committee members worked! They were still at it last evening. Not for them the enjoyment of the delightful evening their efforts had created. They were here, there and everywhere—seeing that every detail went off smoothly, quietly, perfectly. Mrs. Harcourt Amory, Jr., was in the lobby most of the time giving directions to flower girls and ushers. She looked so infinitely appealing in her long-trained gown of taupe and lighter gray combined with furs and orchids. Mrs. William Wood was another commitee member who stayed in the back most of the time, and so distinctive did she look in her black velvet dinner gown and matching small hat that eyes kept following her everywhere.

Herald May 11

[169]

Smart Audience at Benefit

Concert Proves Huge Success

"Spring in Vienna" Given in Symphony Hall to Capacity Audience

By MARION LYNDON

The magic touch of "Spring in Vienna" transformed Symphony hall last evening for one of the most successful benefit concerts in a long time. The hall was completely sold out and many disappointed at not having tables for their parties were glad to get balcony seats, a state of affairs gratifying to any committee.

Mrs. Edward L. Bigelow in charge of decorations put flowers in the 240 table vases yesterday afternoon and many a hotel and restaurant should copy the delightful simplicity of arrangement of those few blossoms in glass holders. It was a shining example of what good taste can achieve. A hillside of flaming azaleas masked the sides of the platform and a huge cluster of purple lilacs was at the center of the stage.

Mrs. Harcourt Amory, Jr., who was responsible for so much of the success of the evening—which swelled the funds for the Lying-In Hospital—was very lovely in a dinner gown of two tones of gray and carried a silver fox scarf. Another very busy member of the committee was Mrs. William Lawrence Wood in black velvet. Mrs. James Lawrence held the lucky number which Arthur Fiedler drew from a basket held by Miss Lorna Livermore and Miss Barbara Young and hence was awarded the car exhibited last evening.

Dinner parties galore were given. Mrs. Harold L. Chalifoux and Mrs. Philip Dexter, two committee members, gave parties as well as working long and strenuously on ticket arrangements. Mr. Bainbridge Crist, there to hear the symphonic arrangement of his waltz, "Spring Night in Vienna," was given a gorgeous bouquet by Miss Livermore and Miss Young as he acknowledged prolonged plaudits.

Noted among the distinguished audience were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Stockton, Miss Margaret Stockton and Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr.; Mr. and Mrs. Timothee Adamowski; Mr. and Mrs. Bernard C. Weld, Mr. and Mrs. Forrester A. Clark, with Mrs. Clark's gown of black taffeta with white organdy yoke; Mr. and Mrs. Richard Storey with Mrs. Storey in black with narrow pleatings of rose; Mr. and Mrs. Sewall Fessenden, Mr. and Mrs. Courtlandt Van Voorhis, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Morison, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick S. Whitwell, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Toppan, Mrs. Richard S. Russell, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer, Mrs. Samuel D. Warren, Miss Patricia Bird, Miss Gertrude McGinley, Mr. Thomas Gannett, Miss Ursula Coues, Miss Alice Burrage, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Burrage; Dr. and Mrs. Edwin Cave (Louise Fessenden), Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Hallowell (Nancy Means); Mr. and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall (Nancy Ayers); Mrs. Francis W. Bird, Miss Anna Bird, Miss Mary Bird, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Harris, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and her granddaughter, Miss Josephine Murray, Mr. and Mrs. Willis Beal, and Mrs. Joseph F. Woods.

Also of importance were Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Bell, Mrs. J. Harleston Parker and Mr. Clement M. Burnhome, Mrs. A. L. West Movius, Miss Kitty Talbot, Miss Barbara Reynolds, Mrs. Frederic C. Church, Jr., in stunning black lace and a short mink cape; Miss Sally Curtis in sapphire blue; Miss Lee Marston in a strikingly attractive print of vivid colors. Mrs. Harold J. Coolidge, one of the few to appear in long gloves (she dispensed with them early in the evening); Mrs. John Bottomley and Miss Ellen Bottomley, Mrs. George von L. Meyer, Jr., beautiful in black with a wrap of French blue; Mrs. John Tuckerman, Miss Anne Tuckerman, Miss Helen Warren in black and white and Miss Anne Warren in red; Miss Martha Means in a navy dinner gown; Miss Eleonora Sears in black; Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr., and Miss Carol Smith, both in navy; Mr. and Mrs. P. A. O'Connell, Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon in black and Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Proctor.

GOWNED ALIKE AT "SPRING IN VIENNA"

Miss Lorna Livermore and Miss Barbara Young in gowns of yellow that they wore as bridesmaids for Mrs. Benjamin S. Clark (Charlotte Lyman) as they held the basket of numbers at last evening's benefit Pop concert.

VIENNA NIGHT AT THE POPS

Society Out in Force for Lying-In Hospital Benefit

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Pops went Viennese last evening in a concert given for the benefit of the Boston Lying-In Hospital. A social as well as a musical occasion, the concert was attended by a fashionable and gaily attired audience. Even Symphony Hall itself blossomed forth with new decorations, and champagne and "Wiener Kaffee mit Schlagsahne" were added to the list of drinkables.

Except for Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue (with Mr. Sanroma as pianist), and his "Strike Up the Band," with which the programme concluded, Mr. Fiedler selected for his pieces only numbers from Viennese hands or those that in one way or another celebrated that city of waltzes. Opportunely the conductor chanced upon one waltz uniquely appropriate to this "Spring in Vienna" night, Bainbridge Crist's "Spring Night in Vienna," then played for the first time in Boston, and in the presence of the composer, who was heartily and deservedly applauded.

To be wholly original at this late date in a Viennese waltz would be impossible, but Mr. Crist has managed to write a series of waltz tunes of definite melodic appeal, no one of which pointedly suggests any predecessor. It might be said that the score owes something to Richard Strauss as well as to Johann, though more in the matter of orchestral fastidiousness than of orchestral brilliance. One would have liked a little more gusto, a fuller resonance, at least in the final climax. But Mr. Fiedler may be said to have found a charming composition that should please more than one audience in the Pops to come.

Symphony Maestro Off t o Seek New Compositions

Sergei Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, left Boston for New York, yesterday, to embark for Europe in search of new compositions. L. to r., to bid him bon voyage: Miss Tarrie Wshkoff, Mrs. Edward Phaw, Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mr. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Carl Dreyfus, New England regional Hearst Newspapers director.

BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN New England's Greatest Evening Newspaper THURSDAY, MAY 10, 1934

Friends See Symphony Conductor Depart for Europe

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

MRS. PHAW MISS WAHKOFF MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY MRS. DREYFUS CARL DREYFUS

Friends saw Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, depart today for Paris in quest of new music for next season's programs. In the party, left to right, were Mrs. Edward Phaw, Miss Tarrie Wahkoff, Mrs. Koussevitzky, Koussevitzky, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Carl Dreyfus, publisher of the Boston Evening American.

KOUSSEVITZKYS GO ABROAD

Four months abroad in quest of new music and relaxation took Serge Koussevitzky out of Boston today, accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra left at noon for New York, where he will embark on the S.S. Champlain for Paris, Saturday.

"I expect to find some interesting new scores which I hope to present here next Winter," said Koussevitzky. "Except for this, I am going chiefly for a rest."

Although their plans are indefinite the Koussevitzys expect to spend most of their time in Paris this summer, with possible short trips to Austria, England, and the south of France.

Koussevitzky's departure folfollowed his election last night as a foreign honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Among those at the station to bid them bon voyage were Mrs. Edward Burlingame Hill, wife of Professor Hill, head of the Harvard music department, and Mrs. Edward Phaw of Milton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, other friends and several members of the orchestra.

The Dance

May 17

Hans Wiener at the Pops

The program chosen for the third consecutive appearance of Mr. Hans Wiener and his Dance Group at the Symphony Hall Pops struck a tone of lightness and gayety admirably suited to the popular atmosphere of these concerts. In such a program the music and the dance reciprocally enhance each other and communicate their exhilaration to the audience. The next repetition scheduled is for Monday evening.

"The Princess and the Frog King," an adaptation of a Grimm fairy tale, went off with the touch and go that is the result of plenty of rehearsal. Mr. George Bishop, as the Frog King, got in some neat, light-landing leaps. Miss Nina Dale and Miss Marjorie Heinzen lent grace to the humors of the Fat Lady and the Thin Lady. Miss Dorita Ferguson has improved as the Princess. The striking simplicity of Mr. Reginald Kibbe's setting showed up attractively in the far reaches of Symphony Hall. And the music by Adolphe Adam was right as orchestral accompaniment.

"The Street Dancers," (to a fragment from Křenek's "Jonny Spielt Auf,") a duo by Mr. Hans Wiener and Miss Kay Pope, came to lively performance. Mr. Weiner has keenly the comic sense and excels in dance and make-up of the eccentric or character type. Miss Kay Pope is a vivacious dancer.

"The Butcher, the Baker and the Candlestickmaker," composed (as are all the others) by Mr. Wiener, is a frolicsome employment of the folk element. The costumes, designed by Mr. Wiener, and the shopfront background by Mr. Kibbe are in the same light-hearted vein as the group placement and movement to the waltz rhythms of Johann Strauss.

Mr. Wiener, clothing fairy and folklore with his imaginative dance conceptions, is at his best. He and his group appear most advantageously at Symphony Hall, where the commodious stage sets no limit to their conquest of space and the orchestra gives zip to their performance.

In the more pretentious ballet, "El Amor Brujo," of the previous evenings, they are less satisfying. Perhaps because the content of de Falla's music is greater than that of the choreography, perhaps because the heavier phases of German technique in stylized Spanish form, do not click so readily with Pops audiences, and lack of response engenders enervation in the dancers.

M. L.

Amer May 17

st Evening Newspaper THURS

DANCERS STAR IN CONCERT

By MOSES SMITH

Hans Wiener and his Dance Group rounded off last night's Pops concert with an amusing group of dances before an engrossed audience which took every seat in Symphony Hall. The dance part of the program, indeed, will be repeated at the Pops concert of next Monday evening, May 21.

Wiener first presented his group in "The Princess and the Frog King," his own dance-play based on an old fairy-tale, to music of Adolphe Adam. The transparent movements and gestures of the dancers, attired in suitable costumes.

"The Street Dancers," in which Mr. Wiener and Kay Pope attempted an amusing skit, did not quite come off, despite the fact that Wiener is usually most engaging in this light, satiric dancing. Miss Pope was more at her ease. Best of all was Mr. Fiedler's spirited version of the Europeanized, slightly nostalgic jazz from Krenek's "Jonny spielt auf."

The final number was the most elaborate—"The Butcher, the Baker and the Candlestick Maker"—a farce by Wierner to music of Johann Strauss. The entire troupe presented a miniature drama wherein an ill-assorted bridal engagement is resolved into two happy marriages. The scenery here, as well as in the first number, was rudimentary but effective.

* * *

Several features, in addition to the reappearance of the Wiener dancers, will lend interest to next week's programs. Tuesday night Mr. Fiedler will present an excellent Wagner program. On Thursday night Elizabeth Travis-Behnke will appear as soloist in Saint-Saens' G minor piano concerto, and Mr. Fiedler will lead the first Boston performance of Deems Taylor's suite, "Circus Day."

Harvard Night, when the Harvard Glee Club makes its annual appearance at Pops, comes on Monday evening, May 28.

Again Mr. Wiener In a Pops Program

To say that the Pops are popular is something more than an exercise in truism. Last evening Symphony Hall was sold out completely long before the performance began, so that a sign was posted saying that Hans Wiener and his Dance Group (who were to have made their last appearance) would play a return engagement on Monday evening. Last evening the dancers were seen in three short numbers, the short dance-play of "The Princess and the Frog King," after an old fairy tale, to the music of Adam's overture, "If I Were King"; the dance-dialogue, "The Street Dancers," to the music of Krenek's "Blues"; the dance-farce, "The Butcher, the Baker, the Candlestickmaker," to Johann Strauss's overture, "Night in Venice."

Krenek's "Blues" is jazz of the European type. In many another piece than "Johnny Spielt Auf" has this composer flirted with the jazz idea. He knows all its formulas, fulfills all its demands. And yet, having done all this, the finished product remains undeniably European, could not possibly be mistaken for the work of an American. The "Blues" of last evening was simply one more case in point. To it Mr. Wiener and Miss Kay Pope danced an interesting and amusing routine, with occasional gestures suggestive of the "street," with the dance always following closely the music that suggested it. Similarly, the incidents in the two playlets were evidently built around incidents in the musical scores, the one in every case bringing out, enhancing, complementing the other. One cannot fail to observe that the note of the grotesque or the near-grotesque is strong in all Mr. Wiener's compositions. Even when he paints his plastic picture of pathos, the element of grotesquerie is either just below the surface or is actually present as a burlesque on pathos. The three numbers from this group of dancers gave great pleasure last evening.

Not a whit less pleasurable was the purely musical part of the evening. Swiftly Mr. Fiedler set the pace for the introduction to the third act of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Ably he pointed the harmonic highlights of the waltzes out of Strauss's "Rosenkavalier." Expressively he drew the melody of the popular "Träumerei" of Schumann from the players. Litolff's overture, "Maximilian Robespierre," with its changes of mood, was interesting chiefly on account of its effective use of the "Marseillaise." One admired the three dances from German's suite, "Nell Gwyn." Something racy with the marks of the soil infects this "Country Dance," this "Pastoral Dance," this "Merrymaker's Dance." German handles well his folk matter, gives it the setting that allows it to shine forth in its real beauty. The "Largo" from Dvořák's "New World Symphony," and Liszt's "First Hungarian Rhapsody," each in effective performance, ended the purely musical part of the program. Among the encores the one which achieved highest popularity was the waltz of a few seasons ago, "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time."

A. H. M.

Music

Children at the Pops

It was Children's Night at the Symphony Hall Pops last evening, as you might have gathered from the enthusiasm and from the musical preferences of the audience. With particolored paper hats on their heads, and in their hands toy watches (which ticked if you knew how to use your fingernails), youth passed judgment on the examples of the art of tone there set forth.

The program was cleverly designed to appeal to youthful tastes, from the solemn Largo of Handel, Mozart's "Sleighride" and the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, to Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry," "Carioca" and "The Man on the Flying Trapeze." For once in the twentieth century Haydn's naïve "surprise" chord had its intended effect. The Iron Foundry pleased a mechanically minded generation. But the jazzy items seemed most popular. No doubt most of the young people knew them through the beneficent educational agency of the radio.

How far should Mr. Fiedler go in competing with the jazz orchestra? It is amusing and a little pathetic to see the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attempting jazz rhythms, and to hear them whistle and shout in imitation of the negroid manner. Apart from the question of suitability, there is the question of capacity. The fact is, if there is one thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot play, it is jazz.

L. A. S.

171

Dr. Davison's Valedictory to The Glee Club

Wallace Woodworth Succeeds To Place of Conductor At Harvard

Trans May 16

After twenty-two years as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison resigned last evening at the annual meeting of the club. He will continue, however, as choirmaster and organist and will bear the title of conductor-emeritus. G. Wallace Woodworth, assistant conductor, who directed the club this year during the absence of Dr. Davison on sabbatical leave, will succeed him as conductor. Both Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth will keep on with their regular academic work at Harvard.

In announcing his resignation, Dr. Davison spoke to the members of the club as follows:

"It is now twenty-two years since I undertook the direction of this organization, and I feel that the time has come when, with a clear conscience, I can lay aside that responsibility. I am persuaded, furthermore, that the best interests of the club will be furthered by my doing so. Few things are more tragic than the stubbornness with which older men refuse to make way for younger ones, and I cannot bear even to approach the point where it can be said that I retarded the progress of this club by too long postponing my retirement. Not that I feel myself to be an old man; far from it; nor do I believe that my days of usefulness as a choral conductor are over. I doubt not that my physical strength and my gift of invective would last me through a few more seasons of Glee Club rehearsals. But I will confess that I have found the last few years of Glee Club activity terribly exhausting and I do not wish to stay with you until you can see that my powers are lagging. This group is perennially young and before long the incoming freshmen will view me as a patriarch, whether or not I really am one. Now is the time for a younger man, with new ideas and abundant energy, to carry on this work.

"In a sense I feel that I have earned my rest, for into these twenty-two years have been crowded enough mental and physical effort to account for three ordinary choral conductorships.

"No one here is old enough to know what the earlier years of this work cost me: the struggle to establish the club on a self-respecting basis with regard to management and morale, the effort to attain financial independence, and, above all, the unremitting warfare to found and maintain an uncompromisingly high standard of music to be sung. How many infuriated letters I answered; how many committees I argued with; how many lifelong enemies I made. I wonder whether you know that at one time there was talk of asking the university authorities to forbid us to call ourselves the Harvard University Glee Club. We had, to be sure, many friends, among whom two in particular stand out: President Lowell, whose faith in our ideals was unbounded, and the late H. T. Parker, music critic of the Boston Transcript, always ardent in our defense, invariably generous and far-seeing in his counsels. Through these difficult years the members of the club never relaxed their loyalty, for we were determined that the brave experiment initiated by Mayo Shattuck and a few other students of his time, should have every chance of succeeding.

"And it is in that success that I find my second justification for withdrawal: for from the very beginning my interest in the glee club has been educational. I was ambitious that every Harvard student should be given the opportunity of participating in the best choral music; the rehearsals were to me the core of the movement; public performance and excellence in singing have been in my mind purely by-products. To be sure, it was important that we should sing well, in order that the music should sound convincing in your ears and so persuade you of its validity; it was important that we should have public performances, in order that we might offer to others the opportunity of sharing our enjoyment of great music, and that occasion should be given for taking part in major choral works accompanied by orchestra, whereby your own experience of great music should be heightened and intensified. Never can we repay the debt of gratitude we owe to Dr. Koussevitzky and to other conductors who preceded him, and to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for providing us with those occasions. Now the standard is fixed, the tradition grounded, and my work is done. The glee club, I feel confident, will never forsake the type of music it now cherishes, and will never again become an organization of the select few. Were I to remain your conductor, it would only be necessary for me to maintain the present standard of performance, and that my successor can do far better than I.

"And as my interest in this work has been primarily educational, so now I wish to give myself to other educational causes to which I can perhaps lend my aid and which absorption in glee club work has caused me to neglect. I wish besides to complete some works which may be of assistance to students of the technique and the history of music. I would not have you think that I am now entering on a career of idleness; indeed, I expect to work harder than I ever have before in substituting unfinished problems for one that is now happily completed.

"Fourteen years ago next September an angular and not particularly attractive freshman presented himself for admission to the Harvard Glee Club; and although it has always been my merciful wont to spare candidates the shock of an immediate rejection, his voice was so bad that I there and then turned him down. Undismayed, he reappeared the next evening to bid for a place as accompanist. I promptly told him that if his ability as a pianist were not markedly in excess of his gifts as a singer, I had no wish to waste my time in hearing him play. He persisted, however, and his powers were so convincing that he became forthwith assistant accompanist. Little did I dream at that moment that in my impatience I had all but driven away the one who was to follow me as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club; the man whom I have long looked to as my successor, a patient, loyal and devoted friend, with whom, through all these years there has never been even an apocalyptic intimation of disagreement. He has never protested at my shortcomings, nor has he ever failed ardently to support me in all my projects, and it is to him that I have invariably turned for advice, both professional and personal.

"But my affection for him has never influenced my estimate of his powers as a musician. I pride myself that it was upon my urgent advice that he turned from a career in the field of modern history to one in music; and it has been my particular joy to watch him steadily grow to acknowledged eminence as conductor and teacher. When a few years ago I gave up the conductorship of the Radcliffe Choral Society, I strongly urged that Woody be appointed my successor, for as I hoped that he would follow me as leader of the Harvard Glee Club I felt that the growing tradition of joint rehearsals and performances of the Choral Society and the Glee Club, which I had from the beginning held to be the most important development of this work, would be furthered and strengthened.

"To Woody I commit what has been my dearest project; an organization which has never been out of my thoughts; I have planned for it, worked for it, fought for it, and to it I have given the best years of my life. All that I believe regarding the power of good music and all my faith in the potentiality of young people to apprehend and love that music has been bound up in this club; and that faith has been amply justified by you here present, by the college generations that have just preceded you, and it will, under Woody's skilful guidance, be justified again by those who succeed you in membership.

"This is a sad moment for me and yet it is a happy one. For though I shall miss the unique joy of those hectic rehearsals, I shall yet have the satisfaction of hearing you sing and of watching you achieve greater things than those to which with my limitations I could have led you. Perhaps I may be allowed occasionally to fill a seat behind the second basses and sing out of tune, as you know I always do. I could hardly bear to be cut off entirely from what has been so large a part of my life.

"This is all I have to say. It is not half of what I feel as I look back on your loyalty and on that of others who have made this club what it is. And of one thing you may be sure, that as long as I live my love for the Harvard Glee Club will never suffer change."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 20 1934

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will face a fifty-fourth season in its own Symphony Hall with particular anticipation. As one of the leading organizations of the world, and as favorite orchestra to many New Haveners, the announcement will bring an anticipation of new music at least well worth the hearing, and at most containing "first times" which will become historic. A repetition of the indispensable standard works together with revivals and various revelations from the archives may be confidently expected.

Dr. Koussevitsky again will be the busiest conductor in America, shouldering the burden of twenty-two pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, ten in New York, and two tours West and South, with occasional calls on the neighboring cities of New England.

Important to the development of American music is the attitude of the Boston Orchestra which plays more music by American composers than any other similar organization. The so-called "Boston Group," consisting of Chadwick, Loeffler, Foote, Hill, and others, are but a part of a larger representation which included this year Randall Thompson, Emerson Whithorne, Roy Harris, Ernest Bloch, and Walter Piston.

No announcement is yet forthcoming of a visit to New Haven, but one may safely reason that ties so close as those between this city and the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot be easily broken.

* * *

While Dr. Koussevitsky guides the familiar forces in Boston's Symphony Hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will engage in the customary series in New York's Carnegie Hall. While Dr. Koussevitsky appears practically throughout the entire season, the Philharmonic audience will have either the advantage or disadvantage of listening to no less than seven conductors in the course of the Winter.

Mr. Toscanini will figure most large in the minds of the audiences who flock to his inspired interpretations. During his ten-week term there will be a Brahms series, and much Beethoven. Bruno Walter will conduct Wagner and Mozart particularly, since he excels in interpreting the music of these composers. Hans Lange, otherwise concertmaster, may be expected to lend a hand with two weeks of American and English music.

The new conductors are Otto Klemperer, formerly of Berlin and recently of Los Angeles; Arthur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Werner Janssen, a young American who has been gaining experience abroad. Mr. Klemperer was guest conductor with the old New York Symphony in 1926; Mr. Rodzinski assisted Leopold Stokowski for several years in Philadelphia. Mr. Janssen is not known here as a conductor.

Obviously with such an array of conductors there will be highly specialized fields represented by the programs. Whether or not this will be for the good remains to be noted in the reaction of the public to the playing of the orchestra. So far as the audiences are concerned the feast would seem to be complete, but the question arises as to whether any body of players would be able to withstand the varied methods of drilling and interpretation impressed upon them in a comparatively short interval of time. The test may wither, make or break.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 20 1934

HARRIS SYMPHONY IN COLUMBIA DISKS

The recent release of Roy Harris's symphony called "1933" shows a laudable and well-directed interest on the part of the Columbia Phonograph company in contemporary composers. The recording was made during a public performance at Carnegie hall on February 2 of this year by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky, and it is perhaps for this reason that certain extraneous sounds found their way into the microphone. The performance, however, is a brilliant one, as may be expected from the scholarly and musicianly Boston conductor.

The purchaser of this four-record album has more help than ordinary from the accompanying pamphlet. On the second page are quotations from various New York and Boston critics who find the symphony "absorbing, impressive," of an "elastic melodic line" and of "juicy thematic material." A biographical sketch of the composer taken from an article by J. N. Burke in the Boston Symphony program booklets, and a detailed description of the symphony by the composer himsef, each assist the listener in his appreciation of this decidedly modern work—modern in conception and in execution.

Mr Harris writes the following: "In the first movement I have tried to capture the mood of adventure and physical exuberance; in the second, of the pathos which seems to underly all human existence; in the third, the mood of a positive will to power and action." This reviewer, after hearing the symphony through the medium of disks a number of times has had some difficulty in feeling that the work conveys that positiveness to which the composer refers in the final movement. The symphony throughout seems to be filled with more despair than hope from the opening movement to the end, and the Andante approaches Schoenbergian morbidity.

Harris says dark things in the modern manner; there is a certain muscularity to his writing which, when not drawn out to too great lengths, approaches genuinine inspiration, but too often the gestures of despair become grimaces. The intentions of the composer as set forth in his brief description of the symphony are American in the best style; the music, as it reaches the ear of this reviewer, falls short of the spirit in which it was conceived.

On the odd side of the fourth record is a pleasant piece, written by Mr Harris expressly to fill this short space. "Four Minutes and 20 Seconds," for flute and string quartet is also in the modern manner, but gentler and less exacting than the sad, mutterings of the symphony. Again Mr Harris expresses his intentions: "This short piece was written expressly for Columbia records to fill a time space of less than four minutes and 30 seconds. It serves as just one more indication that modern thoughts and feelings are becoming increasingly conditioned by exact time concepts."

Elizabeth Travis Behnke, who will act as soloist at the Pops on Thursday night, playing Saint-Saens' piano concerto.

Herald

ARTHUR FIEDLER, probably the most popular director that the Pops has ever had, continues to provide program of light music with the aid of a splendid orchestra.

BOSTON EVENING

and Players === Music =

May 22 Pianist for the Pops Tran

Elizabeth Travis Behnke

Soloist for the Concert Tomorrow Evening at Symphony Hall

THE POPS IN 1934

Fifth Season Under Arthur Fiedler

Arthur Fiedler

The festive Pops, now in its forty-ninth season, has taken full possession of Symphony Hall. That it has grown into an institution that has done much in furthering the musical traditions and community interests is undeniable, and as such it has become a veritable monument of artistic pride, growing with each successive season. The Pops date back to Boston's early musical annals; it is simply inconceivable that Bostonians would do without their Pops concerts when the warm weather approaches.

To gather about a table with one's friends over tinkling glasses, to smoke while listening to Handel or Wagner, or Gershwin played by a full-sized and illustrious symphony orchestra — that is a privilege which no Bostonian will forego, and which no other city this side of Europe can boast.

The character of the Pops has changed with the years, striving as they do to delight a public of the widest range in musical taste. The ever open question of programs has probably never been more understandingly met than by Arthur Fiedler, the talented young conductor who is in his fifth season at the helm of the Pops. Widely conversant with classical music, with the better jazz, with the more agreeable "moderns," he can and does provide a Pops repertory broad enough to please every possible taste.

Taylor's Gem Is Pops Feature

By MOSES SMITH

Deems Taylor's "Circus Day" and the Saint-Saens G minor piano concerto were the feature numbers of last night's excellent Pop concert, led by Arthur Fiedler before an audience that nearly filled Symphony Hall.

Taylor's fantasy, which was being presented in its symphonic dress for the first time in Boston, is amusing entertainment. It exhibits the characteristic talents of the composer in the best vain, talents like his apt descriptive ability, his flare for melody and for piquant orchestration.

There is a good deal of humor, both broad and subtle, in this musical picturization of the circus-parade, side-shows and all. The lions roar, the monkeys dance and race, the elephant waltzes, the clowns make a mess of a tune: these are a few of the enjoyable bits.

The listeners were even more elated by the presentation of the concerto by the soloist, Elizabeth Travis Behnke, sympathetically accompanied by Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra. The pianist's nimble fingers and flexible wrists made light of the technical difficulties of the brilliant work, so that she was able to present a most musical version marked by neat accent and unsentimental phrasing. Where the music called for a bravura style the soloist was almost equally at home.

---

* * *

At Pops Mr. Fiedler led the first all-Wagner program of the season before a large and responsive audience. That part of the program which I was able to hear was given excellent performance, considering the handicaps of nightly concerts. Mr. Fiedler presented a surprisingly sympathetic version of the Siegfried Idyll, while his admirable choice of tempi for the "Meistersinger" prelude is too familiar to need re-emphasis. Similarly, the Ride of the Valkyrs, the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the "Song to the Evening Star" from "Tannhaeuser" came to capable performance, the last-named featuring the trombone solo of Julius Raichman.

Other numbers on the program were the "Kaiser" March, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Traeume" as violin solo, the overture to "Tannhaeuser," and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemerung."

Deems Taylor and His Circus Music

For First Hearing in Boston From Mr. Fiedler at The Pops

TRAN

TWO items at the Pops last evening were of more than usual interest. One was the presence of a piano soloist of distinct promise—Elizabeth Travis Behnke, playing Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor. The other was the first performance in New England of the new orchestral version of Deems Taylor's fantasy, "Circus Day." For the rest, the program of the evening followed the high standard which these latter days have brought to the Pops. Gone are the days—so it seems—when these programs are half made up of more or less nondescript street music. More and more they are approximating the lighter part of the regular symphonic repertory. Last evening's list, for example, contained the names of Chopin, Glazunov, Beethoven, Schubert, de Falla, Taylor, Saint-Saëns, MacDowell—all names heard often and honorably at the orchestra's winter concerts. To these were added only two other names not in the regular lists. A perusal of other programs gave similar results. Mr. Fiedler has this year given up the custom of certain earlier years in which whole evenings were given over to "light classics." Instead, he is diffusing his classics throughout the whole season—and the public is the gainer thereby. Add to this the fact that at the twentieth concert of the season (that of last evening) there has come no slipping in standards of performance, and the reasons are clear why every concert that the reviewer visits seems to contain a house that looks as though it were entirely sold out.

Mrs. Behnke last year established herself as a favorite with the public of the Pops. Last evening when she made her appearance she was greeted with more than the usual round of applause. At the conclusion of her playing, applause was fairly showered upon her, a bouquet of flowers was presented to her, and before it was all over Mr. Fiedler had asked the orchestra to rise to join in the acknowledgement of the continued handclapping. Mrs. Behnke is distinctly a personality as well as a good pianist. There is a fresh vivacity in her every movement, her approach to the task in hand. In charming manner she lives actively through every rhythmic suggestion which the piece makes, but pleasantly and unobtrusively and likably. Last evening she seemed especially well adapted to the polished surfaces, the smoothly intriguing rhythms, the nice sophistication of Saint Saëns concerto. Brightly and glitteringly her sufficient technic display itself—possibly in certain pianissimos a bit light for the expanse of Symphony Hall, but otherwise admirable from every angle. Abundant vitality characterized her rhythm. All manner of felicities one could find in her decorative playing. Altogether—here is a new young pianist whom one will watch with great interest.

Deems Taylor's "Circus Day" is exactly what the title indicates, a circus piece. He wrote it in 1925 for Paul Whiteman and his orchestra. In this version it was played up and down two continents. A little less than a year ago Mr. Taylor gave it symphonic orchestration. In the new dress this was its first performance hereabouts. Mr. Taylor describes his "Circus Day" as "eight pictures from memory." These pictures he translates into tone. They are memories of a street parade, of the big-top tent, of the bareback riders, of the lion cage, the dog and monkey circus, the waltzing elephants, of the tight-rope walker, of the jugglers, of the clowns. The whole he crowns with a finale which he entitles "Looking Back." This, like some of Strauss, is music of extreme realism. Behold the lions through the medium of all manner of curious glissandi in brass. Consider the waltzing elephants in their lumbering tuba solos, and at the last the attempt at a trill upon extreme low notes of that instrument! Call to mind also the squawking clarinet solos, perfect counterparts of the grotesquely painted faces and curious antics of the clowns. In all these music imitates physical characteristics as ably as music can ever be made to imitate them. Whether it remains music in the process is an entirely different question. That it belongs to a day at a circus is hardly open to dispute.

Then there is the music which suggests rather than describes. Here the musician is upon better ground. The bareback riders, the tight-rope walker, the jugglers, each have music suggestive of the titles music which would be pleasant to listen to if it were not in the service of realistic intention. Here Mr. Taylor, as in so much of his music, is the skilful craftsman, the artisan who can create delight. Pleasurably these movements strike the ear. While the musician admires the workmanship in them.—But descriptive or suggestive, all this music is well-nigh perfect counterpart to the ideas which underlie it. It must have been perfectly in place when played by Mr. Whiteman's band. It also is a pleasant novelty in a Pops concert.

A. H. M.

"CIRCUS DAY" AT THE POPS

Deems Taylor's Piece Arouses Enthusiasm

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Deems Taylor's "Circus Day," composed in 1925 for Paul Whiteman, and, if recollection does not slip, once played here by Mr. Whiteman and his band, received at last evening's Pop Concert in Symphony Hall its first performance in these parts in the version for full orchestra that the composer made last year.

With two operas and a handful of symphonic pieces behind him, Mr. Taylor employs the modern orchestra with ease and confidence. The wit that distinguishes his writings and his comments over the air is also one of his chief assets as music-maker. Add this lively fancy to his skill in orchestration, apply both to such a task as the musical description of the native circus, and the final happy outcome is inevitable. For music of this sort, furthermore, Arthur Fiedler has an especial flair. So last evening's "premiere" was a wholly successful one, and the audience received this diverting suite with unfeigned enthusiasm. Its next appearance on a Pop programme will be at the annual Harvard Night, Monday, May 28.

To add further interest to last evening's concert, there came a performance of Saint-Saens' G minor concerto for piano and orchestra, with Elizabeth Travis Behnke as the soloist. Today this concerto keeps company with that of Grieg and the D minor of MacDowell as a vehicle for ambitious students, and also for pianists who "broadcast." Yet its Bach-like first movement and its buoyant Scherzo still entitle it to respectful consideration. The hand that made them was of no mean ability. Last evening Mrs. Behnke played this artful music in the vein that best becomes it and in her turn was warmly applauded.

MUSIC

POPS CONCERT

Last night in Symphony Hall a concet of the Pops series ocured which was of special interest. From the standpoint of a review the Circus Suite by Deems Taylor and the performance of the Second Piano Concerto in G minor of Saint-Saens by Elizabeth Travis Behnke comprised this interest. Mr. Taylor's Suite is rarely played and is a distinct novelty. Certainly nobody could say the same of the Saint-Saens Concerto; but in this latter case the interest centres in the soloist.

It is no very prophetic statement to say that the Circus Suite is obviously going to be popular. Deems Taylor has the faculty of striking the popular taste. And this suite seemed to the audience and to this reviewer humorously descriptive and whimsically entertaining. It has perhaps too much whimsy in parts for its artistic health, but it has orchestral agility to offset this, an expedient of which Mr. A. A. Milne could never avail himself. Some of the incidental scense were the most delightful. The conclusion was the least so. Mr. Fiedler made extensive cuts in the store, but the piece should prove a reliable item of the Pops repertoire.

The Saint-Saens Concerto in G minor, written in 1868 and therefore long before the composer had acquired some of his most pompous and least prepossessing qualities, remains a most attractive work whereby a pianist may display his vituosity. Mrs. Behnke lacked nothing in this direction. She played the brilliant piano part with clarity, with discriminating taste and, needless to add, with technical sufficiency. The audience previously occupied with weighty questions of satisfying its digestion, paused and acorded Mrs. Behnke a modicum of attention and, afterward, enthusiastic applause. From any point of view she richly deserved this "courtesy." The concerto sounded as it should: that is to say with brilliance and melodic charm; and Mrs. Benhke's performance was captivating.

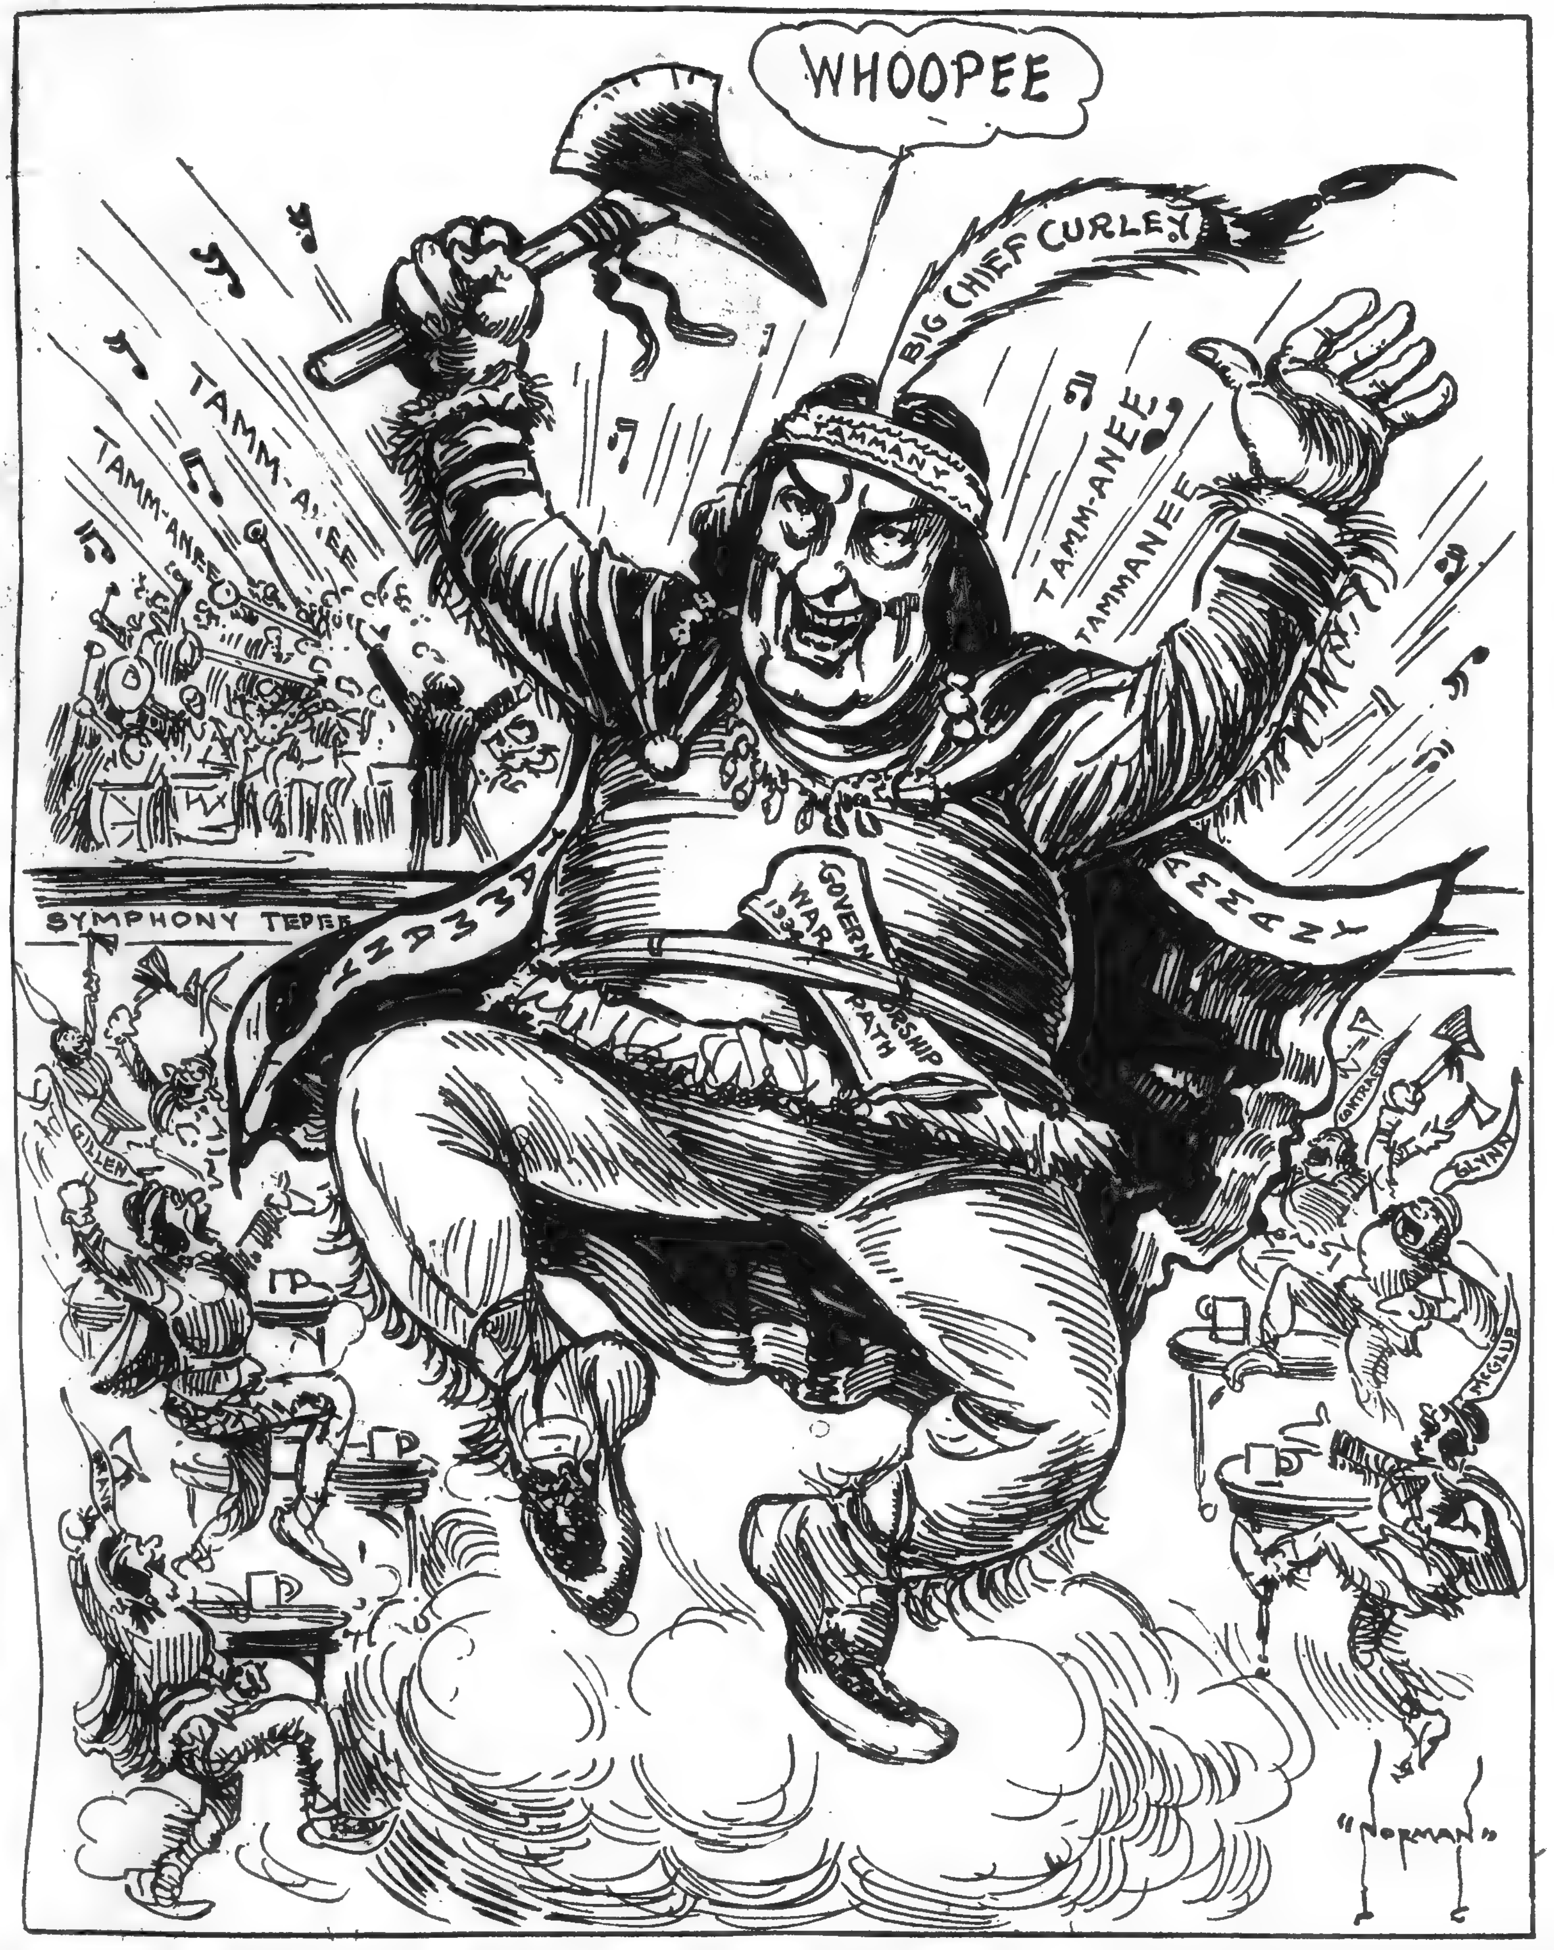
A. W. W...

Amusements

173

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, MAY 29, 1934

THE GUBERNATORIAL POPS



Fiedler to Conduct 250th Pop; Other Programs

Herald 3

Next Tuesday night, June 5, will mark the 250th Pop concert conducted by Arthur Fiedler since the Pops leader took control of these summer concerts at Symphony hall in May, 1930. A survey of Mr. Fiedler's Pops repertory through four and a half seasons is easily made since the conductor, who is no haphazard program maker, keeps a notebook with a careful record of every performance. His book shows 49 different marches, 52 overtures, 46 suites, 17 operatic fantasias, 31 waltzes, and 310 numbers otherwise classified (including symphonic poems and complete symphonies). The addition of 145 encores brings the total to 650. Nor do bare numbers tell the whole story of diversification. He is constantly testing the freshness and durability of the "lighter classics," seeking new scores which may be of symphonic standing but not too serious, keeping an ear alert for the best in the flood of music in current vogue. If, as sometimes happens, a piece with true qualities may have been largely passed by in the general abundance, he has in more cases than one brought it to a deserved popularity.

Next Thursday, June 7, will be the annual Request night with the program entirely determined by the ballots of the Pops public. The programs of the week follow:

Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III	Wagner
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor,"	Nicolai

MONDAY, JUNE 4

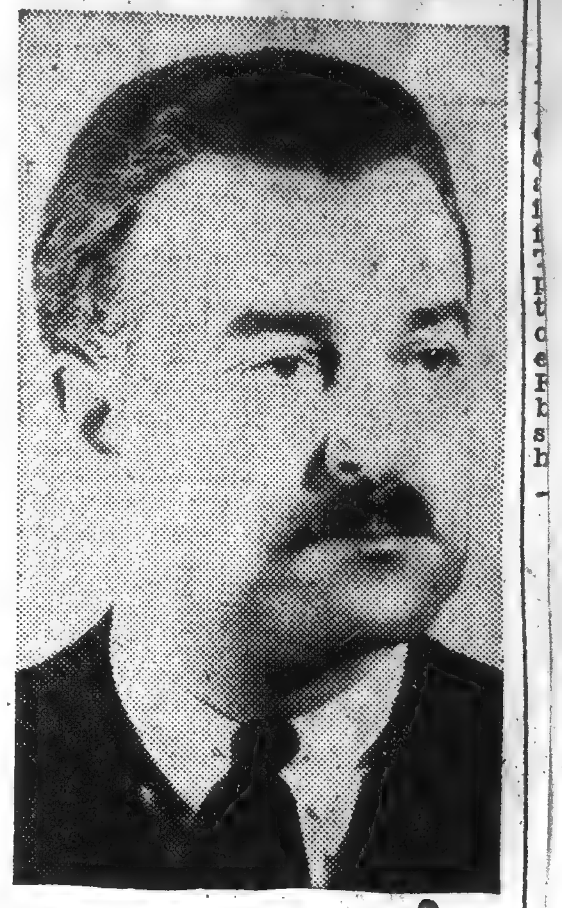
Tales from the Vienna Woods, Waltz	Strauss
Intercollegiate Inklings	Lewis
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
Ave Maria	Bach-Gounod
Rienzi, Overture	Wagner
Victor Herbert Favorites	Herbert
Prayer of Thanksgiving,	Arranged by Kremser
On the Mall, March	Goldman

TUESDAY, JUNE 5

March of the Gladiators	Fucik
L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1	Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Glee Club of the State Teachers College at Framingham
"Greetings"	Brahms
"When Sweetly Blossom Roses"	"
Love Song	"
Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Moto Perpetuo	Paganini
Streets of Pekin, Suite	Hadley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz	Strauss
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite	Grofe
Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Rachem	Mana-Zucca
"Eugene Oniegin," Fantasia	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Scheherazade": "The Prince and the Princess"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Bolero	Ravel
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection	Gershwin
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song,	Arranged by Jacchia
Sixth Hungarian Dance	Brahms



Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops, who will celebrate his 250th concert at Symphony hall on Tuesday evening. This covers the period of nearly four years since he took over the leadership of the Pops in 1930.

THURSDAY, JUNE 7
REQUEST NIGHT

"Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Largo from "Xerxes"	Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz,	Strauss
Bolero	Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Piano Solo	Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Roberta," Selection	Kern
"Carioca"	Youmans
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn,	Arranged by Kremser
Encores—"Jealousy," Tango	Gade
Lieberstraum	Liszt-Herbert
"Two Hearts in ¾ Time"	Stolz
Country Gardens	Grainger

FRIDAY, JUNE 8

March, "National Emblem"	Bagley
"Fingal's Cave," Overture	Mendelssohn
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
"Dornroschen," Waltz	Tchaikovsky
"Henry VIII," Ballet Suite	Saint-Saens
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun,"	Debussy
"The Roman Carnival," Overture	Berlioz
"Roberta," Selection	Kern
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee,"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen

SATURDAY, JUNE 9

March, "Land of the Maple"	Laurendeau
Overture to "Stradella"	Flotow
"Molly on the Shore"	Grainger
Polovetzkian Dances from "Prince Igor,"	Borodin
"Circus Day," Fantasy	Deems Taylor
Ouverture Solenelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection	Kern
Mosquito Dance	White
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"	Bizet

GIRL TO FLY IN

MUSIC AND

"Request Night" at the "Pops" Next Thursday

"Request Night" with a program selected by popular ballot, next Thursday, will feature the sixth week of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall.

Tuesday's concert will be the 250th that Arthur Fiedler has directed since he became conductor in 1930. Data concerning his repertory discloses that he has played 49 marches, 52 overtures, 46 suites, 17 "operatic fantasias," 31 waltzes, 310 pieces of miscellaneous character, and 145 encores, a total of 650 compositions.

Programs for this week follow:

MONDAY—"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Tales From the Vienna Woods, waltz, Strauss; Intercollegiate Inklings, Lewis; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; Ave Maria, Bach-Gounod; Rienzi, Overture, Wagner; Victor Herbert Favorites, Herbert; Prayer of Thanksgiving, arranged by Kremser; On the Mall, March, Goldman.

TUESDAY—"March of the Gladiaters," Fucik; L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1, Bizet; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Glee Club of the State Teachers College at Framingham: "Greetings," "When Sweetly Blossom Roses," Love Song, Brahms; Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini; Streets of Pekin, Suite, Hadley; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite, Grofe; Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet.

WEDNESDAY—Wedding march, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Rachim, Mana-Zucca; "Eugene Oniegin," fantasia, Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "Scheherazade," "The Prince and the Princess," Rimsky-Korsakov; Bolero, Ravel; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; Dubinushka, Russian folk song, arranged by Jacchia; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

THURSDAY, Request Night—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Largo from "Xerxes," Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; Bolero, Ravel; Rhapsody in Blue, piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; "Roberta," selection, Kern; "Carioca," Youmans; Prayer of Thanksgiving, old Dutch hymn, arranged by Kremser; encores: "Jealousy," tango, Gade; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; "Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time," Stolz; Country Gardens, Grainger.

FRIDAY, March, "National Emblem," Bagley; "Fingal's Cave," Overture, Mendelssohn; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; "Dornroschen," Waltz, Tchaikovsky; "Henry VIII," Ballet Suite, Saint-Saens; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "The Roman Carnival," Overture, Berlioz; "Roberta," Selection, Kern; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Entrance of the Boyards, Halvorsen.

SATURDAY. March, "Land of the Maple," Laurendeau; Overture to "Stradella," Flotow; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Polovetzkian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Circus Day," Fantasy, Deems Taylor; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection, Kern; Mosquito Dance, White; Gypsy Dance from "Carmon," Bizet.

ENGLISH ALUMNI IN POPS REUNION

Thousands Cheer Dr. Lewis, '79, as He Conducts His Own Composition

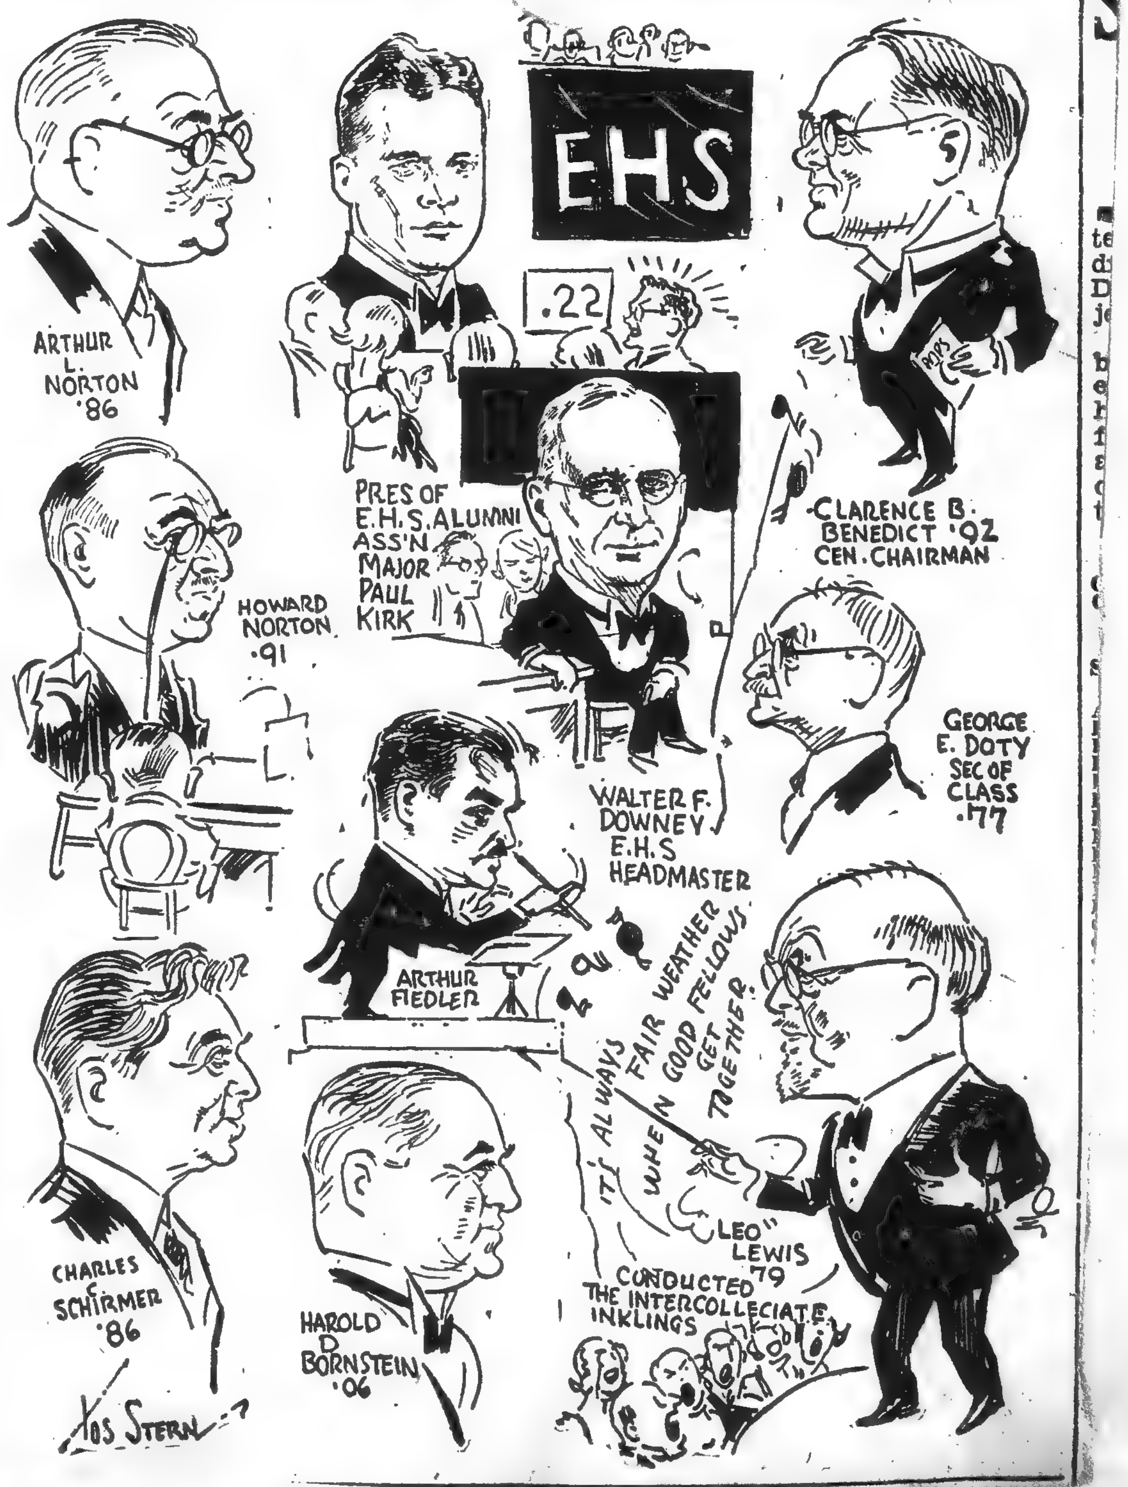
Thousands of graduates of English high school filled Symphony hall last night for a Pops concert sponsored by the English High School Alumni Association, oldest organization of its kind in the United States, and rose and cheered Louis R. Lewis '79, who conducted his own composition, "Intercollegiate Inklings."

Dr. Lewis, professor of music at Tufts College, conducted the orchestra in the presentation of fragments of traditional college songs which have become American folksongs.

At the conclusion of the program, which was, as usual, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the group sang "Alma Mater," the English high school song, under the leadership of Malcolm D. Barrows, head of the English department at the school.

Preceding the Pops, members of the class of '99 held their 35th annual reunion dinner in the Hotel Statler. Among the members of the class who attended the Pops concert were Charles Gilman, secretary; John Dorsey, city treasurer, and Theodore Roemer, city superintendent of buildings.

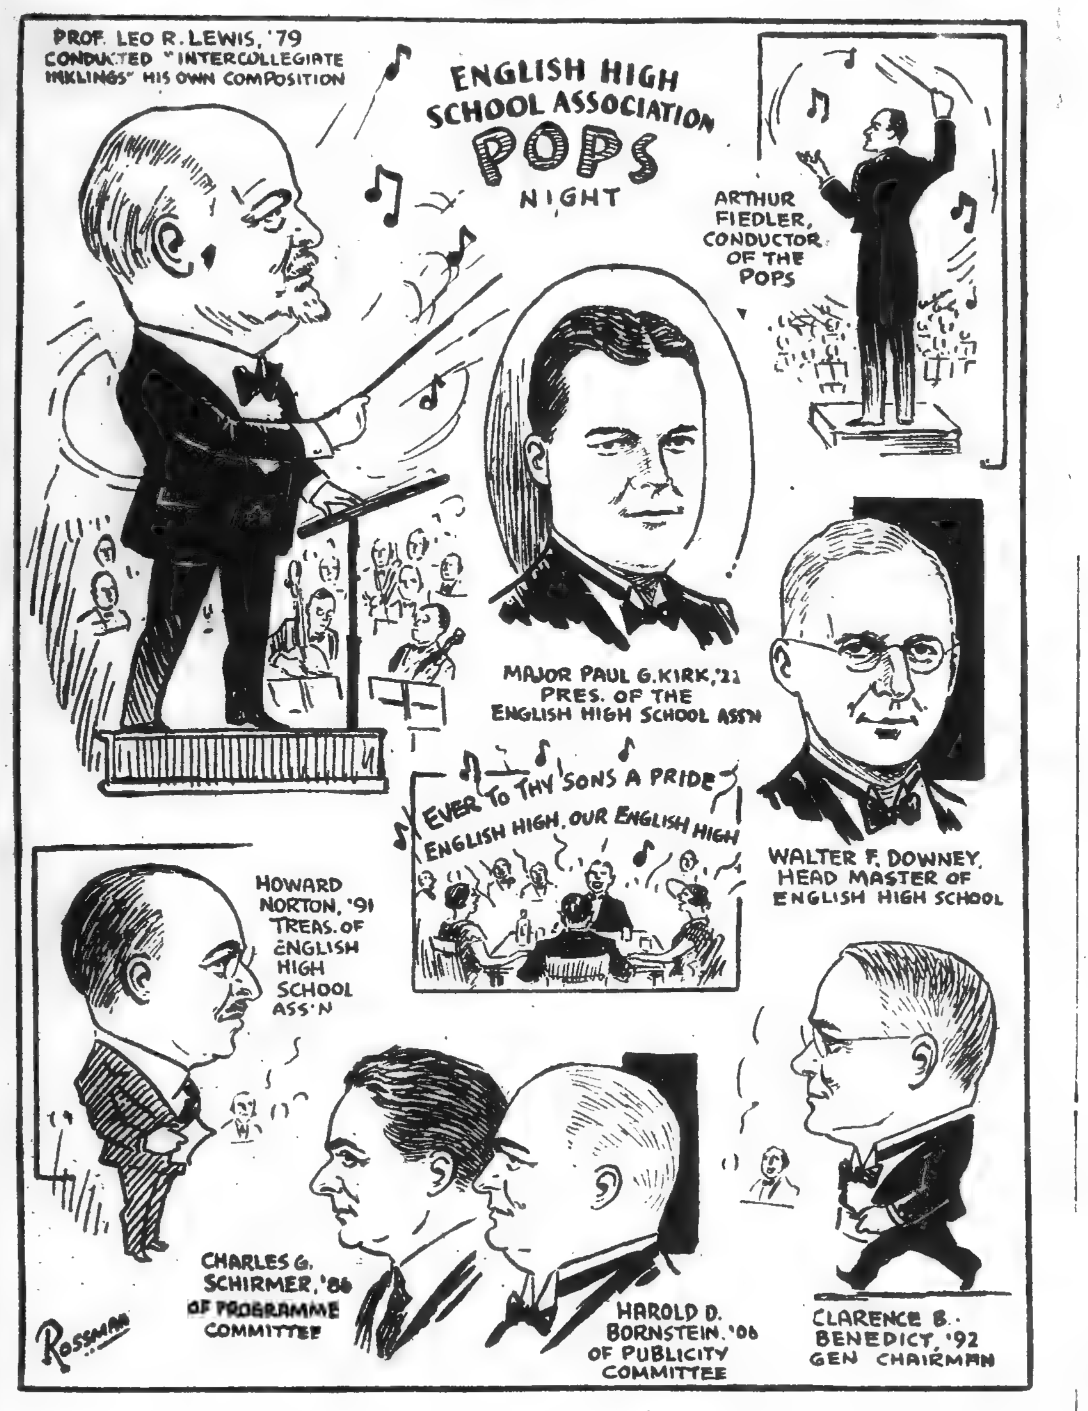
AT POPS REUNION OF ENGLISH HIGH



EHS
.22
ARTHUR L. NORTON '86
PRES OF E.H.S. ALUMNI ASS'N MAJOR PAUL KIRK
CLARENCE B. BENEDICT '92 GEN. CHAIRMAN
HOWARD NORTON '91
GEORGE E. DOTY SEC OF CLASS '77
WALTER F. DOWNEY E.H.S HEADMASTER
ARTHUR FIEDLER
IT'S ALWAYS FAIR WEATHER WHEN GOOD FELLOWS GET TOGETHER
"LEO" LEWIS '79 CONDUCTED THE INTERCOLLEGIATE INKLINGS
CHARLES SCHIRMER '86
HAROLD D. BORNSTEIN '06
YOS STERN

SDAY, JUNE 5, 1934 Post

English High Alumni Have Night at "Pops"



PROF. LEO R. LEWIS, '79 CONDUCTED "INTERCOLLEGIATE INKLINGS" HIS OWN COMPOSITION
ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL ASSOCIATION POPS NIGHT
ARTHUR FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR OF THE POPS
MAJOR PAUL G. KIRK, '21 PRES. OF THE ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL ASS'N EVER TO THY SONS A PRIDE ENGLISH HIGH, OUR ENGLISH HIGH
WALTER F. DOWNEY, HEAD MASTER OF ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL
HOWARD NORTON, '91 TREAS. OF ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL ASS'N
CHARLES G. SCHIRMER, '86 OF PROGRAMME COMMITTEE
HAROLD D. BORNSTEIN, '06 OF PUBLICITY COMMITTEE
CLARENCE B. BENEDICT, '92 GEN CHAIRMAN
ROSSMAN

Days of yore were vividly relived last night by alumni of the Boston English High School at "their night" of the Pops in Symphony Hall.

Favored by an excellent and varied programme, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, members of the English High School Association, of which Major Paul G. Kirk, class of '22 and a member of Governor Ely's military staff, is president, filled, with their friends, to overflowing Symphony Hall for the occasion.

A decided hit of the occasion was when Mr. Leo R. Lewis, '79, a professor of music at Tufts College, led the orchestra in playing "Intercollegiate Inklings," his own composition. The capacity gathering of E. H. S. alumni roundly applauded him for his work. Another impressive feature of the evening was when Mr. Malcolm D. Barrows, head of the English department at English High, led the singing of "Alma Mater." He is the husband of Representative Mary Livermore Barrows of Melrose.

The oldest alumnus at last night's entertainment was John Babcock, '73, of the Back Bay. Headmaster Walter F. Downey of the school was probably one of the most active of those present last night, spending about every moment during and between selections chatting with alumni about the "old school" now and then. Clarence B. Benedict, '92, was general chairman in charge of the programme.

B. U. Has Pops Tomorrow—Notes of Week of Fiedler's Players

Post J 10

SEVENTH WEEK OF POPS

The coming week will be the seventh of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Except for Monday night, which has been taken over by Boston University, there will be nightly Pop concerts of general public interest. On Wednesday, Mr. Fiedler will give the first performance hereabouts of "Tall City," the suite of Hans Spialek, which was inspired by the skyscrapers of New York. Besides radio performances, this score has been heard twice in London and at the Rochester Festival under Howard Hanson.

Friday will be the second Children's Night of the season, to which all young people are invited to come in costume. There will be a parade and an award of prizes.

MUSIC AND

10

Local Premiere of Spialek's 'Tall City' at 'Pops' Wednesday

Arthur Fiedler has announced a first Boston performance of Hans Spialek's suite, "Tall City," for the "Pop" concert of Wednesday evening, in Symphony Hall. This score depicts in five movements various aspects of New York, and has been played at the Rochester, N Y, Festival under Howard Hanson, and twice in London.

The concert tomorrow evening has been taken over by Boston University; there will be no public sale. Remaining concerts of the week are open to the public. Friday will be the second Children's Night of the season, to which all young people are invited to come in costume. There will be a parade and an award of prizes for the best costumes.

England — JUNE 10, 1934

e Product

The Pops Programs

THIS will be the seventh week of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Except for Monday night, which has been taken over by Boston University, there will be nightly Pop concerts of general public interest. On Wednesday, Mr. Fiedler will give the first performance hereabouts of "Tall City," the suite of Hans Spialek, which was inspired by the skyscrapers of New York.

Friday will be the second Children's Night of the season, to which all young people are invited to come in costume. There will be a parade and an award of prizes.

Programs follow:

TUESDAY

March, "Second Connecticut"....Reeves
Overture to "The Bronze Horse"..Auber
Liebestraum ....Liszt-Herbert
"Lo Boheme," Fantasia.........Puccini
Malaguena, from the Spanish Suite "Andalucia" ....Lecuona
(Arranged by Ferdie Grofe)
Ave Maria................Bach-Gounod
Bolero ....Ravel
Waltzes from the operetta "Eva"..Lehar
Song of the Evening Star, from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
(Trombone solo: Jacob Raichman)
"In the Hall of the Troll King," from the suite, "Peer Gynt".........Grieg

WEDNESDAY

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Rossini
Bacchanale from 'Tannhaser'..Wagner
Ecarecrow Sketches...........Converse
Motto perpetuo .... Paganini
"Tall City," Symphonic Suite....Spialek
(First performance in Boston)
Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in F-sharp minor (First movement)..Rachmaninoff
Soloist: Verona Durick
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection Kern
"Tik, Tak," Polka (from "Die Fledermaus") ....Strauss
Hungarian Czardas: "Ghost of the Warrior" ....Grossman

THURSDAY

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem..Liszt
Tufts Songs
Intercollegiate Inklings......L. R. Lewis
"Vienna Blood," Waltz.........Strauss
"Maximilian Robespierre," Overture Litolff
The Rose and The Ring Carrie Bullard Lewis a Scene from Act I
b Overture and Finale, Act I
Felix S. Vecchione, '37 (Baritone), with Tufts and Jackson Glee Clubs
"Roberta," Selection..............Kern
"Night and Day"................Porter
"Stars and Stripes Forever"......Sousa

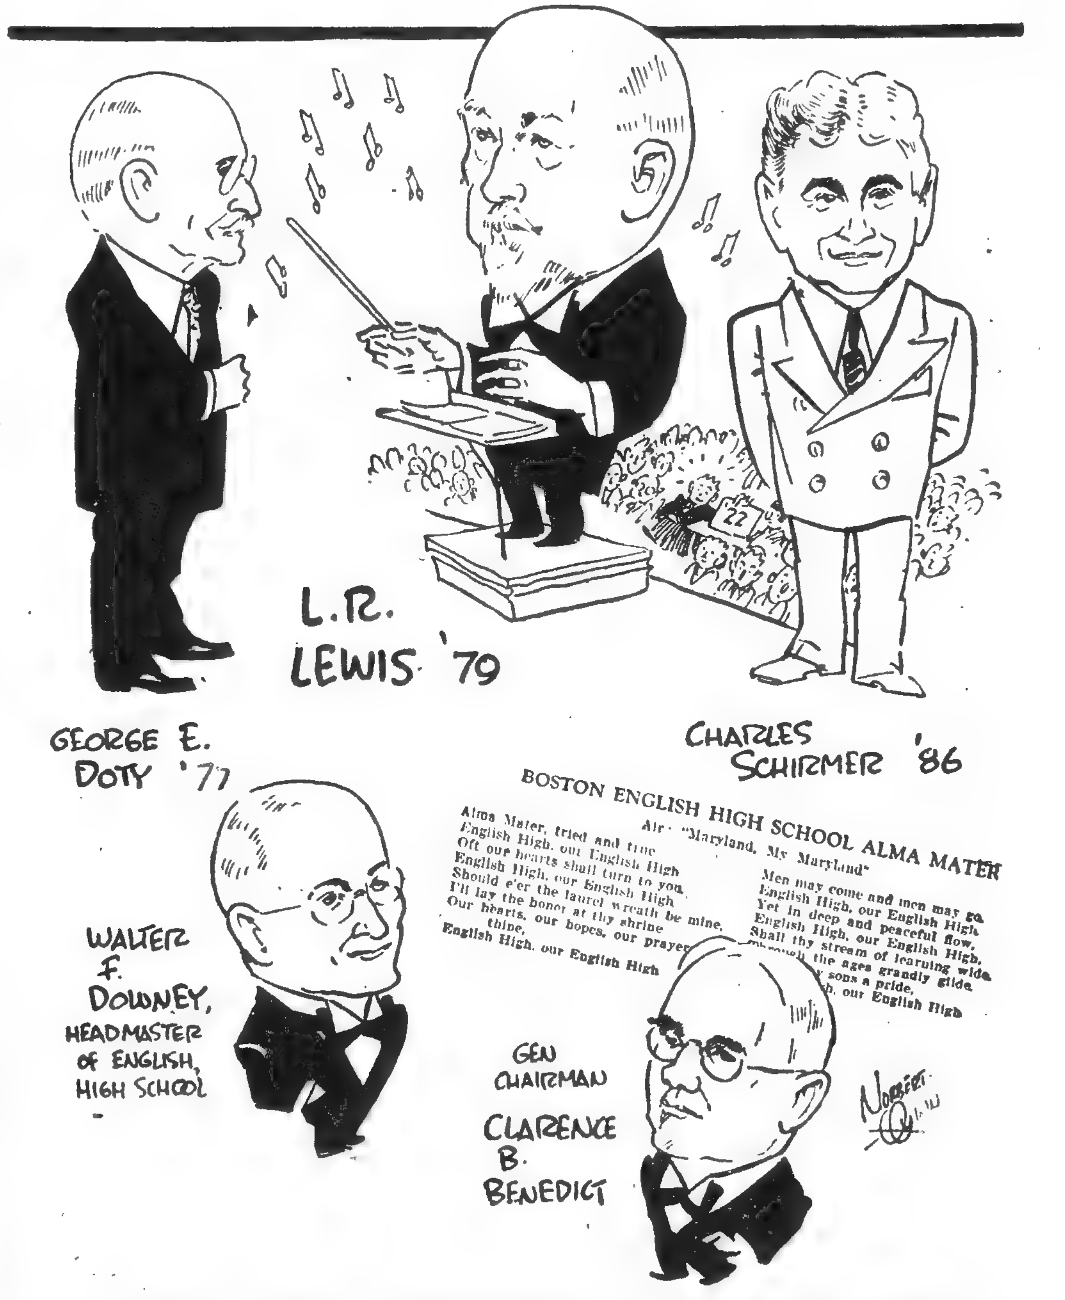
FRIDAY—CHILDREN'S NIGHT

"Cruiser Harvard"...............Strube
Suite from "Carmen"...........Bizet
"Looking Glass Insects," from the Suite "Through the Looking Glass" Taylor
"William Tell," Overture........Rossini
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia...........Saint-Saens
Pianos: Jesus Maria Sanroma—Leo Litwin
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".Tchaikovsky
Cheyenne Indian War Dance.....Skilton
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite.....................Grof
"Strike Up the Band".........Gersh

THE BOSTON GLOBE—T

E. H. S. GRADS' NIGHT AT POPS

Prof Lewis of Tufts Makes a Hit Directing His Own Composition, "Intercollegiate Inklings"



L. R. LEWIS '79
GEORGE E. DOTY '77
CHARLES SCHIRMER '86
BOSTON ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL ALMA MATER
Air: "Maryland, My Maryland"
Alma Mater, tried and true
English High, our English High
Oft our hearts shall turn to you,
English High, our English High
Should e'er the laurel wreath be mine,
I'll lay the honor at thy shrine
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers thine,
English High, our English High
Men may come and men may go,
English High, our English High
Yet in deep and peaceful flow,
English High, our English High,
Shall thy stream of learning wide
Through the ages grandly glide, sons a pride,
our English High
WALTER F. DOWNEY, HEADMASTER OF ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL
GEN CHAIRMAN CLARENCE B. BENEDICT
NORBERT

NOTABLE FIGURES AT ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL ALUMNI REUNION

Graduates from all parts of the country gathered last night in Symphony Hall to pay homage to Boston English High School at a Pop concert. The attendance jammed the floor.

Class representation ranged from '73 to the current year. Among the largest class delegations were those of '22, headed by its secretary, Lou Roazen, and '29, headed by its president, Howard S. Rains.

The oldest known alumnus present was John B. Babcock, '73.

The class of '77 was represented by George E. Doty, secretary; "Race" Smith and George W. Evans.

The outstanding musical treat was a selection made up of college airs, "Intercollegiate Inklings," by Prof Leo R. Lewis of Tufts College, a member of the class of '79. The composer himself directed it and was loudly applauded.

The committee, headed ex-officio by Maj Paul Kirk, '22, consisted of Clarence R. Benedict, '92, chairman; Harold Bronstein, '06; Ralph W. Manard, '94; Charles G. Schirmer, '86; W. Gordon Swan, '24; John A. Granara, '22; Leo Shapiro and Headmaster Walter F. Downey.

The officers of the association: Paul G. Kirk, '22, president; Walter F. Downey, vice president; Lindsley B. Schell, '06, secretary, and Howard Norton, '91, treasurer; Joseph McK. Driscoll, '13; Samuel Robinson, '98; Clarence B. Benedict, '92, and Lindsey Hooper, '00, directors.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUN 7 - 1934

Gossip of the Town

RARE STRIP OF FILM: The hitherto undisclosed mystery of a film showing Dr. Serge Koussevitsky in dynamic action, front-to, before his orchestra, is herewith brought to light. For among others, it surprised no one quite as much as Dr. Koussevitsky himself.

And it's a fascinating, if silent strip of film.

The Boston Symphony maestro is shown in exhorting gestures of appeal, his baton pleading at one point as if his heart would break, commanding in another, imperiously, regally, his face showing all the mobile expressions now so familiar to his men and his audiences.

The secret is simply that a friend of the maestro concealed himself with a small moving picture camera in the organ loft and from an aperture facing the conductor, shot the film. All done during the last rehearsal shortly before Dr. Koussevitsky left for Europe.

Pop Concerts Go Into Eighth Week

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall are in the last weeks of their 49th season. Arthur Fiedler offers programmes of interest for the coming eighth week which begins Monday with a repetition of the request programme.

Features will be the appearance of Jacobus Langendoen as soloist on Tuesday in Tchaikovsky's Rococo Variations for 'cello, and the first performance of Theodore Cella's Symphonic sketch, "The Lido." On Wednesday, the conductor proposes an all-Russian programme with Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6, filling the middle section. On Thursday, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who is shortly to sail for a season in Porto Rico will be heard in the second pianoforte concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. On the same programme, Mr. Fiedler will pay respects to the memory of Gustav Holst, who died last month, playing his St. Paul's Suite for strings.

Tonight's programme follows:

Wedding March from "Feramors" Rubinstein
Overture to "Raymond".......Thomas
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin" ....Drigo
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" ....Glivee
"Nutcracker Suite"........Tchaikovsky
Largo from "Xerxes"...........Handel
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Excerpts from "Melody".......Romberg
"Voices of Spring," waltz.......Strauss
American fantasy..............Herbert

Ovation Given Composers at Pops

Am. Jun 14

By MOSES SMITH

A Pops program of unusually musical, as well as occasional, interest was led by Arthur Fiedler at Symphony Hall last night. The fact that the hall was completely sold out indicates that there is an extensive and persistent public here for symphonic music during the summer.

Two unfamiliar works caused more than a flutter of excitement. One was "Tall City," a symphonic suite by Hans Spialek, played for the first time in Boston. The other was two movements ("Romance" and "Witches Dance") from F. S. Converse's "Scarecrow Sketches," first played, I believe, about a dozen years ago at Jordan Hall in connection with a movie for which the music was written.

Both compositions were heartily applauded by the audience, and both composers were on hand to receive personally the testimonial. Mr. Converse's well-made music stands on its own feet, without the assistance of the movie. Mr. Spialeck's suite is an attempt at a musical characterization of aspects of a typical large, modern city, with the intention, apparently, to personify the city as well as the people in the city. Neither this idea nor the thematic material of the score is strikingly original. The music is, however, not intended to be over-serious, and the treatment is, on the whole, skillful and arresting. It is almost needless to say that the orchestral dress is colorful and effective; for nowadays composers who can score aptly are as common as pianists with virtuoso technique.

Verona Durick proved to be an able pianist in the solo part of the first movement of the F-sharp minor Rachmaninoff piano concerto. Her performance was most musical and technically secure. One ingredient which might have been used in fuller measure, though, was sonority.

Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra fared well in a taxing program which included, in addition to the above, such numbers as Rossini's overture, "Barber of Seville," the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," the latter played by the entire violin section with extraordinary clarity!

NEW YORK MIRROR

JUN 14 1934

MUSIC

By Julian Seaman

"Popular" Tunes.

In the tide of my Summer wanderings, I came upon a first experience the other night, a "popular" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, propelled by Mr. Arthur Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston. This hallowed series long has lured the Summer folk thereabouts to an evening of airy diversion. One sits at tables, imbibes lightly as the fancy moves, the while Mr. Fiedler conducts and the Boston orchestra, boasting that string tone of impeccable unity for which it is famous, dispenses melody, devised to beguile but not to weigh the public ear. It is wholly delightful.

My experience the other night also afforded me an opportunity to linger again, and more attentively, upon the bright pictures engendered by Mr. Deems Taylor in his faantasia, "Circus Day," which Mr. Fiedler exhibited for the first time in Boston. It has been displayed in New York, in its present form of revised orchestration, by Mr. Ernest Schelling and the Philharmonic and at another concert during the season here. Mr. Taylor wrote it originally for Mr. Paul Whiteman's orchestra in 1925.

Mr. Taylor has been clever, compact and, of course, rather obviously pictorial in his deliniation of the circus scene. His contrapuntal complexities are amazing, his subtle appreciation of tonal voices, his adroit use of harmonic devices, denote an unquestioned mastery of the orchestra. It seemed to me, though, that his orchestration has been entirely too lavish. His allusions to the unmistakable mannerisms of Richard Strauss, in the finale, were somewhat discouraging.

Mr. Fiedler had made one cut. He had omitted the second episode, called "The Big Top" and depicting the barkers, the "sights, sounds, smells, excitement, bliss," of the main show. It was a cut of no great moment—a minute and 10 seconds of actual time—and entirely commendable.

As a conductor, Mr. Fielder impressed me as authoritative and competent, exercising a fine virility and discipline in his ministrations. Occasionally, in the stress of fortissimo, his beat is wont to waiver and lose force, and his cues of entry might be more definite at times. But I suspect that Mr. Fiedler was not at the top of his form, as he confessed to a heavy cold and a high temperature. I should like to see and hear him under more favorable circumstances.

MUSIC

Jun 14

POPS CONCERT

Yesterday evening in Symphony Hall a concert in the current series of the Pops, under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, was given in honor of the New England Conservatory of Music. In order to celebrate this occasion a first performance in Boston of "Tall City," symphonic suite by Hans Spialek, was given. Also Frederick Converse's "Scarecrow Sketches" was performed. The composer of the latter work was in the audience and acknowledged the applause.

It should be declared, to begin with, that the program was somewhat unfair to Mr. Converse. It accorded Mr. Spialek's suite a page of descriptive program notes, but it forebore to mention the genesis of "Scarecrow Sketches." As a matter of fact this music was composed to a film of nearly similar title. Now it will at once be perceived that incidental or descriptive music to a film (it was produced about 1924) is an entirely different breed of cat to an announced symphonic suite. Yet the audience was indirectly besought to regard Mr. Converse's work arbitrarily and to listen to Mr. Spialek's in the holy light of a first performance of a major symphonic work.

Mr. Spialek has bolstered his music up with some minute program notes. Mr. Converse is graciously permitted to stand on his own legs, although his own music is avowedly of a particular nature to serve a particular purpose. But it may at once be stated that Mr. Converse's music stands on much sturdier legs, even as presented, than does Mr. Spialek's suite. The "Tall City," we are told, is typical of any city in the United States, provided, of course, that it has tall buildings. Then we are posed the question, in various forms, of how, even in the vastest metropolis, there are human beings dreaming of home in Mr. Sinclair Lewis's Banjo Crossings. We are asked to think of skyscrapers sneering at shanties conveniently squeezed between; of moonlight shimmering over the whole; of a holiday spirit invading the usual sovereignty of work.

Well, it is possible to enjoy Mr. Spialek's sentimentalities, provided one does not pay too much musical attention to them. But it is equally possible to regard it as the spirit of Winnie the Pooh in musical reincarnation summing up the American city of Mr. Spialek's imagination. It should be needless to add that this suite and the other music on the program was presented with discriminating care by Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra.—A. W. W.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES

SHUBERT—"Iolanthe," by Gilbert and Sullivan, with Frank Moulan, Vivian Hart, Vera Ross, Allen Waterous; 8:30 P. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

The "Pops"

Hans Spialek's tonal depiction of sights in New York, the suite "Tall City," had a first Boston performance at the "Pops" last evening. The composer, who was present to hear his piece and afterward acknowledged applause, has specifically stated what phenomena inspired the five movements of "Tall City," adding adroitly that the work might refer to "any larger city in the United States."

He commands the resources of writing well for large modern orchestras, and apparently belongs neither to that group of adventurous moderns to whom instrumental confusion is a primary ideal, nor to the well-intended though esthetically barren group of conservatives who shudder uncomfortably at any dissonance exploited after 1900. What Mr Spialek has expressed in "Tall City"—the musical substance itself—is of less interest than the manner in which he has uttered his impressions. His music is at any rate arresting and pleasant, a vigorous rhapsodic comment upon New York as he sees it.

Mr Fiedler deserves commendation for including upon the program the Romance and Witches' Dance of Frederick S. Converse's fanciful "Scarecrow Sketches," music unusual in style and flavor, though couched in orchestration originally derived from European sources. There are fewer men than might at first be supposed who can indulge in gentle whimsy and genial humor without appearing a bit self-conscious. Mr Converse is one of those who can. He, too, arose from his seat in response to repeated handclapping.

Miss Verona Durick, a young pianist, was heard in the first movement of the first Rachmaninoff Concerto, in F-sharp minor. Her playing varied between distinct excellence in the purling passage-work that requires agile fingers and deft touch, to unevenly articulated scale fragments and arpeggii, where occasional wrong notes were perceptible. She was cordially received. The remainder of the program brought together favorite pieces of "Pops'" audiences, including a heavy-handed reading of the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and spirited performance—as an encore—of Vincent Youmans' irresistible "Carioca."

C. W. D.

HANFSTAENGL BAN PLEA

'TALL CITY' HAS POP PREMIERE

Conservatory Night With Composer Present

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Pop concert of last evening was one of the more eventful of the season. Officially it was the night of the New England Conservatory, though the programme stated that a certain number of tables had been taken by the Field and Forest Club. Of this latter fact Mr. Fiedler in making his programme did not take the obvious advantage. There was no "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" on his list, no hunting songs. On the other hand the Conservatory was duly represented; first, by the performance of two numbers from the fertile hand of its dean, Frederick S. Converse; and second, by the appearance as a soloist of one of its students, Veronica Durick, who played the first movement of Rachmaninoff's First Concerto for the pianoforte in F-sharp minor.

For the first time in Boston last evening's concert also offered a suite, "Tall City," by Hans Spialek, now a resident of New York. First performed at the inauguration week of the National Broadcasting Company and subsequently heard in London and in Rochester, N. Y., "Tall City" is made up of five movements, entitled respectively "General View," "The Avenue," "A Shanty Between Two Skyscrapers," "Moon Over the City" and "Holiday." Upon this programme the suite leans heavily. Mr. Spialek's music is competent but derivative. There is in it modified Stravinsky, discreet jazz and some frank sentiment. The fourth division is reminiscent of Puccini. The city in question seems here not a modern metropolis, but the Rome of Floria Tosca. Mr. Spialek had come over from New York to attend this Boston premiere and when Mr. Fiedler disclosed him to the audience he was heartily applauded. Modestly he signified that it was the conductor and the orchestra that deserved the plaudits.

From Mr. Converse there came last evening a Romance and Witches' Dance from his music for the film "Puritan Passions" based on Percy Mackaye's "The Scarecrow." The music, written with Mr. Converse's usual warmth and skill, bears well its transference to the concert hall. Naturally it does not greatly aspire, but it indubitably pleases.

Miss Durick played the movement from Rachmaninoff's early and not too distinguished concerto with the appropriate rhythmic energy and lyric fervor. It is not a piece of which any pianist can make a great deal. For her as for the two composers of the evening there was liberal applause.

SPOTS IN TOWN!

Pops Season Successful

By MOSES SMITH

THE POPS concerts, under Arthur Fiedler, go their popular and prosperous way without visible disturbance. The vogue of Mr. Fiedler, in fact, seems to be on the rise, for by all prospects the present season will be the most successful in the history of the Pops.

The program for next week, consisting of an artful blend of popular favorites with selections from the symphonic repertoire, are typical in explaining the high favor of Fiedler. On Monday the "Request" program, which created such interest two weeks ago, will be repeated.

On Tuesday, Jacobus Langendoen will be the 'cello soloist in Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. Cella's symphonic sketch, "The Lido," will be played for the first time anywhere. Mendelssohn's melodious "Fingal's Cave" overture will be another symphonic item on the program.

Russian music will fill the concert of Wednesday, when the most important composition will be the entire "Pathetic" symphony of Tchaikovsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist on Thursday evening—but not in "Rhapsody in Blue!" With the Pops orchestra he will play Rachmaninoff's C minor concerto.

Party at the Pops For the Children

With Youngsters in Costume To Add to the Festivities Of the Evening

MORE ice cream than wine was served at tables in Symphony Hall last evening and the railings of both balconies were decorated with an unaccustomed fringe of cherubic chins. The occasion was Children's Night, with prizes for the most unusual costumes and an appealing program of gay or sonorous music.

Following the William Tell Overture, a rosy-winged butterfly fluttered across the stage, followed by small inhabitants of Spain, China, Russia, the Orient; cowboys, a courtly George Washington, a wooden soldier, stepping jerkily; Kate Greenaway girls, carrying little formal posies. Minnie and Mickey Mouse pranced past, and Felix the Cat; Alice, the Mad Hatter, Little Boy Blue, Huck Finn, a small bold pirate, who could scarcely walk, let alone swagger. There were Columbines and a Moon Maiden wrapped in cellophane.

As is usual in fancy dress affairs there was one character whose identity offered a wide field for speculation; a grave, stout child, who wore a gingham dress, with a red band on her hair. Was she intended to be Pocahontas or Carrie Nation? Did the hatchet symbolize George Washington or Lizzie Borden?

In tense excitement the participants in the costume parade sat through the Animals Carnival, of Saint-Sæns and the Ouverture Solennelle. Undoubtedly they envied their carefree companions in mufti who could enjoy to the full the delightful elephant trumpetings which Max Kunze achieved with his double-bass in the zo-ological fantasia, and the pealing of bells that heralded the entrance of the Grande Armee into Moscow.

Presently that Admirable Crichton of the occasion, Mr. Fiedler, reappeared with a Santa Claus armful of prizes which he distributed with such aplomb that even the parents of also-rans set up a hearty cheering.

The winners were selected, he explained according to the amount of applause they received as they crossed the platform. First prize for girls, a fine edition of Through the Looking Glass, went to Miss Irene Raichman, daughter of Jacob Raichman, a member of the orchestra. She was the littlest of Pierrettes, in a fluff of blue and white tarleton; her flyaway golden hair crowned by a dashing, high, pointed cap.

Larry Parker, a realistic Huck Finn in every detail even to squirming worms in a pail, set down his fishing rod to receive first prize for boys, a baseball glove. The second prize for girls, a sewing basket, went to Miss Eleanor Doe of Watertown, the flame-winged butterfly. Richard Hayes, located with some difficulty under a pirate's sombrero, was given the second prize for boys, a full-rigged ship which completely obscured him from the audience.

Consolation prizes of boxes of candy were awarded to Harrison Parker and Connie White, as Hans and Gretel Brinker, complete with skates; and the Minnie and Mickey Mouse of Jean Valdwell and Constance Linberg.

Not even the exciting strains of the Cheyenne Indian War Dance, by Skilton which opened the final section of the program could rouse the infant pirate, who was carried off by an usher, too weary even to think of running up the skull and crossbones over his captured prize.

M. E. P.

Music M

Dram

MUSIC

Globe Jun 17

Several Features at the "Pop" Concerts This Week

A repetition of the Request Program selected by popular vote will open the eighth week of Symphony Hall "Pop" concerts at 8:30 tomorrow evening.

Subsequent features of the week will be appearance of Jacobus Langendoen as soloist on Tuesday in Tchaikovsky's rococo variations for cello and the first performance of Theodore Cella's symphonic sketch, "The Lido." On Wednesday the conductor proposes an all-Russian program, with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony filling the middle section.

Thursday Jesus Maria Sanroma will be heard in the Second Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. On the same program Mr Fiedler will pay respect to the memory of Gustav Holst, who died last month, playing his "St Paul's Suite for Strings."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 17 1934

Review of Closing Season Recalls Richly Varied Musical Program

THE past season has been remarkable for the large number of very fine musical offerings and the many truly great artists who have come here as soloists or with musical associates.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought concerts which probably could not be surpassed the world over. In the prime of its artistic powers, Dr. Koussevitzky has brought unparalleled programs with enough modernistic musical thought to whet the appetites of those of us who would know more of advanced methods of expression in the new language. Conspicuous in his offerings was the appearance of Concertmaster Richard Burgin in the Sibelius Concerto. In addition to gratifying the wishes of the many who would see a soloist more often with this orchestra Mr. Burgin proved abundantly that he is an artist of the very highest rank and that no task is too difficult for him.

His appearance with our University Glee Club insured and strengthened this impression. At that time he played Charles Martin Loeffler's "Partita," giving further evidence of his powers as well as opportunity to hear a superb contemporaneous concert piece in highly advanced musical genre. The concert directed by Sir Henry Wood not only brought to us a genial and able conductor from across the seas but gave a superb reading of Elgar's "Enigma Variations." Sid Edward Elgar died a month later.

Community Concerts

…residency of Mrs. John

Last Weeks of the Pops, Bright Features Prevail

THE POPS now begin the last week of their 49th season in Symphony Hall. Features will be the appearance of Jacobus Langendoen as soloist on Tuesday in Tchaikovsky's Rococo Variations for 'Cello, and the first performance of Theodore Cella's Symphonic Sketch, "The Lido".

On Wednesday, the conductor proposes an all-Russian program with Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6 filling the middle section. On Thursday, Jesus Maria Sanroma will be heard in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. On the same program, Mr. Fiedler will pay respects to the memory of Gustav Holst who died last month, playing his St. Paul's Suite for Strings.

Program follows: Adv. June 17

Victor Herbert Favorites ……………
……………Arranged by San Song of India ……Rimsky-Kor
"Up the Strete," March…..

WEDNESDAY

Russian Program

Overture to "Russlan an
……………
"The Prince and the "Scheherazade" .
Marche Slave ..
Pathetic Symph
……….
Prelude in Dubinu

Last Week of Pops Offers Varied Programs

[illegible] 17

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall are in the last weeks of their 49th season. Arthur Fiedler offers programs of interest for the coming eighth week which begins tomorrow with a repetition of the request programs.

Features will be the appearance of Jacobus Langendoen as soloist on Tuesday in Tchaikovsky's Rococo Variations for 'cello, and the first performance of Theodore Cella's symphonic sketch, "The Lido." On Wednesday, the conductor proposes an all-Russian program with Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6 filling the middle section. On Thursday, Jesus Maria Sanroma, who is shortly to sail for a season in Porto Rico will be heard in the second pianoforte concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor. On the same program, Mr Fiedler will pay respects to the memory of Gustav Holst who died last month, playing his St. Paul's Suite for Strings.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 18

Request Program (Repeated)

"Pomp and Circumstance" ……….Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ……..Rossini
Largo ……………………Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ….Tchaikovsky
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz
Strauss
Bolero ……………………Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue …………Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Roberta," selection ……………Kern
"Carioca" ……………………Youmans
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn
Arranged by Kremser

Tuesday, June 19

March, "Schechenyi Indulo" ……Fahrbach
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ……Mendelssohn
Reve Angelique ……………Rubinstein
Suite, "Peter Gynt" ……………Grieg
"The Lido," symphonic sketch ……Cella
(First Performance)
Variation on a Rococo Theme..Tchaikovsky
Violoncello solo: Jacobus Langendoen
"The Ride of the Valkyries" ……Wagner
Victor Herbert favorites. Arranged by Sanford
Song of India …………Rimsky-Korsakov
"Up the Street," march …………Morse

Wednesday, June 20

RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla"..Glinka
"The Prince and the Princess," from
"Scheherazade" …….. Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ……………Tchaikovsky
Pathetic Symphony, No. 6 in B minor
Tchaikovsky
Prelude in C-sharp minor…..Rachmaninoff
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song
Arranged by Jacchia
Sailors' Dance, from "The Red Poppy" Gliere

Thursday, June 21

March, "Sambre et Meuse" ……Planquette
Overture to "Der Improvisator"….d'Albert
Love's Dream After the Ball ……Czibulka
"La Tosca," Fantasia …………Puccini
St. Paul's Suite for Strings….Gustav Holst
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, in C minor Rachmaninoff
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Roses from the South," Waltz….Strauss
"Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," from
"Roberta" ……………………Kern
First Hungarian Dance …………Brahms

Friday, June 22

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ……Berlioz
Overture to "Egmont" ………Beethoven
Caprice Viennois ……………Kreisler
Soviet Iron Foundry …………Mossolov
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem …..Liszt
Valse, "La plus que lente" ………Debussy
"Pomp and Circumstance" ………Elgar
"The Skaters," Waltz ………Waldteufel
"Silver Shadows," Tango ………Repper
"Wintergreen for President" …..Gershwin

Saturday, June 23

March, "Land of the Maple"….Laurendeau
Overture to "Mignon" …………Thomas
"Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"
Arranged for Strings by Alfred Pochon
"Cavalleria Rusticanna," Fantasia".Mascagni
Suite from "Carmen" ……………Bizet
Argonaise—Intermezzo (Act III)
Gypsy Dance
Ave Maria …………Schubert-Wilhelmj
Overture to "Tannhauser" ………Wagner
"New Moon," Selection …………Romberg
"Jealousy," Tango ……………Gade
"Strike Up the Band" …………Gershwin

THEATRE TO

With New Music to Add to the Pops

THE success of the Pops' Concerts this season may be attributed partly to the manner in which Mr. Fiedler's programs have steered a happy middle course between the transient tunes the day and music which the Symphony Orchestra is likely to play during the regular season. By this policy, the conductor provides a hearing for numerous pieces which otherwise would suffer undeserving neglect. Symphony orchestras will not play them because their tunefulness is too transparent. Smaller groups avoid them either because the instrumentation is too exacting or because a universal preoccupation with the latest jazz prevents time being spent on anything else.

At the same time, these pieces which may be said to occupy a peculiar twilight zone in the field of musical composition have in many cases the widest popular appeal. Nearly everyone responds to the melodies of Victor Herbert's light operas, although opportunities of hearing them played by an orchestra of good size and proper instrumental balance are not frequent. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, Rubinstein's "Reve Angelique" and Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture are other examples. Sometimes the radio remembers them, and the tunes are by no means unfamiliar in the various transcriptions which have been made of them; but they do not have many adequate "first hand" performances.

Cella's new Symphonic Sketch, "The Lido," played for the first time last evening readily gravitates toward this zone. It is more pretentious than the current dance tunes and show pieces; yet it scarcely aspires to the regular season symphonic program. In the Hollywood Bowl, at the Stadium concerts and at the Pops it has its proper place. It successfully conveys a glamorous tonal impression of the famous European resort for which it is named. In the opening division, strings and brasses are combined for mellifluous sonorities. In the middle portion, the adroit thematic development and the clever treatment of solo woodwind passages are more interesting than the melodic material itself. At one point there are some possibly deliberate Puccini reflections for spice. The energetic closing measures bring a stimulating and well-constructed climax. Mr. Cella's sketch was well-received by the audience.

In Mr. Fiedler's revival of Chaikovsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," the skilful and fine-toned playing of the 'cello part was more deserving of the enthusiastic applause which it received than the music itself, which exemplifies merely the composer's familiar command of orthodox orchestral device. Mr. Fiedler's conducting was admirably flexible and precise. If one were to name the special favorite of the audience, however, Vincent Youman's tempestuous "Carioca" would receive first mention; it was repeated upon demand.

N. M. J.

—It looks as though the blue eagle was going to be more so. [Detroit Free Press

---

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Program

Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla"
Glinka
"The Prince and the Princess," from
"Scheherazade" ….Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ……………Chaikovsky
Pathetic Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ……………………Chaikovsky
Prelude in C sharp minor..Rakhmaninov
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song.
Arranaged by Jacchia
Sailors' Dance, from "The Red Poppy" ……………………Glière

Conductor: A. Fiedler.

Symphonic Sketch Given First Performance at Pops

By MOSES SMITH Am Jun 20

The Pops program of last night was dignified by a first performance. The composer was Theodore Cella, who, still a relatively young man, played some years ago in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composition was a symphonic sketch called "The Lido."

Obviously the work was intended to suggest something of the atmosphere of the famous Mediterranean resort. Whether or not it did may have been decided differently by various members of the large audience. But the music is frankly melodious, not overserious, and of robust good spirits on the whole. It is also sentimental, leaning heavily on Puccini and occasionally on the Strauss of the tone-poems in the leap of the melodic outline and the style of orchestration. Conducted in what seemed a competent performance by the composer, the new composition was cordially received by last night's audience, and is likely to please subsequent Pops audiences.

Mr. Fiedler, conducting the balance of the program, had as his principal number the Tchaikovsky Variations on a Rococo Theme, rarely heard here nowadays, and last played at a Boston Symphony concert, I believe, in Karl Muck's day. In any event, the Tchaikovsky of the Variations is suave and, surprisingly, a stylist, but he has not the emotional depth of the Tchaikovsky of the symphonies and orchestral fantasias. But the Variations furnish a convenient "vehicle" for a solo 'cellist, who last night was Jacobus Langendoen of the Orchestra, and whose able performance under trying conditions of humidity was warmly applauded.

In unusual fettle Mr. Fiedler led vigorous and musical performances of other compositions, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave," and the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg. The last movement of the latter work was given an especialy exciting rendering.

Guests to Sing at the Pops

Am By MOSES SMITH Jun 23

A SORT OF BATTLE of music begins the Pops programs of next week, the old being set against the new. On Monday evening Mr. Fiedler will present a program of music by living composers. Jesus Maria Sanroma and George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" will together bid farewell to this season's Pops. Spialek's "Tall City," well received novelty, will be repeated.

"Old Timers' Night" on Tuesday will be featured by many a beery tune, as well as some of the sensational "classics" of the nineties. Appropriately, patrons are invited to "come and sing." "Instrumental selections" like the overture to "Poet and Peasant" and "The Lost Chord" will blend with the prevailing atmosphere.

A program of light music on Wednesday has as its symphonic numbers the finale of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Ravel's "Bolero." On Thursday there will be several Wagnerian excerpts, including the "Transformation" scene from "Parsifal."

* * *

REGINALD BOARDMAN, able Boston pianist, will play the solo part of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy. A novelty will be a symphonic selection, "Boreas and Mount Wildcat" by a young Boston composer, Alan Hovaness. Duka's engaging scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," lends variety to an excellent program.

The Arthur Wilson Singers will sing the sextet from "Lucia" on Friday night. The symphonic selections are tried and true—the "William Tell" overture, Casella's "Italia," and a movement from Respighi's "Pines of Rome." Ferde Grofe's "Mississippi" suite is the outstanding number of Saturday night's popular program.

Children at a recent Pops Concert in Symphony Hall. Left to right, Nancie Dunwoody of Swampscott, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kingsland Dunwoody, as a tambourine girl; Janice White of Lynn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert White, as a broom, and Betty Newell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clifford E. Newell of West Roxbury, as a Turkish lady.

CHILDREN'S POPS brought out a variety of striking costumes. This is Joan Kornfield, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Kornfield of Brookline. She symbolizes "Winter."

Last Week bu

Sanroma, Boardman Soloists; Special Programs

But two weeks remain of what has proven one of the most crowded seasons the Pops in Symphony hall have ever had. Arthur Fiedler has planned features of unusual interest for the coming week. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston's popular pianist, will bid good-by to the Pops this season when he plays Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at Monday's concert. Mr. Sanroma will sail for Pueto Rico on the 28th for a busy summer season in his native island.

Monday and Tuesday, delegated to the "Music of Today" and the "Music of Yesterday," respectively, will be a test as to whether the favorites of the "Gay Nineties" or the hits of our own 20th century have the larger public. An "Old Timers' night," Tuesday, the audience with printed texts will be invited to join the orchestra in the reincarnation of many song favorites of the old days.

MUSIC

Two Special Programs at the "Pops" This Week

But two weeks remain of what has proved one of the most crowded seasons the "Pops" in Symphony Hall have ever had. Arthur Fiedler has planned features of unusual interest for the coming week.

Monday and Tuesday delegated to the "Music of Today" and the "Music of Yesterday," respectively, will be a test as to whether the favorites of the "Gay '90s" or the hits of our own 20th century have the larger public. On "Old-Timers' Night," Tuesday, the audience will be given printed texts and will be invited to join the orchestra in many song favorites of the old days.

The program of living composers will be a farewell for the season to Jesus Maria Sanroma and the "Rhapsody in Blue," since the pianist is about to sail for Puerto Rico. Another notable pianist, Reginald Boardman, will be soloist on Thursday night, appearing with the orchestra in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy. Friday night there will be an Italian program, featuring the principal operatic composers, with the Arthur Wilson singers appearing in the sextet from "Lucia."

The programs of the week follow:

Monday, March, "On the Mall," Goldman; Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," Richard Strauss; Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve," de Talla; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; "Tall City," Symphonic Suite, Spialek; "Rhapsody in Blue," soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy," Gliere; "On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon," Suite, Grofe; "Carioca," Youmans.

Tuesday, March, "La Sorella," Borel-Clerc; Gilbert and Sullivan Favorites, Arr by Seredy; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Robin Hood," selection, De Koven; "The Lost Chord," trumpet solo, Georges Mager, Sullivan; Songs of the Old Days, "Waves of the Danube, waltz, Ivanovici; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn, Arr by Kremser; Old-Time Favorites.

Wednesday. March, "Favorite Regiment," Ertl; overture to "Zampa," Herold; invocation, Nagel; Egyptian ballet, Luigini; finale, "Italian" Symphony, Mendelssohn; Ave Maria Schubert-Wilhelmj; Bolero, Ravel; Emperor waltz, Strauss; Dance of the Mosquito, White; Eighth Slavonic Dance, in G Minor Dvorak.

Thursday. "Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; Boreas and Mt Wildcat, Hovaness; "Pagliacci," fantasia, Leoncavallo; Transformation scene from "Parsifal," Wagner; "The Sorceror's Apprentice," Scherzo," Dukas; Hungarian fantasy, for piano and orchestra, soloist Reginald Boardman, Liszt; Roberta, selection, Kern; Malaguena, from the Spanish suite, "Andalucia," Lecuona; march, "Wien bleibt Wien," Schrammel.

Friday. Triumphant march from "Aida," Verdi; "Madame Butterfly," fantasia, Puccini; "The Hen," scherzo, Bolzoni; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Moto Perpetuo, the solo part played by the entire violin section, Paganini; Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," the Arthur Wilson Singers, with orchestra, Donizetti; Italiak Rhapsody, Casella; "Il Bacio," waltz, Arditi; Serenade, Toselli; "Ballet of the Hours," finale, Ponchielli.

Saturday, March, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa; "Carnival in Paris," rhapsody, Svandsen; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Peer Gynt" suite, Grieg; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; Largo from "Xerxes," Handel; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Mississippi Suite, Grofe; "To a Wild Rose," MacDowell; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Alice and Her Visit To "Opera-Land"

Her Strange Adventures and Discoveries as a Critic Guides Her

ALICE looked around her and murmured, "Well, I suppose I have to eat something." So she ate something. She did not know what it was, but it was long and soft and white, and came in strings and wallowed in sauce which tasted like a compound of tomato juice and roast beef gravy.

Almost as soon as Alice had swallowed it [writes W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun] she began to hear strange sounds—sort of tum-tiddi-um-tum, tum-tiddi-um-tum sounds. And the next thing she knew she was in a strange place with people rushing one way and another and all of them humming music softly, but very anxiously. She was greatly perplexed and finally mustered up enough courage to accost a man who was leaning against a pasteboard wall with apparentlv no other purpose in the world but to lean.

"Please, sir," she said, "Can you tell me what this place is?"

"No," he answered. "If any one in the world could tell you, I could."

"Who are you, please?" asked Alice.

"I am a music critic. Don't ask me what a music critic is, because there are five thousand answers and none of them right."

"And you can't tell me what place this is?"

"It is called an opera house, but that means nothing at all. All these people you see running about humming are singers trying to find out whether they have voices to sing with. The lady over there with the large arms and the fuzzy hair is a sporano."

"Please, sir, what is a sporano?"

"Do you mean to tell me that you don't know that? Listen, it goes this way:

There was a young girl from Murano
Who could not learn playing piano.
"Clear out," cried her teacher,
"You go be a screecher."
And now she's a regular sporano.

Just at that moment a short, thick man with a wide mouth came up to them and said in a kind of jellified tone, "Don't pay any attention to anything this man says to you. He does not know anything in the world. He does not even know that I am the greatest living tenor. I will sing for you just to make him furious."

Thereupon the greatest living tenor led Alice (wondering if one could be a greatest dead tenor) into a corner and sang these words:

Andante, amante, bacchante,
Fiasco di vino chianti,
Amore, fiori, fulgore,
E tutto, e tutto il core;
O basta il canto, oho!

"Well," said Alice slowly, "it sounds like nonsense to me."

"It is nonsense," replied the greatest living tenor, "but it does not sound like nonsense when I sing it. Nothing does. My salary does not permit anything I do or say or sing to be regarded as nonsense."

"That man," asserted Alice, pointing at the music critic, "says this is called an opera house, but he cannot tell me what an opera house is."

"He wouldn't know," sneered the tenor. "He has been sitting in this place night after night for thirty years and he does not know yet what it is or what an opera is."

"I don't know what an opera is, either," declared Alice. "Will you tell me?"

"Troppo facile," answered the tenor; "an opera is a sacred show in which I have the principal part and sing all the most important airs, except when I have to rest a few minutes, and then they allow that awkward soprano over there to disturb the audience with her catersqualings."

"What was that you called her—a soprano?"

"That is what I called her. I am nothing if not polite."

"That man," said Alice, pointing again at the critic, "called her a regular sporano."

"A what? A sporano? That is the perfect name for her; she is always mixed up. Critic, come hither. Let me embrace you. At last you have shown signs of musical understanding."

"But," lamented Alice, "I understand nothing. Oh, well, I suppose I must eat something again."

Thereupon she nibbled a piece from a painted apple on a painted apple tree.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

It was, perhaps, a little unfortunate that Mr. Fiedler should have had so warm an evening during which to introduce so specialized a composition as "A Columnist Suite" at the Pop concerts. Music of this sort, which is purely topical in interest and needs a pretty specialized audience to appreciate it, requires a closeness of attention—not to mention an extensive knowledge of the subject—if it is to portray in musical fashion a group of the leading columnists of the day: Walter Winchell, Mike Porter (The Aircaster), Mark Hellinger and O. O. McIntyre, but to those unfamiliar with the style and subject matter employed by the four the music must have seemed without much meaning. Even for those conversant with the subject, it was not always easy to recognize matter and manner of writing translated into musical terms.

For Winchell the composers conceived a staccato motif, now puckish, now slightly sentimental, and now and again a little sour, as Mr. Winchell is apt to be. The program suggested that we find the columnist's favorite topic of conversation, a Blessed Event, in the composition, but this was not within our powers. Somewhat more successful was the crisp "Tempo di Aircaster," which suggested by its variety of tones and rhythm the interests of Mike Porter. Better still were the long drawn out wails symbolizing "Tempo di Mark Hellinger," somewhat caustically described as a Sob Brother. Judging by the music he must feel very sad about life in general, albeit he still manages to keep his tongue in his cheek. Gaily contrasting, the "Tempo di O. O. McIntyre" pursued every possible angle that might attract the attention of a columnist, from the latest theatre gossip to some spicy historiettes of the not very distant past. Mr. Zeikel played the solo violin portion of the piece and received generous applause from the audience at the conclusion.

The most ambitious piece of the program was Franck's beautiful Symphony in D minor, which was performed with feeling and spirit, despite a certain raggedness here and there, and met with hearty enthusiasm. Ravel's "Bolero," always a favorite Pops feature matched in its warmth the heat of the evening. Selections by Berlioz, Debussy, Porter and Saint-Saens completed the program.

E. L. H.

Gale of Belmont (right).

Children at a recent Pops Concert in Symphony Hall. Left to right, Nancie Dunwoody of Swampscott, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kingsland Dunwoody, as a tambourine girl; Janice White of Lynn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert White, as a broom, and Betty Newell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clifford E. Newell of West Roxbury, as a Turkish lady.

Last Week bu

Sanroma, Boardman Soloists; Special Programs

But two weeks remain of what has proven one of the most crowded seasons the Pops in Symphony hall have ever had. Arthur Fiedler has planned features of unusual interest for the coming week. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston's popular pianist, will bid good-by to the Pops this season when he plays Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at Monday's concert. Mr. Sanroma will sail for Pueto Rico on the 28th for a busy summer season in his native island.

Monday and Tuesday, delegated to the "Music of Today" and the "Music of Yesterday," respectively, will be a test as to whether the favorites of the "Gay Nineties" or the hits of our own 20th century have the larger public. An "Old Timers' night," Tuesday, the audience with printed texts will be invited to join the orchestra in the reincarnation of many song favorites of the old days.

MUSIC

Two Special Programs at the "Pops" This Week

But two weeks remain of what has proved one of the most crowded seasons the "Pops" in Symphony Hall have ever had. Arthur Fiedler has planned features of unsual interest for the coming week.

Monday and Tuesday delegated to the "Music of Today" and the "Music of Yesterday," respectively, will be a test as to whether the favorites of the "Gay '90s" or the hits of our own 20th century have the larger public. On "Old-Timers' Night," Tuesday, the audience will be given printed texts and will be invited to join the orchestra in many song favorites of the old days.

The program of living composers will be a farewell for the season to Jesus Maria Sanroma and the "Rhapsody in Blue," since the pianist is about to sail for Puerto Rico. Another notable pianist, Reginald Boardman, will be soloist on Thursday night, appearing with the orchestra in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy. Friday night there will be an Italian program, featuring the principal operatic composers, with the Arthur Wilson singers appearing in the sextet from "Lucia."

The programs of the week follow:

Monday. March. "On the Mall," Goldman; Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," Richard Strauss; Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve," de Talla; Finlandia, Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; "Tall City," Symphonic Suite, Spialek; "Rhapsody in Blue," soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy," Gliere; "On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon," Suite, Grofe; "Carioca," Youmans.

Tuesday. March, "La Sorella," Borel-Clerc; Gilbert and Sullivan Favorites, Arr by Seredy; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Robin Hood," selection, De Koven; "The Lost Chord," trumpet solo, Georges Mager, Sullivan; Songs of the Old Days, "Waves of the Danube, waltz, Ivanovici; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn, Arr by Kremser; Old-Time Favorites.

Wednesday. March, "Favorite Regiment," Ertl; overture to "Zampa," Herold; invocation, Nagel; Egyptian ballet, Luigini; finale, "Italian" Symphony, Mendelssohn; Ave Maria Schubert-Wilhelmj; Bolero, Ravel; Emperor waltz, Strauss; Dance of the Mosquito, White; Eighth Slavonic Dance, in G Minor Dvorak.

Thursday. "Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; Boreas and Mt Wildcat, Hovaness; "Pagliacci," fantasia, Leoncavallo; Transformation scene from "Parsifal," Wagner; "The Sorceror's Apprentice," Scherzo," Dukas; Hungarian fantasy, for piano and orchestra, soloist. Reginald Boardman, Liszt; Roberta, selection, Kern; Malaguena, from the Spanish suite, "Andalucia," Lecuona; march, "Wien bleibt Wien," Schrammel.

Friday. Triumphant march from "Aida," Verdi; "Madame Butterfly," fantasia, Puccini; "The Hen," scherzo, Bolzoni; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Moto Perpetuo, the solo part played by the entire violin section, Paganini; Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," the Arthur Wilson Singers, with orchestra, Donizetti; Italiak Rhapsody, Casella; "Il Bacio," waltz, Arditi; Serenade, Toselli; "Ballet of the Hours," finale, Ponchielli.

Saturday. March. "Semper Fidelis," Sousa; "Carnival in Paris," rhapsody, Svandsen; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Peer Gynt" suite, Grieg; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; Largo from "Xerxes," Handel; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Mississippi Suite, Grofe; "To a Wild Rose," MacDowell; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

CHILDREN'S POPS brought out a variety of striking costumes. This is Joan Kornfield, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Kornfield of Brookline. She symbolizes "Winter."

Alice and Her Visit To "Opera-Land"

Her Strange Adventures and Discoveries as a Critic Guides Her

ALICE looked around her and murmured, "Well, I suppose I have to eat something." So she ate something. She did not know what it was, but it was long and soft and white, and came in strings and wallowed in sauce which tasted like a compound of tomato juice and roast beef gravy.

Almost as soon as Alice had swallowed it [writes W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun] she began to hear strange sounds—sort of tum-tiddi-um-tum, tum-tiddi-um-tum sounds. And the next thing she knew she was in a strange place with people rushing one way and another and all of them humming music softly, but very anxiously. She was greatly perplexed and finally mustered up enough courage to accost a man who was leaning against a pasteboard wall with apparently no other purpose in the world but to lean.

"Please, sir," she said, "Can you tell me what this place is?"

"No," he answered. "If any one in the world could tell you, I could."

"Who are you, please?" asked Alice.

"I am a music critic. Don't ask me what a music critic is, because there are five thousand answers and none of them right."

"And you can't tell me what place this is?"

"It is called an opera house, but that means nothing at all. All these people you see running about humming are singers trying to find out whether they have voices to sing with. The lady over there with the large arms and the fuzzy hair is a sporano."

"Please, sir, what is a sporano?"

"Do you mean to tell me that you don't know that? Listen, it goes this way:

There was a young girl from Murano
Who could not learn playing piano.
"Clear out," cried her teacher,
"You go be a screecher."
And now she's a regular sporano.

Just at that moment a short, thick man with a wide mouth came up to them and said in a kind of jellified tone, "Don't pay any attention to anything this man says to you. He does not know anything in the world. He does not even know that I am the greatest living tenor. I will sing for you just to make him furious."

Thereupon the greatest living tenor led Alice (wondering if one could be a greatest dead tenor) into a corner and sang these words:

Andante, amante, bacchante,
Fiasco di vino chianti,
Amore, fiori, fulgore,
E tutto, e tutto il core;
O basta il canto, oho!

"Well," said Alice slowly, "it sounds like nonsense to me."

"It is nonsense," replied the greatest living tenor, "but it does not sound like nonsense when I sing it. Nothing does. My salary does not permit anything I do or say or sing to be regarded as nonsense."

"That man," asserted Alice, pointing at the music critic, "says this is called an opera house, but he cannot tell me what an opera house is."

"He wouldn't know," sneered the tenor. "He has been sitting in this place night after night for thirty years and he does not know yet what it is or what an opera is."

"I don't know what an opera is, either," declared Alice. "Will you tell me?"

"Troppo facile," answered the tenor; "an opera is a sacred show in which I have the principal part and sing all the most important airs, except when I have to rest a few minutes, and then they allow that awkward soprano over there to disturb the audience with her catersqualings."

"What was that you called her—a soprano?"

"That is what I called her. I am nothing if not polite."

"That man," said Alice, pointing again at the critic, "called her a regular sporano."

"A what? A sporano? That is the perfect name for her; she is always mixed up. Critic, come hither. Let me embrace you. At last you have shown signs of musical understanding."

"But," lamented Alice, "I understand nothing. Oh, well, I suppose I must eat something again."

Thereupon she nibbled a piece from a painted apple on a painted apple tree.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

It was, perhaps, a little unfortunate that Mr. Fiedler should have had so warm an evening during which to introduce so specialized a composition as "A Columnist Suite" at the Pop concerts. Music of this sort, which is purely topical in interest and needs a pretty specialized audience to appreciate it, requires a closeness of attention—not to mention an extensive knowledge of the subject—if it is to portray in musical fashion a group of the leading columnists of the day: Walter Winchell, Mike Porter (The Aircaster), Mark Hellinger and O. O. McIntyre, but to those unfamiliar with the style and subject matter employed by the four the music must have seemed without much meaning. Even for those conversant with the subject, it was not always easy to recognize matter and manner of writing translated into musical terms.

For Winchell the composers conceived a staccato motif, now puckish, now slightly sentimental, and now and again a little sour, as Mr. Winchell is apt to be. The program suggested that we find the columnist's favorite topic of conversation, a Blessed Event, in the composition, but this was not within our powers. Somewhat more successful was the crisp "Tempo di Aircaster," which suggested by its variety of tones and rhythm the interests of Mike Porter. Better still were the long drawn out wails symbolizing "Tempo di Mark Hellinger," somewhat caustically described as a Sob Brother. Judging by the music he must feel very sad about life in general, albeit he still manages to keep his tongue in his cheek. Gaily contrasting, the "Tempo di O. O. McIntyre" pursued every possible angle that might attract the attention of a columnist, from the latest theatre gossip to some spicy historiettes of the not very distant past. Mr. Zeikel played the solo violin portion of the piece and received generous applause from the audience at the conclusion.

The most ambitious piece of the program was Franck's beautiful Symphony in D minor, which was performed with feeling and spirit, despite a certain raggedness here and there, and met with hearty enthusiasm. Ravel's "Bolero," always a favorite Pops feature matched in its warmth the heat of the evening. Selections by Berlioz, Debussy, Porter and Saint-Saens completed the program.

E. L. H.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Herald June 3

Arthur Fiedler Pegs His Score to 250 as Leader of Pops—He's Still Going Strong Creator of Famous Esplanade Concerts Hopes His Musicians Will Again Assemble on the Charles

By Dwight Shepler

When Arthur Fiedler stands before his conductor's desk on Tuesday night in Symphony hall, he will be leading his 250th concert of the time-honored and most excellent Pops. Then in a few weeks, on the banks of the Charles, he hopes to open the sixth season of the Esplanade concerts, his own brain child, and a musical event that is unique to Boston.

Spring in Boston holds forth nothing more satisfying than an evening at the Pops. The festive and informal atmosphere of the tradition-steeped hall, the excellent music that ranges from Mozart to Gershwin's Wintergreen, combine to dispel the cobwebs, still frazzled nerves, and make the next day go better. All this for a quarter, if you are broke, and energetic enough to grab a rush seat; or for the top price of a collar if you are a great bloated plutocrat with a penchant for a table to lean your elbow on and a cooling drink to soothe your interior.

The foregoing remarks may lead you to think that I am a well-subsidized press agent for Symphony hall, but the fact is that the Pops have been having their most successful season to date, and could get along perfectly well without any such blandishments. Paragraph 2 is all the result of evenings spent listening to Mr. Fiedler's orchestra.

HERITAGE

It was extremely interesting to interview the man whose restrained gesticulations and black coat tails have been familiar parts of life in Boston, and to talk to him in his native haunts of Symphony hall and his apartment on the Charles. I first tried to draw Mr. Fiedler in the library at the hall, as he was arranging future programs. The sketch was bad, but I went to the Pops that night, and did a much better one the next day.

Mr. Fiedler is a very co-operative person to interview. As he ate noodle soup with extra long noodles in his Memorial Drive apartment, he answered questions willingly and fully. I got him to go right back to the beginning, and decided that the things that he has done during his career have had a lot to do with the importance of music in our Boston scheme.

Mr. Fiedler is 39 years old, and was born here in Boston of Austrian parents. His father was for 25 years second violinist in the Boston Symphony. His grandparents were also musicians. Arthur was named after Arthur Nickich, then conductor of that orchestra. From the age of 6 he took lessons on the violin and piano, played baseball and caused his father worry about injury to his youthful fingers. When Fiedler was in his second year at Boston Latin school, his father retired from the Symphony and took him to live in Vienna.

Fiedler said that music had been so omnipresent in his life that he had not particularly thought of it as a cereer, and at the age of 15 he was uncertain as to what occupation to pursue. He started out as an apprentice in a Berlin publishing house when his family moved there a year after the return to Europe. After a few months as an apprentice he decided that music, and not publishing, was his real interest. Out of the 54 that tried, he was one of the six to pass the competitive entrance examinations of the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, in 1911. He took courses in piano, violin, but particularly conducting, and led his first concert at the age of 17.

In the momentous summer of 1914, Fiedler and his family were living in a hotel in the Bohemian Alps. As Austria declared war and descended upon the Serbs to avenge Sarjevo, the cook and waiters dropped their pots and trays to take up arms, and the Fiedlers returned into Germany just as that nation declared war to align the Central Powers against the world.

BACK TO BOSTON

Students of the Royal Academy were frequently employed by members of the royal family and others to play at their homes, and it was as Fiedler was playing at the house of the head of an organization corresponding to our United Press that the first flash of the torpedoing of the Lusitania reached Berlin. His father urged him to leave Germany, and Fiedler went to Ambassador Gerard, who also advised him, as an American citizen, to go home. He and a fellow-student went to Amsterdam, a city crowded with Belgian refugees. They tried unsuccessfully to find work as musicians, and sailed to America to arrive in July, 1915, Fiedler going to stay with an uncle on Nantucket.

At Nantucket he met a millionaire who used to call him up at 11 P. M. to come and play at his parties, slipping the young musician a $50 bill for his trouble. This friend became interested in young Fiedler's career, and offered his patronage. Fiedler demurred and found himself a position as second violinist in the Symphony during Karl Muck's regime.

After eating a lot of bananas and drinking a lot of water he took the examination for entrance into the navy, but was still too light. Subsequently he was drafted to Camp Devens, but honorably discharged for reasons of physique—the authorities deciding he did not have a stately enough arch to the feet.

He then went to Rockport to live in a studio there with another musician. They were suspected of being spies, and the populace looked askance. Bread used to arrive bisected from the baker's as the authorities searched for any stray plots, and the goings and comings of the two young musicians were subject to considerable scrutiny.

Subsequently he organized his Boston Sinfonietta orchestra, and it was nin years ago that he first substituted fo Jacchia at Symphony hall. He als conducted the Pops for Casella on occasion. In May, 1930, he became conductor of the Pops.

BIRTH OF AN IDEA

Fiedler's annual trips abroad sinc the war bore fruit in the idea of th Esplanade concerts. Every summer h has gone to Europe, studying son specific country each time. He has tr velled on all sorts of craft, once b ing on a coal freighter which return home with a water ballast and w driven up by way of Greenland by th strong west winds. One thing that impressed him in his European experience was the excellence of the outdoor music and he started looking around Bosto for a suitable place to stage such events. The Esplanade appealed to him as the ideal place, and be broache the idea to musical friends who wer very skeptical as to the possibilities o financial support to such a venture. Th police department was also from Missouri. However, he secured the fund from 15 or 20 public-spirited citizens.

On the 4th of July, six years ag with the shell swaying in a strong blo the string,. wind and percussion instruments sounded the first notes the Esplanade concerts, Results we instantaneous. It is not uncommon see as many as 20,000 listeners. Peop charter busses to come down from Ne Hampshire, and the audience rang from the poorest down-and-outer captains of industry. Some enthusias arrive as early as mid-afternoon to g good seats. About a quarter of the e penses are covered by coin boxes st tioned on the Esplanade. The Metr politan police have never made an a rest at these concerts, no one has ev reported having their pocket pick "Music stills the savage breast."

Mr. Fidler says that an increas proportion of really fine selections music in the program has not decreas the popularity of the series, and i dicates a generally encouraging le of musical appreciation among the pu lic at large. If funds are available, we sincerely hope they are, the co certs will get under way again abo the middle of July.

Mr. Fiedler also conducts his Si fonietta, the MacDowell Club Orchest the Boston University Orchestra, a free Museum Concerts. He is lea of the Cecelia Society Chorus, and such has prepared notable choral mu for performance under Dr. Kossevit at the regular Symphony concerts.

"NO HOTHOUSE PLANT"

Mr. Fiedler is friendly, energe and young. He likes the out-of-do as we all do, is no hothouse plant, a drives an open car with the top do all winter. He plays tennis, ri horses, and walks around the Charl River basin every day. He is a wres ling fan, and also spends evenings police stations with captain friends.

When preparing a program wi Leslie Rogers the librarian, the tw imitate snatches of selections, givin pretty accurate and amusing repro ductions of violins, trombones et a

On the wall of Mr. Fiedler's livin room is a pencil sketch of him by hi tempestuous friend Augustus John, th famous English portrait painter. Th was done one night at the Cocoanu Grove, when John was here in Bosto a few years ago. On the same wall i a gold wreath which was given him b the Greek Traditional Society for hi outdoor concerts. Mr. Fiedler is the only person outside of marathoners to have received this.

The outstanding characteristic o Fiedler's conducting is the simplicity and directness with which he leads his orchestra, and the lack of affection with which he receives applause.

Fiedler is a bachelor. During the interview his phone rang, and his affable German cook handed him the phone, saying, "It's a woman."

"Is she good looking?" asked Mr. Fiedler.

---

know of all this here only what I have read, but it is a light of hope in a black sky."—Thomas Mann, Nobel prize winner in 1929, just arrived in the United States.

"Senator Long said, 'Seize that woman and put her out.' One seized me by the right arm, and I said, 'You just dare put me out; you're trying to bluff me from appearing before the tax committee again.' He said, 'I dare you to shake a finger in my face again.' Well, I showed him I wasn't afraid of him. I counted up to six and then shook my finger right under that ugly, red, pug nose of his.

"Then he said, 'Well, little one, guess you can stay up here.' Imagine him calling me 'little one.' "—Mrs. Ann E. Pleasant of Louisiana, testifying before Senate elections committee.

"WORLD IN REVIEW," a radio feature dealing with men and events in the week's news, appears on the air every Saturday evening at 7 o'clock over Stations WBZ and WBZA.

Sweeter Music Will Float From New Esplanade Shell

Arthur Fiedler, Expecting to Play for Record Crowds, Sees Workmen Put Together Ingenious "Battleship Plates"

BY LANING HUMPHREY

The first music of the Esplanade Concert series for this summer has been heard. This was not on the Charles River Esplanade, however, but in Somerville.

It was heard, not by one of the huge crowds that for five summers have characterized these concerts, but by conductor Arthur Fiedler, alone.

The sound set his ears jangling, but it was still some of the sweetest music he has ever listened to.

What Mr. Fiedler heard was the din of metal workers making a wonderful new steel acoustic shell for the sixth season of his famous free outdoor orchestral concerts played nightly, except Saturday, on the Esplanade, by Boston Symphony musicians.

Like a Man-'o-War

The remarkable new shell has been designed to enable more people than ever to hear the music at its best. The structure is 61 feet long and 31 feet high. As Mr. Fiedler saw it in the metal shop, it looked like sections of a battle cruiser.

It was made up of curved steel plates a quarter of an inch thick, fitted together and made fast to steel girders by oxi-acetylene blowtorch welding. There were four huge semi-circular bands like this, called "concentric rings."

How the new shell will be formed from the concentric rings may be visualized by the reader by the use of his hands.

Hold the fingers and thumbs of your right hand close together, and arch them. Do the same with your left. Place the two arches, one in front of the other, with the forefinger of the left hand under-lapping the palm of the right along the line of the right little finger, which will be concealed, looking on the under side of the arch. Let the farthest rim of each arch tip downward. Thus you will have a representation of the two outer concentric rings of the new acoustic shell.

Now imagine two more arched hands added to your right hand, along the line of its little finger. Imagine that each arch is a little shorter than the one preceding it. The resulting form will indicate that the new shell is like a wide low dome with the front cut away so that you may see into it, and with the ceiling not one of continuous smooth surface, but laid out in four ridges, each of which—the concentric rings—will measure six feet from front to back.

Sewing Steel Together

Messrs. Benjamin Groisser and Louis Shlager, proprietors of the metal works, showed Mr. Fiedler step by step the details of making a reality of the blueprints of Harold Field Kellogg, the architect. The concentric rings were attached to girders, the "feet" of which are going to be bolted to concrete piles buried in the Esplanade grounds. It was explained that the angle irons sticking out from the rings, and welded to them, would be the means of attaching a wooden sheathing to the inside of the completed steel shell.

As Mr. Fiedler was taken the rounds of the machinery used in making the new "loudspeaking horn" for the Esplanade orchestra, it appeared that the structure had been through every kind of metal-torturing device necessary for the production of a battleship.

The plates of the concentric rings had been through rollers to give them curves in two directions.

Photo shows Arthur Fiedler, Pop Concert maestro, breaking ground for the new Esplanade acoustic shell or "sound projector" for the coming Esplanade concerts. Standing in centre rear is Engineer Benjamin Fink and extreme right, puffing a cigar, is Engineer Andrew Canzanelli, both of the Metropolitan District Commission.

For fastening some parts together, there was a very neat sort of sewing machine. It had a piston in an oil-filled cylinder like the cylinder of a locomotive. In order to fasten two pieces of steel together, holes were put through them in one machine, and an inch bolt inserted. Then the throwing of the lever on the sewing machine telescoped the bolt and rounded its head with one push of its big blunt "needle."

Bulldozing Steel

In order to make bends in straps of steel, one bend for welding to a concentric ring, and one for the wooden lining to be bolted to, there was what was called a "bulldozer."

There were two beams on it which moved like human forearms pushing. But these forearms, moved by massive cogs, seemed as thick as the crossbeams of a tugboat. Mr. Groisser invited the conductor to throw a lever. With an easy movement the arms pushed a plow-shaped form at a thick steel bar, and the bar came out in an acute bend from a die which it scarcely seemed to touch. It bent as easily as you bend a piece of copper bell wire.

Tomorrow the concentric rings will be trucked to the Esplanade concert grounds. There they will be set up by workmen making use of two tower-like wooden scaffolds 25 feet in height, which have been built while the metal shop was doing its part. A ladder has been made on the front of each tower, and a flight of steps on top, with treads two inches thick.

Platform in 28 Sections

The crew of carpenters on the grounds, working simultaneously with the men in the metal shop, have finished the platform on which the musicians will sit beneath the shell. In order to preserve it from year-round exposure to weather, architect Kellogg laid out a unique plan.

The platform is built in 28 sections, each resembling a table with four-by-four joists for legs, with cross bracings. In order to produce a platform of a squared semi-circular form, there are 18 oblong tables, to be arranged in three rows—of nine, six, and three tables, respectively. Three triangular tables on each side fill in the step-like gaps there.

The tables will be bolted to each other and to bars lying across concrete piles buried in the ground. At the end of the concert season, the platform will be taken apart and the 28 sections stored over the winter.

"Sound Doctor" Called In

The objective behind the construction of the new shell is to carry the sound of the orchestra over a wider and deeper section of the huge crowds than ever before, in good tonal balance and quality, without electrical amplification.

When Arthur Fiedler founded the Esplanade concerts five years ago, the Metropolitan District Commission, in return for music played by musicians of high quality at no direct cost to the State, supplied a wooden acoustic shell which was the best that could be produced under the circumstances, in the matter of construction and design. A musical member of the commission, Secretary Whittaker, evolved a pasteboard model which was so proportioned as to give the maximum carrying power to a bell rung inside. Engineers Benjamin Fink and Andrew Canzanelli worked out structural problems.

Buildings across the street had some weird effects on the tonal balance of the orchestra, with an "out-of-joint" result. These were corrected by Dr. W. R. Barass, then at the head of the sound-laboratory of Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He offset the distortions by having Mr. Fiedler seat the musicians in a plan quite different from that used at Symphony Hall.

New Shell Won't "Mush" Music

The old shell was heard at its best along a deep but narrow band of territory. The new one has been planned to cover a much wider band. Tones from the various sections of instruments—strings, woodwinds, brass, and percussion—used to be churned up all together in the old shell, with a relatively blurring effect. In the new shell, each of the instrumental sections will have its individual concentric ring to keep its tone from "mushing" into the tones of each other section. Thus, the music will emerge with each tone quality clear and correctly proportioned.

After architect Kellogg had laid out the rough plans for a good-looking new shell, Dr. Barss worked over them in his sound-laboratory at Kendall square, Cambridge, and calculated the length, degree of arch, degree of slant, and other measurements for the new shell. When steel was chosen for reasons of structural safety—especially resistance to wind pressure—Dr. Barss specified that it should be lined with wood for good tone quality. Engineer Benjamin Fink, under the direction of Chief Engineer Benjamin Davis of the Metropolitan District Commission, revised the structural specifications to obtain a maximum margin of safety. All this, of course, was done under the general supervision of the commissioner, Davis B. Kenniston, who decided that the old shell was "all in" after going through five seasons.

One Problem Left

The big question remaining to be settled is the fund for the concerts themselves. None of the money from chair rentals goes to the orchestra. For the convenience of the public, the commission allows chairs to be rented to those who desire them. But from the first it has driven the customary fee of 25 cents, in effect elsewhere, down to a dime. A percentage of the total is taken by the commission as reimbursement to the State for the construction and maintenance expenses of the acoustic shell. Not even a nominal admission for the support of the concerts may be charged, for the grounds belong to the State, and hence the people, and the people must not be charged to enter their own property. Hence, the necessity for asking friends of the concerts to "chip in" on a fund from year to year—those who can afford a contribution, large or small, being asked to do so for the general enjoyment of the music, especially by those who can afford nothing.

Mr. Fiedler plans to open the sixth consecutive season of esplanade concerts about the middle of July, to run, if possible, four weeks—a week longer than last year.

Contributions may be sent to:

Esplanade Concert Fund, Trust Department, Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, Boston, which will mail out receipts.

Filene's

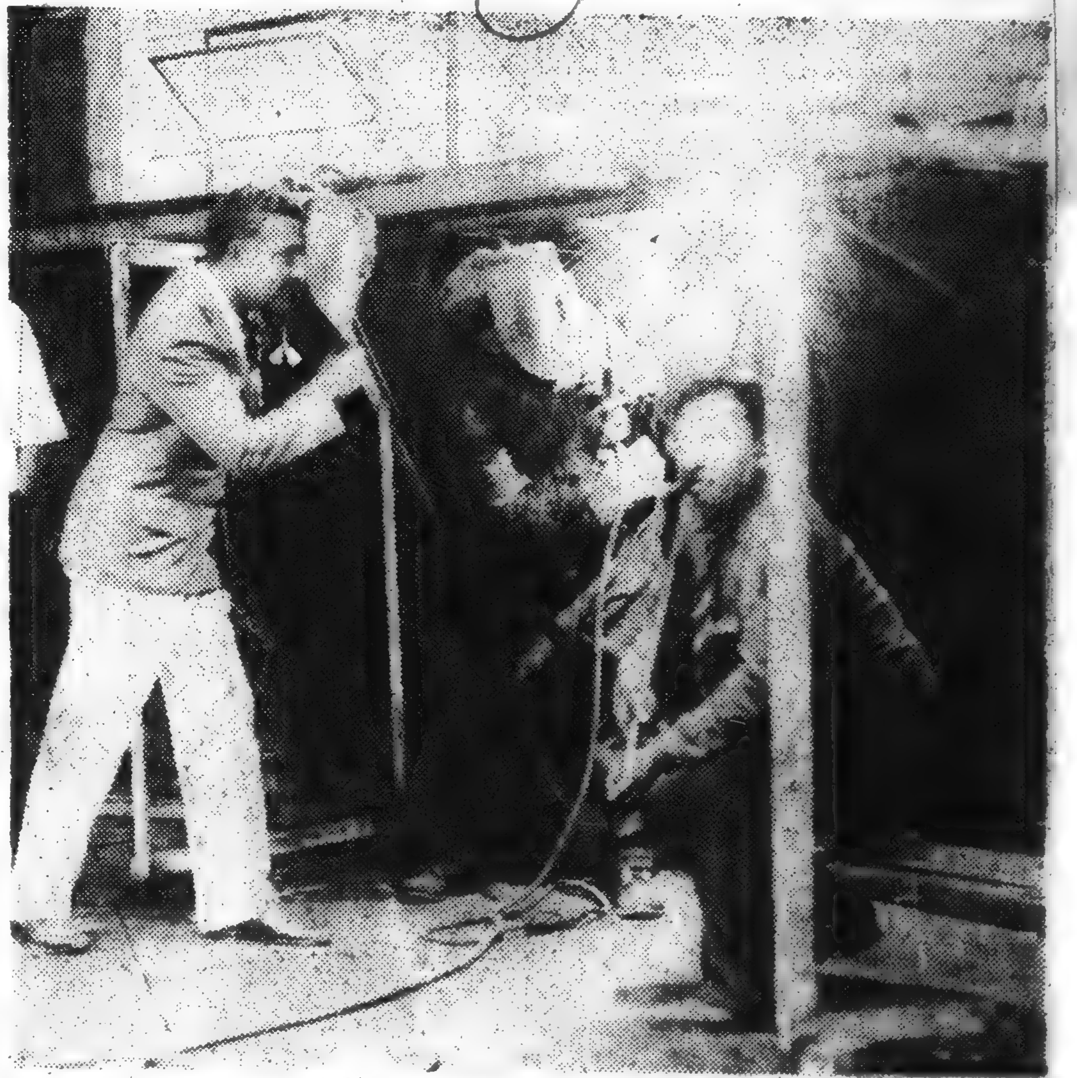
Once there was only the moth to have a $100 lunch off your fur coat---

But this year he has two new henchmen—the dermestid and the fur beetle—both enemies of your furs and fur

---

Herald June 24

FIEDLER WATCHES WELDING JOB



Through a mask protecting from sparks and glare, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, watches the welding of two plates in the construction of a band of steel, 61 feet long and one-quarter-inch thick, which forms one of the units in the new scientific acoustic shell which will enable this summer's Esplanade concert audiences to hear well over a wider area. Mr. Fiedler plans to begin the concerts on the Charles river embankment in a few weeks, to run for from three to four weeks, according to the results of the fund, which has been reopened at the Merchants National Bank.

NEW YORK TIMES

JUL 1 - 1934

IN THE POPULARITY PARADE

Impressive Broadcasts of Past Six Months Reveal Ingredients That Win Favor Among Radio Listeners

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP Jr.

THIS is the day the broadcasters look back across six months to select the outstanding events of the first half of 1934. A study of the programs usually reveals trends in the art of ethereal showmanship. The survey at the half-way milestone indicates whether comedians or drama, jazz bands or symphonies are leading the popularity parade. One thing stands out definitely as the programs of 1934 pass in review—international broadcasts are becoming more frequent. The magic of short waves is being illustrated by relays from numerous European cities, from the Orient and from islands in the Pacific.

The broadcasters find it quite easy to pick a long list of what they consider to be outstanding programs. They award each of the first six months of 1934 with about a dozen star events. To select ten highlights for a half year would, of course, be more difficult. To win a place among the first ten, a broadcast is generally of national or international significance. It must have wide public interest, high calibre entertainment, showmanship, and the quality of transmission must be excellent.

* * *

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S address at the opening of the Seventy-third Congress was an event of national importance. It ranks at the top of the list of public interest broadcasts so far in 1934, as does his "fireside chat" radioed from the White House on June 28.

Two of the most impressive and solemn broadcasts of the six months were the funeral of Albert, King of the Belgians, and the coronation a few days later of King Leopold III.

The Byrd Expedition at Little America aroused public interest and added a novelty to listening-in. Static and fading frequently attacked the waves; nevertheless, considering the distance and the conditions under which the presentations were staged, they were often interesting. Such programs disclose the wonders of short waves that skip around the globe more quickly than a bee can fly around an orange.

In the realm of sports the Kentucky Derby, the English Derby and the Carnera-Baer championship fight were red letter events.

The gala concert on Feb. 3 opening the Radio Playhouse of WABC set a high standard of showmanship and of musical quality. It was one of the all-star programs of the six months.

Drama That Was Cheered.

"Chapter One—A Busy Year," broadcast on Feb. 25, was a dramatic account of President Roosevelt's achievements during his first year in the White House. That was a program revealing the effectiveness of a radio scenario together with master showmanship that gives the listeners a rapid-fire performance. "Twenty Crowded Years," a stirring panoramic drama covering historic events from 1914 to 1934, broadcast on June 28, the twentieth anniversary of the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, was another outstanding performance in this class.

Hawaii proved on March 4 that it has showmen who know how to stage a radio performance. Princess Abigail Kawananakoa was the director of this program serenading President Roosevelt on the anniversary of his inauguration. Quality of transmission was superior as the guitars sent their music eastward and the microphones picked up the sound of the surf on the beach at Waikiki. It was a musical program with a fine touch of realism unmarred by too much talking.

Each Sunday evening from 6 to 7 o'clock during the early part of the year a sixty-piece symphony orchestra and a noted soloist entertained over WJZ's network, establishing a high standard for symphonic broadcasts planned and performed specially for the unseen audience. In this class these programs were outstanding, and won applause for music of the masters untainted by overdone commercial announcements.

Major Symphony Concerts.

Then, of course, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts on Sunday afternoons were a major ethereal attraction. This orchestra has always been a favorite among listeners since Nov. 22, 1922, when it went on the air for the first time.

The Minneapolis Symphony, directed by Eugene Ormandy, the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, and the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, were also major attractions in the symphonic group.

The Metropolitan Opera broadcasts attracted a far-flung audience. The mail was an indication that a sufficiently large portion of a coast-to-coast audience enjoyed the operas on Saturday afternoon to put them on the list of outstanding achievements in the science of electrifying golden tones.

* * *

WHILE these presentations, which fall in a more or less special class, win places among the leading events, there are hundreds of other entertainers, who in their fields are extremely popular. Day after day they entertain a record-breaking audience. They have a nation-wide following, but probably because they are commonplace they shine like the sun. The special events are in the shooting star class; they attract for the passing moment. However, it is no easy task for these radio "suns," as they might be called, to break away from their usual tricks and stage what might be called a total eclipse of their own efforts to attract an even greater following.

For programs to go on year in and year out is a true test of their quality and human interest appeal. So at any half-year mark or year-end some mention is appropriate to those faithful performers who might be called the backbone of broadcasting: Amos 'n' Andy, the Goldbergs, the Vallee show, Captain Henry and his Showboat, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Edwin C. Hill, Ben Bernie and a host of others who daily or weekly brighten fifteen minutes, a half-hour or an hour for many Americans.

These performers wear the palms, for they have been tested by many a broadcast, and if they were not outstanding in their class they would have dropped long ago from the procession that is constantly passing the microphone. These regular entertainers meet the test of public reaction, whereas many outstanding events are here and gone in a day.

* * *

THE first half of 1934 has revealed the power of radio-drama and disclosed that there are many possibilities for extension of this branch of broadcasting. It is noted that more stars of the stage and screen are finding their way into this field, enhancing the effectiveness of radio dramatic art.

Static is not the only factor that ruins a radio show; in fact, it seldom does unless feeble waves are intercepted from afar. Too much commercialism—ballyhoo, as the listeners call it—frequently serves as verbal static and pushes an otherwise excellent broadcast out of the outstanding events class. Many of the artists realize this fact and when opportunity arises some of the more independent insist that the commercial credits be minimized so that artistry will not be bombarded. For example, John Charles Thomas, baritone, was one performer in the first half of 1934 who saw to it that the commercialism occupied a minute at the beginning and one at the end of the concert, with no interruptions to the program. The idea met with listener applause.

Today the broadcasters are planning for the next six months. They work far in advance, but at a minute's notice new and unexpected events may upset the plans. No one is aware in July what the radio's outstanding events of the last half of 1934 will be. And there are so many broadcasts crowded in a half year that it is almost as difficult to remember the programs that were heard as it is to predict what is coming. The past events were as fleeting through memory as the future is unseen.

NEW YORK TIMES

JUL 1 - 1934

THE DANCE: PRIZE WINNER

'Van der Lubbe's Head' and the Workers Dance League Competition

By JOHN MARTIN.

THE New Dance Group, which has just concluded its annual series of studio recitals, finds itself functioning in considerably more of the limelight than usual because of having won the first award in the recent competition of the Workers Dance League at the Town Hall.

As a general rule competitions in the arts are open to question. It is true that the laurel of the Greeks meant something, but it is also true that it was not always awarded to the work which later centuries have found most worthy of treasuring. Poor Euripides, for example, was a notorious runner-up, but his plays are produced nowadays more frequently and more successfully than those of any of the other ancient dramatists. In spite of the scoffing of the scholars, this is not to be explained merely on the ground of the number of his plays extant or even by the gracious and enthusiastic services of Gilbert Murray; it is rather because of the greater humanity, the greater universality of the plays themselves. But if this example is too remote, one need only glance at the annual awards of the Pulitzer Prize committee to find certain bases for doubt regarding the value of competition in the arts.

* * *

As a matter of fact, however, the Workers Dance League award appears to the present writer to have been a just and discriminating one. With the exception of the "Anti-War Trilogy" of the Theatre Union Dance Group, there was no composition which presented any dangerous signs of rivalry with the winning entry, "Van der Lubbe's Head." Because of the ephemeral materials of which dance compositions are made, posterity will have no opportunity to reverse this judgment. If such were not the case, the usual reversal might well be expected, for the substance of the "Anti-War Trilogy" is far more solid and fundamental than the unfortunate Van der Lubbe and the momentary turmoil which produced his grotesque tragedy.

The dance itself is nevertheless of a high order. Singularly enough, it is danced to a poem; and marks the first success of such an experiment. From the standpoint of perfection, this success is debatable, but in the particular dimensions in which the Workers Dance League builds its entire répertoire, it is significant. The major complaint commonly raised against "propaganda" dancing is its literalness and lack of essentially choreographic form. With a definite literary message to deliver, it customarily sacrifices without hesitation such vital considerations as good composition and kinetic design and defends itself by classifying them as esthetic abstractions and flights from reality, and drowns all criticism with three rousing cheers for the proletariat.

* * *

In the case of "Van der Lubbe's Head," the choreographer had no need to worry about the literary message, for the poem contained it in good, ringing words where it belonged. Relieved of this irksome burden, the dance could afford to be reasonably free from literalness and build in its own terms. Thus literary phrases, usually a terrible drag on choreography, served actually to lighten the load of the composer which in the workers' groups is so ponderous and crushing. If, therefore, one were bold enough to offer a formula to these groups, it would be that they compose all their dances to spoken words and then omit the words in performance. Thus everybody would be satisfied, with the possible exception of the poet.

"Van der Lubbe's Head," like all the other compositions of the Workers Dance League, is credited to no choreographer. It is presumably the result of group creation. But in this, as in most of the other dances, the work of the leader of the group is clearly evident. In this case, the leader is Miriam Blecher. Whether she wishes to take the credit to herself or not, she has shown definite gifts as a choreographer and a composer for the theatre, not alone in this dance, but in the New Dance Group's other number on the same program. Obviously influenced by Wigman, she has yet a personal quality of her own, and the group under her direction can fairly be expected to follow up its excellent beginning with even better dances in the future, with or without the stimulus of competitions and hypothetical laurel wreaths.

* * *

Felicia Sorel and Demetrios Vilan are to be seen this week as the featured dancers in the Radio City Music Hall stage production, "The Magazine Rack.

* * *

In spite of the fact that there will be no dance performances as such at the Lewisohn Stadium this Summer, there will be dancing, after all. Rita De Leporte, première danseuse of the Metropolitan Opera, will occupy the same position in the opera performances which are to be a weekly feature of the Stadium season. Arthur Mahoney will be the principal male dancer, and the corps de ballet will be made up of members of the Metropolitan's company. Miss De Leporte will also be the choreographer. The first performances were scheduled for last Friday and Saturday, when "Samson and Delilah" was programmed. Later in the season Miss De Leporte and Mr. Mahoney will appear together in "Carmen," and Miss De Leporte alone in "Aïda." She will also stage the group dances in "Faust" and "Boris Godunoff."

Miss De Leporte needs no introduction to those who follow dancing, and Mr. Mahoney deserves to be equally known, for he is one of the most gifted of the young American ballet dancers. Though he has not appeared hereabouts very much except at the Roxy and Radio City, those who saw his performance of the Young Fisherman in "Helen Retires" at the Juilliard School will readily acknowledge his right to recognition.

* * *

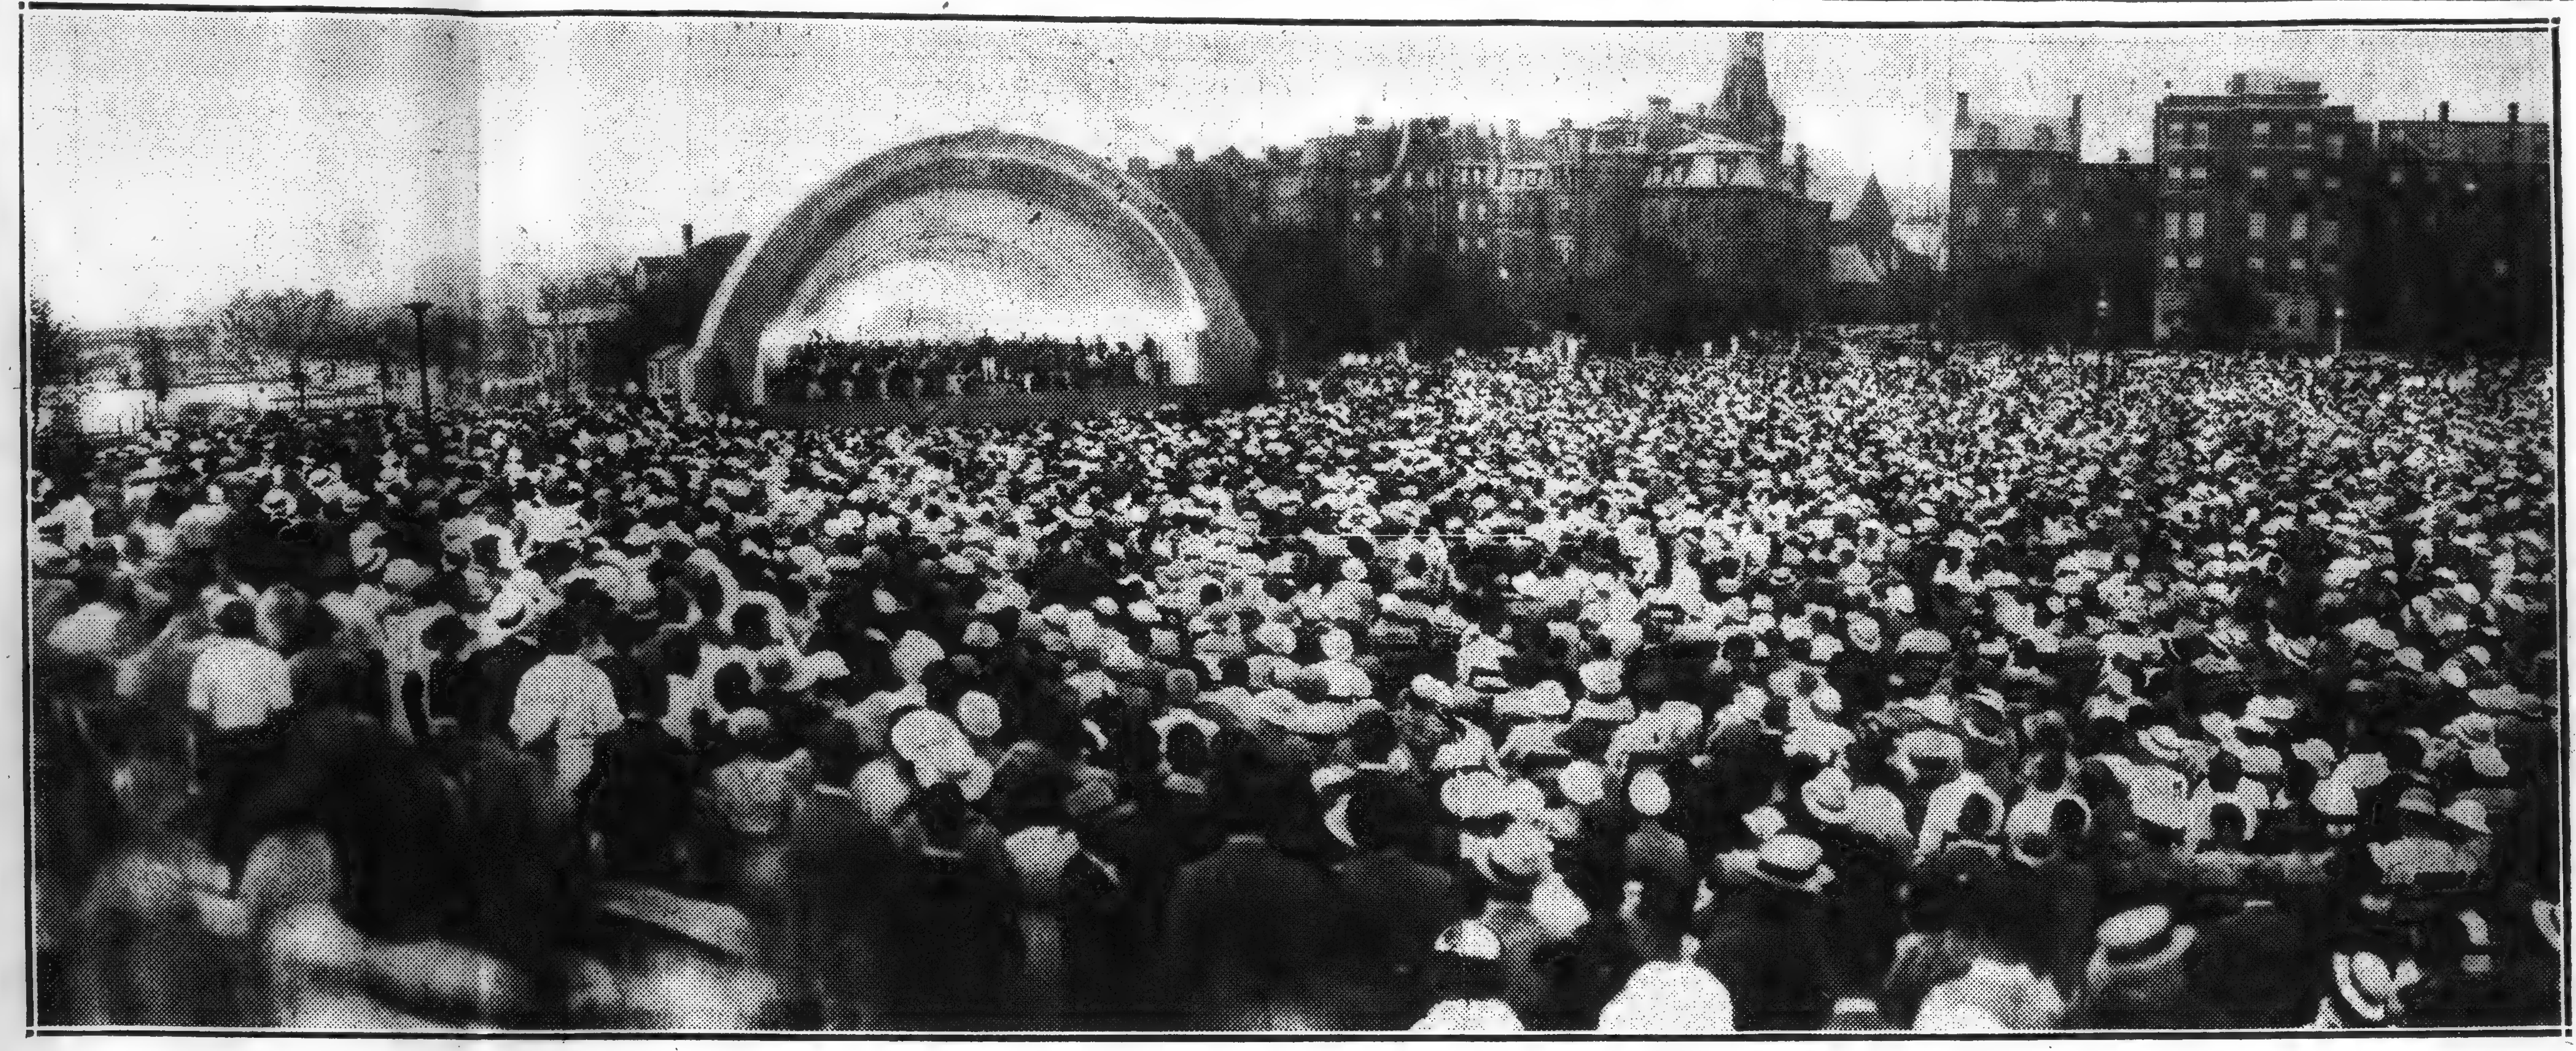
Speaking of male dancers, Paul Haakon has apparently made a considerable impression upon the patrons of the Municipal Opera in St. Louis. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat pronounces him "by far the best male dancer who has appeared on the Municipal Opera stage" and expresses the hope that he and his partner, Elenore Tennis, will be seen often. The occasion for the comment was the performance of the musical version of "Cyrano de Bergerac," in which the dancers presented a minuet and a Spanish dance.

* * *

Sara Mildred Strauss and her group are scheduled to dance this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its series of "Pops." These popular concerts frequently engage the services of dancers, notably of Hans Wiener and others who make their headquarters in Boston. It is a practice that New York dance audiences may well be envious of.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, JULY 16, 1934

Boston, Gay and Summery, Enjoys First Night of the Esplanade Concerts



It was 8:30 p. m. when this picture was made. The great new acoustic shell glowed like a giant magic lantern from the position taken by the photographer at the edge of the crowd which had gathered. Row after row of men and women sat listening intently to the orchestra. The brilliant outdoor audience paid a brilliant tribute to the musicians and gave notice that the Hub is still music-hungry. (Photo by Robert Thomson.)

GREAT CROWD AT RIVER CONCERT

Esplanade Season Started With 18,000 to 20,000 Present---New Music Shell Success

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

The largest audience, according to Arthur Fiedler, that he ever looked upon as a conductor, greeted him with enthusiastic applause last night as he stepped upon the podium to open the sixth season of free Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Basin. The crowd was estimated between 18,000 to 20,000.

Continued on Page 7—Seventh Col.

VAST THRONG AT RIVER CONCERT

Continued From First Page

People started gathering around 6 o'clock in order to secure choice locations. About 5000 chairs were sold at 10 cents apiece, but there were a couple of truck loads of unsold chairs. The newly-planted shrubbery that is part of the recent landscaping along the basin forms small islands, and cut off large numbers of people from taking chairs and sitting down to enjoy the music. The Metropolitan District Commission has had constructed a new shell of modernistic design and newly filled-in land on which the shell is now located, together with the landscaping, changed the design and atmosphere somewhat from what is has been in former years.

The land has been slightly hollowed so as to form a sloping circumference. Visaully, the effect is more pleasing, as those farther away from the shell are somewhat higher. Within this graduated circle in front of the shell the crowd was seated. And, during the entire concert there was not the slightest sound. It was an audience that came early and stayed until the last beat of the baton.

Traffic Chokes Streets

The streets of Beacon Hill were choked with traffic. People came from far and wide, literally, to hear the concert. Men and women divided the crowd evenly, it seemed. It was an impressive sight, this large gathering in summer attire, collected to enjoy a musical concert. The sun had not gone down when the concert opened and later there was the reflection of a poet's crescent of moon playing on what remains of the Charles River since the new improvement that has considerably narrowed the course of the stream.

The same orchestra of Boston Symphony men composes the Esplanade group. But this year there are 55 musicians, instead of the 48 of other years. The new lighting of the modernistic shell with its rounded setbacks is a piece of good showmanship and adds a dramatic touch, lighting up the conductor and his musicians, who can be seen for at least an eighth of a mile back on the basin. Mr. Fiedler and his men wore navy blue coats and white trousers, which added just the smart sartorial touch to the evening.

1,000,000 in Five Years

Mr. Fiedler expressed himself as pleased with the co-operation he has received from the Metropolitan District Commission, which has built the shell. And he said the Esplanade concerts are no longer looked upon as an experiment, but as a permanent part of the cultural life of Boston. More than 1,000,000 people in the past five years have listened to his concerts, and judging from the responsive turnout of last night, he looks for the biggest season.

Mr. Fiedler hopes to complete a season of four to five weeks of Esplanade concerts, with six concerts a week. The Esplanade concerts are said to be the only free out-of-door concerts in this country played six nights a week by members of a major symphony orchestra. Boxes were placed last night at different focal points for contributions. Last year the boxes yielded an amount sufficient to pay for one week of concerts out of the three given. The Metropolitan Commission supplies the shell, but does not pay the musicians.

TEST OF NEW SHELL

Greater Depth and Distance Gives Effect of Larger Orchestra—Sound Seems More Concentrated

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musically, the interest in last evening's concert on the Charles River Esplanade centred in the effectiveness or otherwise of the new shell. To the eye, the enclosure that now frames Arthur Fiedler and his 53 members of the Symphony Orchestra has greater depth and distance. The illusion is thus created that the band is twice its size—as indeed some of us wish that it were and hope that some day it may become. Because of this greater depth it is only natural that the sound should seem to be more focussed and concentrated, less diffused and dispersed than before. But the fact that the music did not carry last evening to the slopes of Beacon Hill may have been due to a strong wind that swept the sound, so to speak, back into the shell itself. Certainly those in a direct line with the orchestra, and not too far removed, heard the music clearly and without distortion.

The programme last evening might have been that of a Symphony Hall Pop Concert under Mr. Fiedler's direction. It began with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march and proceeded through the Overture to Weber's "Oberon" to a brace of movements from Haydn's "London" Symphony. Likewise from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, as well as that of the Pops, came as concluding number, Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude.

Huge Audience Attentive

For the rest, there was the Slavic March of Tchaikovsky, a suite drawn from Bizet's "Carmen," Wilhelmj's arrangement of the air from Bach's Suite in D major, known in that guise as the Air for the G-string, and that most poetic of the waltzes of Johann Strauss, "Tales from the Vienna Woods."

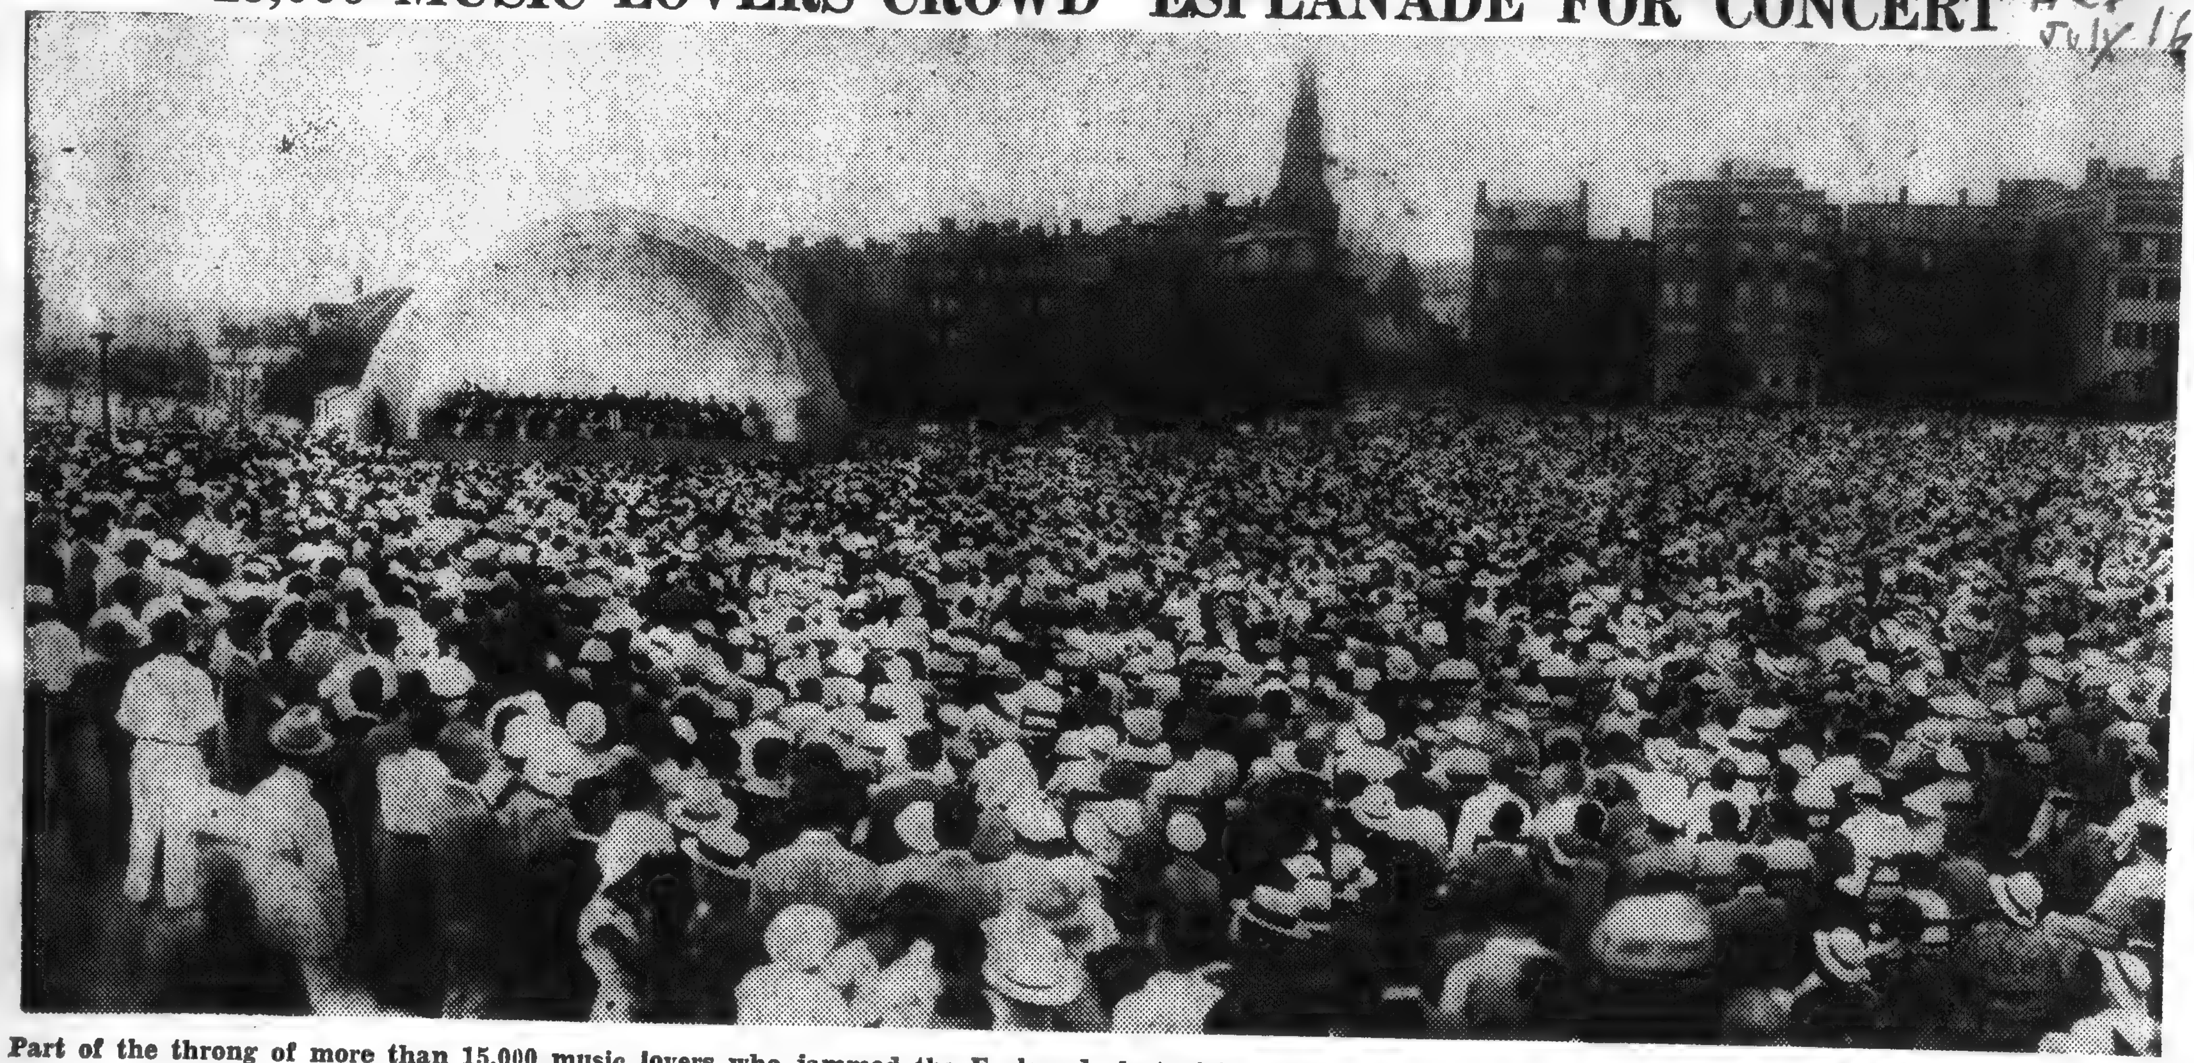
That the huge audience on the Esplanade last evening—and the adjective is used advisedly—sat attentively through a programme that contained nothing more ear-tickling than the numbers just cited, is proof enough that we are becoming a more musical people. Time was when that particular programme would have been considered exacting even in the concert hall. Beyond any doubt, these concerts of Mr. Fiedler's, now entering so successfully upon their sixth season, have been responsible for a musical awakening hereabouts.

Those who should know attribute to the Esplanade concerts some of the increase in attendance at the Pops, which musically they now so greatly resemble. And may they not have also lured some, if not many, to the more taxing concerts of the winter symphony season.

After all, there is but one path that any of us can follow to the understanding and love of good music, and that is the path of familiarity.

15,000 MUSIC LOVERS CROWD ESPLANADE FOR CONCERT

Her
July 16



Part of the throng of more than 15,000 music lovers who jammed the Esplanade last night to hear the opening concert by Arthur Fiedler and his 55 musicians from the Boston Symphony orchestra. The orchestra, seated in the new shell which functioned perfectly, may be seen to the left.

More Than 15,000 Applaud the First Of the Season's Esplanade Concerts

(Continued from First Page)

audition not only to those who arrived early enough to take seats in the specially prepared oval bowl, but also to the many who were forced to stand around the outer rim.

The first few rows of folding chairs were occupied as early as 5 P. M., and by 7:30, an hour before the concert was scheduled to begin, music lovers were arriving on all sides. Four motor launches plying between the pier at Dartmouth street and the landing near the shell, completed only yesterday afternoon, brought still more.

Pink clouds were darkening behind the silhouetted dome of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology buildings and lights around the basin were just twinkling on and flickering across the placid deepening waters of the Charles, when, promptly at 8:30, Conductor Fiedler lifted his baton and commandingly led his orchestra into the first bars of Elgar's thrilling "Pomp and Circumstance."

MUSIC POURS FORTH

From the beautifully lighted, golden-hued shell the stirring music poured forth to the waiting throng. The tremendous applause for Conductor Fiedler and his musicians as they mounted the dais died out, and the crowd became hushed. This rapt attention, broken only at the conclusion of each number by loud applause, was characteristic.

Enthusiastic applause followed each number and at times the throng insisted on encores. The program was one of familiar classical selections. From the familiar heavy swing of the opening number, through the swift tempo of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," to "Air on the G String" by Bach-Wilhelmj, a group of Strauss waltzes, the "Tales From the Vienna Woods," and Wagner's thundering prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the program was one of variety.

OPERATED PERFECTLY

The music came from the huge shell with a brilliance and a clearness phenomenal for an outdoor concert. The oval bowl in front of the shell, intentionally sunk below the street level to shut out discordant noises, operated perfectly.

Clear tones, properly blended by the various reflecting layers of the shell, reached the outermost fringe of the assembly. Even those standing at a distance and on the side were able to catch the various inflections of the music. Whereas, previously it has been necessary to play somewhat loudly in order to reach all those present, the musicians last night were able to shade their playing and temper it with increased expression.

It was announced last night that contributions, on which the concerts are dependent, were almost enough to assure three weeks of their continuance and there is a good possibility that they may be extended to four weeks. They are given every night except Saturday.

Last night's program was as follows:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Two Movements from Symphony No. 104 in D major, "London" Andante—Menuetto	Haydn
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Suite from Opera, "Carmen" Aragonaise, March of the Smugglers, Gypsy Dance	Bizet
Air on the G-string	Bach-Wilhelmj
"Tales of the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"	Wagner

15,000 AT FIRST RIVER CONCERT

Her 16

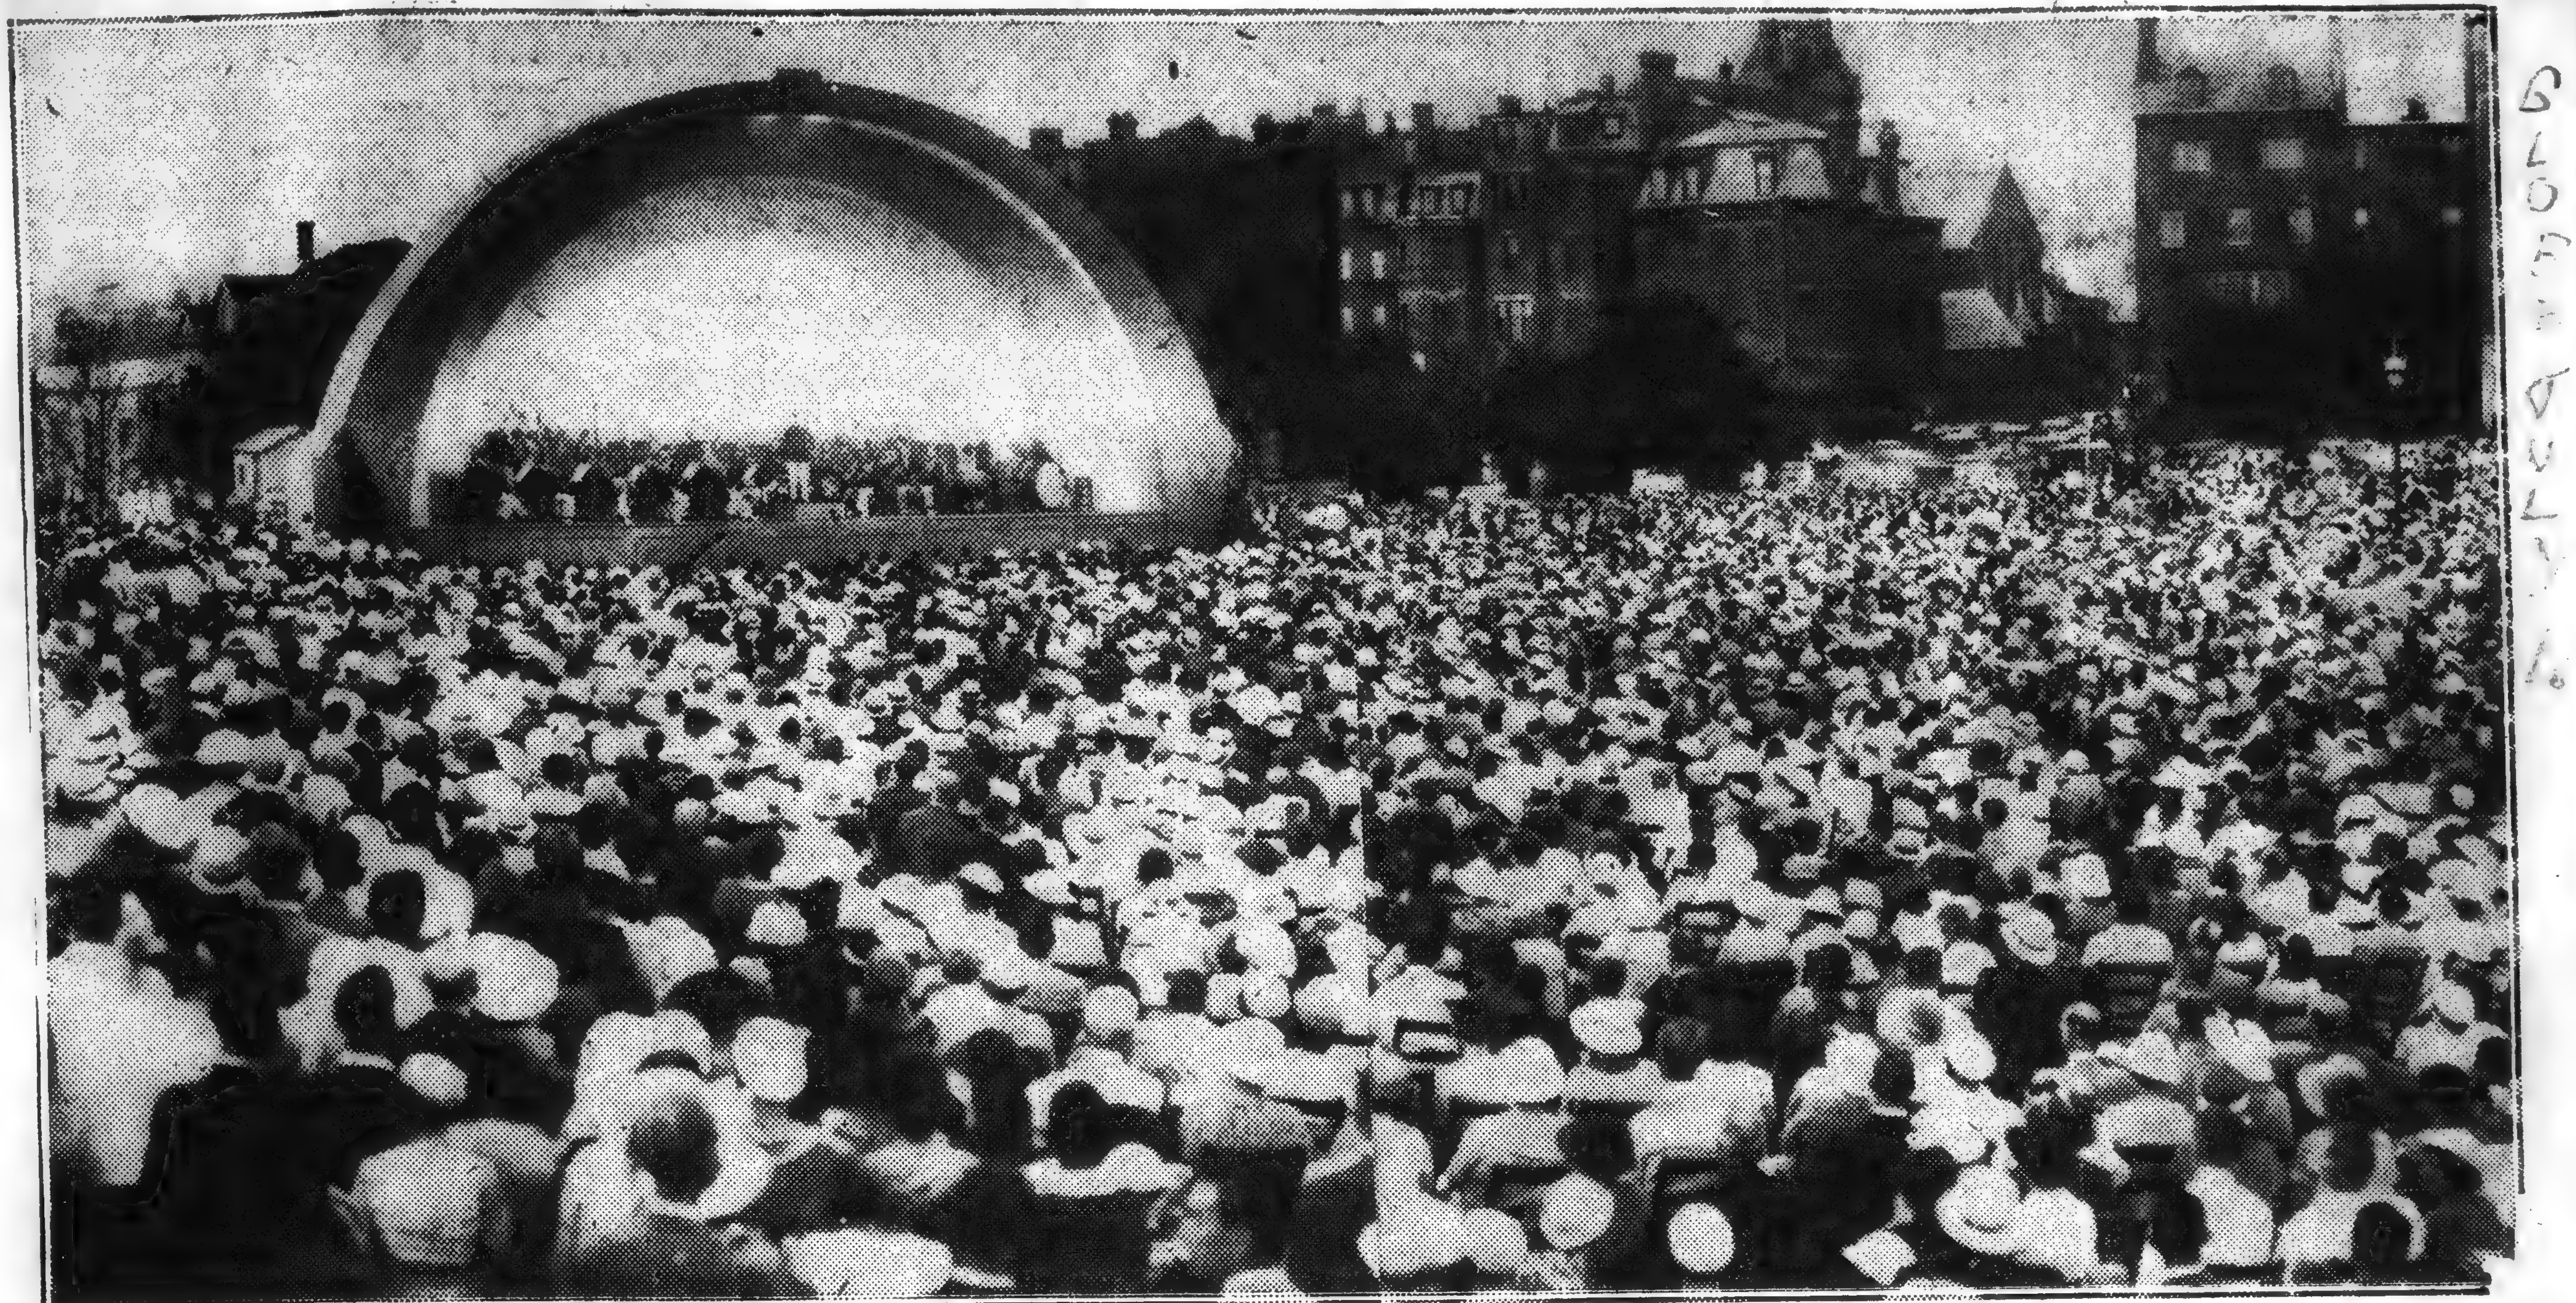
New Steel Shell Big Success on Esplanade—Fiedler Cheered

More than 15,000 enthusiastic music lovers thronged the improved Esplanade last night to hear Arthur Fiedler lead his 55 musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the program of the first of this year's popular outdoor symphonic concerts. This is the sixth season of the concerts, which are supported entirely by popular subscription.

The new steel shell, scientifically designed and built to enhance the tones of the instruments, permitted perfect

(Continued on Page Three)

PART OF HUGE THRONG THAT HEARD OPENING CONCERT OF ESPLANADE SERIES



GLOBE JULY 6

20,000 ATTEND FIRST CONCERT

Esplanade Series Opens Under Arthur Fiedler

New Acoustic Shell Enhances Tonal Values for Audience

Nearly 20,000 persons assembled on the Charles River Esplanade, near the foot of Mt Vernon st, last evening at 8:30, to hear the first Esplanade concert of the season. They heard an orchestra of about 50 Boston Symphony players, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, play out of a handsome new acoustic shell, completed only a day or two ago.

For the sixth successive year the public of Greater Boston will be privileged to hear free nightly—except Saturdays—these programs of miscellaneous orchestra pieces.

As in all past seasons, the crowd drew upon representative sections of Boston and its suburbs. At the Esplanade concerts no social lines are visible, all mingle in the oval area in front of the orchestra, some seated in the camp chairs, which may be rented for a small sum, others standing or lolling upon the ground at the fringe of the gathering.

New Shell an Improvement

Certain improvements are said to have been made, acoustically in the construction of the new shell, which is of sheet steel covered with wood facing. Walking up the river side last evening, one first heard the music from about 325 feet, and about a third of the way in toward a point corresponding with the middle of the shell. There the orchestra could be heard comfortably when playing loud—forte; with some effort when the volume of tone shrank to soft and less. Down front the tone was clear and resonant, less filled with the variegated echoes which used to be noticeable when the former wooden shell was employed.

As nearly as one could see, Mr Fiedler has arranged his orchestra for the most part as he would in Symphony Hall, with the exception that the drums and other percussion are down front at the right. Thus he apparently has been able to do away with the makeshift arrangement once found to be necessary to project best the orchestral tone.

After intermission, and just before the program was resumed with a pot-pourri from Bizet's opera, "Carmen," Davis B. Keniston, chairman of the Metropolitan District Commission, spoke.

Keniston Urges Support

As presiding officer of the body which controls the land upon which the concerts are heard, he felicitated the builders of the shell upon their work; the crowd upon its interest, displayed over five years, and Mr Fiedler and the players upon their playing. Mr Keniston reminded the audience of the importance which the Esplanade concerts occupy in the Summer musical life of the city, and of their unique position in the music of the country. He wisely pointed out that financial support comes from citizens who are so civically interested and generous as to make contributions, and added that all gifts are welcome.

The program was characteristic of those which have been given during Mr Fiedler's previous seasons as conductor of the Esplanade series: Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march opened the evening, followed by the overture to Weber's opera "Oberon"; two movements from Haydn's "London" Symphony; assorted pieces by Tchaikovsky, Bizet and Bach; a Strauss waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," and, to close, the prelude to Wagner's music-drama, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

C. W. D.

THE MAESTRO ARRIVES

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Conductor Fiedler of the Esplanade Concert Series is seen here as he arrived by powerboat to take up his baton for the opening number of this season's first concert.

BLANK PAGE

Pension Fund Concert Postponed and No New Date Set--- Schnabel Changes His Mind---Musical Notes of the Week

BY WARREN STORY SMITH

Numerous announcements of interest emanate from Symphony Hall this week. Perhaps of the most immediate import, is the one to the effect that the Pension Fund Concert, announced for next Sunday afternoon, has been postponed to some later date still unspecified, but which speculation places as the Sunday of the Christmas holidays, Dec. 31.

Then there is the programme for the Symphony Concerts of this week. When Mr. Schnabel first reached these shores it was said that he would devote himself exclusively to the music of Beethoven throughout his American visit. His Symphony Hall recital of five Beethoven Sonatas gave no hint of other intent. But on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in that auditorium, Mr. Schnabel will be heard with the orchestra in a Concerto of Mozart as yet undesignated. He will also be heard in a Concerto of Beethoven, that in C minor, which is No. 3, not the "Emperor," No. 5, which rumor had assigned.

* * * *

The title of the score by Arthur Lourie, Dr. Koussevitzky's biographer, which is to have its first Boston hearing at these same Symphony Concerts, is not an arbitrary one. In this "Sinfonia Dialectica" the composer makes much use of dialogue between the instruments, a procedure which, as he points out, has always been followed, even if unconsciously, in instrumental music, but which is here made a matter of importance.

* * * *

With these concerts of Friday and Saturday a quarter of the Symphony season will have passed. In the remaining 18 pairs of concerts there will be much of interest, and it should be noted that season tickets for the balance of the concert-year may be had at proportionately reduced cost. Incidentally, subscriptions to the remaining five concerts of the Monday evening series and the four concerts of the Tuesday afternoon Beethoven cycle will be received on the same basis.

* * * *

It is no disregard of Dr. Koussevitzky that centres interest at this season of the year upon the announcement of the guest conductors who will relieve him during his annual mid-winter holiday. As was to be expected, we shall hear this January one pair of concerts directed by Arnold Schoenberg, among the most eminent of living composers who is now making a stay in our midst and devoted to his own music. Our other visitor will be Sir Henry Wood, one of England's most distinguished conductors.

* * * *

There are numerous "special" programmes in prospect at these "regular" concerts. At an all-Wagner concert it is planned to give, in concert form, the first act of "Die Walkuere," with Paul Althouse and Elsa Alsen as the Siegmund and Sieglinde. For another concert is planned the third act of Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," known here only by its Prelude, now to be given with chorus and soloists. To be sure, there is prospect of opera once more in the Opera House. But the prospectus of the new Boston Opera Company scarcely calls for the production of Wagnerian music-dramas or operas out of Russia. These things are then to be welcomed at Symphony Hall.

* * * *

A programme devoted to the music of Rimsky-Korsakov and a Tchaikovsky Festival, of which the closing pair of Symphony concerts at the end of April will form a part, are also announced. Perhaps it should be added, although the information has already appeared in these columns, that the violinists Paul Kochanski and Yehudi Menuhin are among the soloists to be heard at the Symphony concerts before the season is done.

* * * *

A chamber

clude Peter Warlock's "Corpus Christi."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow will come the second of the current series of Monday evening Symphony Concerts, when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will set forth the Fifth Concerto Grosso for string orchestra of Handel, Moussorgsky's Prelude to his opera "Khovantchina," Gabriel Pierne's "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme" and Strauss' tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben."

* * * *

At the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Artur Schnabel, distinguished pianist recently heard in a Beethoven Sonata recital in Symphony Hall, will be the soloist. A Concerto of Beethoven, the Third, in C minor, and a Concerto of Mozart as yet unspecified will be his chosen pieces, and a "Sinfonia Dialectica" by Arthur Lourie, then to receive its first Boston performance, and Three Dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," complete the programme.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY "EROICA"

Beethoven's Third Symphony, in E-flat major, the "Eroica," is announced as the symphony for the first Providence concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night, Dec. 5. The symphony will come first on the program, the latter half to consist of three shorter works.

These are in order, as announced: Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, opus 49, Pierne; Prelude to "Khovanstchina," Moussorgsky, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" or, to give it the full program title, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, opus 28.

Miss Frances Burnham, organist and director of music at the Central Congregational Church, assisted by Miss Julia Stacy Gould, contralto, will give the first of a series of vesper services in the Village Church, Kingston, this afternoon at 4 o'clock. The program will be as follows: Toccata in C-major, J. Sebastian Bach; "Good News From Heaven the Angels Bring," Pachabel, Miss Burnham. "My Heart Ever Faithful," J. Sebastian Bach, Miss Gould. "A Rose Breaks Into Bloom," Johannes Brahms; Pastorale, "To be played while the Shepherds enter the stable," Traditional, arr. by Clokey; Noel, on traditional melody, "Puer Nobis Nascitur," Alexandre Guilmant, Miss Burnham. "No Candle Was There," Liza Lehmann; "The Shepherds," Peter Cornelius, Miss Gould. Largo, G. F. Handel; Reverie on Hymn-Tune, "University," Harvey Grace; "Carillon-sortie," H. Mulet, Miss Burnham.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

NOV 26 1933

The Week In Music In New York

Boston Symphony Visits Manhattan With New Offerings Given In Two Concerts

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

THE Boston Symphony has paid us its first visit of the season, giving a pair of concerts as usual and bringing out some new things. First of these was Tcherepnine's Three Pieces for Orchestra after a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe. The tale in question is "The Masque of the Red Death," which might be calculated to appeal to a Russian even though he were an expatriate like Mr. Tcherepnine.

As might be guessed, he has attempted the impossible in endeavoring to inspire by music the same horror that Poe's tale does when read. With an orchestra of almost unparalleled variety he has achieved some interesting effects, but few really musical ones. There are bassoons by batteries, English horns by hundreds (or so it seemed!), tambourines, cymbals, tamtams, castanets, xylophones, large bells, small bells, celesta, piano, organ and dear knows what not. But even a superb rendition of the work by the splendid orchestra failed to awaken it. Poe came through the test well; Tcherepnine less so.

At the second concert, Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody," though clearer in content, did not awaken any particular thrills. It does seem as though the present writers in England were merely Elgar-cum-water, which is not a very heady draft however you look at it!

Another piece of descriptive orchestral music heard for the first time in these parts was David Stanley Smith's "1929, A Satire," given by the Philharmonic Symphony. Mr. Smith is head of the Yale School of Music. It would seem that he has been endeavoring, not with complete success, to follow in the steps of Mr. Shostokovitch in delineating the spirit of the times, or perhaps of an era, by means of orchestral color and tonal vibration. Like Shostokovitch, one must treat with respect what is, apparently, a sincere effort, but it does seem that Mr. Smith is on a wrong path. The effect was as though one should use up a large amount of expensive paint in trying to paint how a rose smells.

On the same program Bruno Walter played Schreker's Birthday of the Infanta, which, composed some twenty-five years ago, was at that time thought rather advanced and shocking. It is neither today, and seemed to have considerable charm, though less so than the work of our own John Alden Carpenter on the same story.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1933

CHAPMAN TO LECTURE ON BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Monday Morning Musical Club announces the first in the series of lectures on Boston Symphony Orchestra programs next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of The Providence Journal and The Evening Bulletin. As in past seasons the lectures will be free to the public.

The club's library committee in charge of arrangements comprises Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright, chairman; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Miss Margaret Lally and Mrs. Mary Colt Gross, ex-officio. The ushers will be Mrs. Elsie Lovell Hankins and Miss Lally.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

V 2 6 1933

The Boston Symphony will play the following works Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall in Boston: Lourié's "Sinfonia Dialectica," Mozart's concerto for piano, Beethoven's Third concerto and dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" ballet. Artur Schnabel will be soloist.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 27 1933

New York's Mu On Despite De

Concerts Fewer and Audiences Smal Programs Is Maintained; Metrop Open Day After Christmas With

By OLEY SPEAKS

THE Boston orchestra gave its first Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie hall here last week. While the audience was large it was not capacity in any sense.

The program was most interesting, including as it did Handel's Concerto Grosso in D-major, Vaughan Williams' Norfolk Rhapsody, Pierne's Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme and finally Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

The writer has heard many concerts by this orchestra but the one heard last week was surpassingly lovely in all that makes for the best orchertral performance. The Pierne music, which proved to be of exquisite texture, was beautifully performed and was heard for the first time in New York.

The performance of the Tschaikovsky symphony was acclaimed with shouts of bravo from all parts of the auditorium; truly a magnificent performance this Serge Koussevitzky was warmly greeted by the audience for his magnetic conducting in this concert.

* * *

time back pa

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1933

Lines-O'-News.

A duplication of the exceptional singing she offered a few months ago was provided last Sunday by Mme. Grete Stuckgold, in New York's town hall. A throng packed that auditorium, a discriminating gathering which enthused over singing that deserved being enthused over. The vocal beauty, the fine line, the diction, music intelligence and exceptional interpretative gifts of the Metropolitan Opera soprano were at their best. It was such a triumph as only the distinguished singing artist could have commanded.

Philip Hale has retired. The dean of Boston's corps of music critics, annotator of the Boston Symphony programs for years and years (the best we know about) at 78 feels that he has earned a rest. Boston Herald readers will miss "Phil" Hale's scholarly, authoritative writings. He was a fine musician, a keen judge of music values, and a great help to the cause of music. His many friends, while wishing him all the good things in the way of leisure, will miss what he has to say in print.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1933

Boston Symphony Scores.

About once every so often I receive a query. It is about orchestras, and their relative status. As if any person could answer that question to the satisfaction of even the minority concerned. Yet there is always the temptation to try; to try to decide whether the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic-Symphony stood first among all in their class on this continent.

Estimating the tonal, musical, and technical abilities of an orchestra is or is not easy—according to one's mood or self-assurance. For me it has always seemed to revolve itself into a matter of opinion. To rate any orchestra first—leader of all—is rather taking a chance; still, I confess to being partial to the Boston Symphony; putting the Philadelphia contingent next on my own personal list, and the Philharmonic-Symphony crowd third.

Perhaps that may account for the inordinate delight I experienced in Carnegie the other evening when Serge Koussevitsky and his men played their first New York concert of this season and walked off with honors enough to last them a long, long time. The novelty of the program was the first New York appearance of Nikolai Tcherepin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale by Edgar Allen Poe," a moderately interesting work dedicated to Koussevitsky, but the high light on the program was the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which received a superb performance.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

[188]

SYMPHONY IN SECOND MONDAY

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts After Week's Vacation

Post Nov 28

Returning to his post after a brief holiday Dr. Koussevitzky last evening led the Symphony Orchestra through the second concert of the Monday series. The programme, identical with that of the next to the last pair of regular concerts, save for the substitution of the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina," for the "Norfolk Rhapsody" of Vaughan Williams, included Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Pierne's Diverissements on a Pastoral Theme, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben."

Obviously refreshed by his vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky, in fine fettle, led a wholly responsive orchestra. The performance of "A Hero's Life," which may be said to have set a new standard for this particular work, was attentively heard and warmly received. The music of Pierne, slight, but often engaging, was played with gusto and impeccable finish. Of the other performances the same unqualified praise might be written. In sum, an evening of rare delights.

Amer. Nov 28

OMEBACK

Koussevitzky Again Leads Orchestra

By MOSES SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky returned to his conductor's stand at Symphony Hall to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Monday evening concert, a concert of remarkable orchestral playing.

The program included the fifth Handel concerto grosso, for strings; the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina"; Gabriel Pierne's Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme; and Strauss' epic tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Since most of these works had been played at recent concerts of the longer series, the performances were, as expected, not only brilliant but also freely expressive.

One had the feeling that the conductor was playing on a single, sonorous instrument of many stops.

The composition of Pierne, which I was hearing for the second time, left me with substantially the same impression as at first. Granted its moments of charm and grace, the orchestral dress and symphonic development seemed to me too elaborate for the slightness of the ideas. It is not that Pierne has no place in a symphony concert, but rather than some of Pierne's less pretentious works would occupy that place more becomingly.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were warmly applauded by the large audience.

Amusements

MUSIC

Her. Nov 28

MONDAY FVENING SYMPHONY

Yesterday evening in Symphony hall the second in the series of Monday night concerts was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra with the following program:

Handel......Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major for string orchestra
Moussorgsky..........Prelude to the opera. "Khovanstchina"
Pierne. Divertisements on a PastoralTheme
Strauss......Tone Poem: "Ein Heldenleben"

Sometimes on the occasions of these concerts, not in the regular Friday and Saturday series, the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky seem particularly intent on bewitching the audience with the charm and bewildering it with the brilliance of their performance. At any rate last night, with an excellently chosen program and the fine artistry of interpretation and playing that is habitual with the orchestra, the concert was a memorable one.

Moussorgsky had as sure a sense and discrimination for the dramatic in music as any composer who ever dealt in opera. This talent is well exhibited in the songs which are occasionally heard in recital. But the prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," is one of the subtlest and most purely delightful examples of music designed for the theatre to be found. It never denies its purpose as theatre music, but it has at the same time a dignity that is only encountered in the greatest overtures. The Pierne "Divertisements" is a piece of similar integrity. The intent is obviously and successfully humorous. Its performance depends on the virtuosity of solo instruments, and in this the Boston Symphony is especially fortunate. The skill and taste of Mr. Burgin's playing, as shown last night in the Strauss Heldenleben, is well konwn to Symphony audiences, but the equally fine performances by players in the woodwind or the brass are perhaps less readily appreciated. The artistry with which Mr. Speyer gave the opening phrase for English horn in the Pierne work is a notable sample of the quality of the solo passages as heard in Symphony hall.

The program closed with the more pretentious Heldenleben of Richard Strauss. It is a work that is half sublimely beautiful, half rather childishly pompous. There is in it none of the artistic consistency that was so intrinsic a part of each of the pieces that preceded it. When Strauss stuck consciously to his program he wrote music that was insignificant because of its extraneous meaning. At other times he hastened to retrieve his position as a

A. W. W.

Trans. Nov. 28

Concert-Chronicle

"Popular Wagner"

LATE last week the managing committee of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra resolved upon an experiment with "popular Wagner"—that is to say a concert of favorite numbers from his music at modest prices. Since the numbers were all repertory pieces and so required little preparation, the committee also decided upon an immediate test. No farther away than next Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be heard in a "Wagner Concert" at Symphony Hall for which prices will rise from fifty cents, through $1 and $1.50, to two dollars, all without tax. The program, in which the orchestra will be unassisted, will traverse these numbers:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey" from "Götterdämmerung"
Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre"
Siegfried Idyl
Overture to "Tannhäuser"

?

Paired Masters

Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, who has a following in Boston, and Mr. Spalding, the violinist, who is equally fortunate, are joining together again for concerts of sonatas. As present plans stand, they are likely to be heard in two at Boston in Jordan Hall at midwinter. The pious hope is in order that there will be little or no Beethoven on their programs. For the while this town is bearing as best it may a plethora of the great Ludwig.

When Compared

About once in so often, writes Pierre Key in The Hartford Courant, I receive a query. It is about orchestras, and their relative status. As if any one person could answer that question to the satisfaction of even the minority concerned. Yet there is always the temptation to try to decide whether the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic stands first in their class on this continent. Estimating the tonal, musical and technical abilities of an orchestra is or is not easy—according to one's mood or self-assurance. For me it has always seemed to resolve itself into a matter of opinion. To rate any orchestra first—leader of all—is rather taking a chance. Still, I confess to being partial to the Boston Symphony; putting the Philadelphians next on my own personal list, and the Philharmonic third.

Schonberg as Lecturer

In the auditorium of the New School of Social Science at New York, the other evening, Schönberg lectured publicly for an hour and a quarter, "during which time," writes an eye-and-ear witness "his faint voice, and poor articulation made it difficult to hear him beyond a seat in the sixth row. The small audience, in fact, quickly moved from its place in the rear of the hall to points near the stage. It was from there that the gathering listened to what the speaker had to say—delivered painfully and slowly from a manuscript in not too acceptable English." There are no signs as yet of any lecture from Schönberg in either Cambridge or Boston.

As Teacher

Schönberg is an extremely good thing for America. In particular his almost fanatical academicism is an unfamiliar and needed quality among us. . . . That Schönberg should ardently advocate a rigid, inflexible course of study (strict counterpoint, exhaustive analyses of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart) may strike the superficial observer as strange. It is not strange, nor is it worth while any longer to reiterate the fact that his music (its "madness") is produced with a dogmatic adherence to method and minutiæ.

It will be interesting to note the effect Schönberg will have upon his pupils (and through them upon the music of the country at large). A danger for them lies in his insistence on genius, on perfection, in his ruthlessness with the near-perfect—the danger of paralysis and despair. Most of Schönberg's pupils in Berlin or Vienna have given up composing; convinced the master is right, composing is too hard; it is hopeless; one can never reach the goal, and so on. A good thing, perhaps. The world will be cluttered with less bad music. And a bad thing: since a cultural epoch is made up not only of the perfect work of geniuses but also of the combined efforts of lesser talents. [Modern Music

Boston to New York

For the Philharmonic Concerts in New York this week Mr. Walter has picked up Respigh's suite. "Church Windows," played for the first times anywhere by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in 1927. It then seemed fresher in invention and more distinguished in musical texture than most of Respighi's later pieces.

---

low-priced model.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky returned from a week's vacation to the podium in Symphony Hall last evening, to conduct the second Monday concert of the season. As usual, he, his players and the music received a hearty welcome from an audience that, in demonstrativeness, is second only to the Saturday audience. With the exception of the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," all the numbers had been heard at recent Friday and Saturday concerts: the Fifth Concerto Grosso for Strings, in D major, of Handel, Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," and "Ein Heldenleben," Richard Strauss' graphic account of the bother to which a hero of art is put in this picayunish world.

Moussorgsky's picturesque and remarkably imaginative prelude might be heard oftener than it is, without fear of surfeit. A good deal of its effect, to be sure, is due to Rimsky-Korsakov's sumptuous instrumentation, but the basic ideas were Moussorgsky's. It is at once understandable and yet baffling that a work so powerfully expressive of the soul of a people should be denied the wide popularity of such gems as the "Marche Slave" and the "1812 Overture" of Tchaikovsky. The performance was superlatively gorgeous.

Pierne's unassuming set of variations grow more charming at each hearing. Not only are they skillfully scored, but they contain fine musical substance of its type. And the "cortege blues" section becomes more amusing each time it is played. The distinguished former conductor of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris is no more able than his European brethren to write jazz with a "kick."

One could hear, in leaving the hall, comments that Dr Koussevitzky's performance of "Ein Heldenlebem" was even better than that of a fortnight ago. The orchestral tone, even in Strauss' towering climaxes, was perceptibly less opaque than previously, and there was generally more verve and splendor.

C. W. D.

Trans

OVEMBER 27, 1933

s --- Films

The Week-End In The Concert-Hall

Mr. Burgin Conquers Himself, Revival from Bloch, Other Prospects

THE AUDIENCE at the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening was doubly rewarded. It heard again Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," a music that will bear repetition more than once in ten years for substance, for atmosphere, for structure and march that mingle both until sound and suggestion are as one. It heard it also in true, vivid and eloquent performance, because throughout Mr. Burgin conducted as within memory he has never conducted before. As late as Friday afternoon the usual self-consciousness beset him. At every turn he seemed tentative, not from any lack of understanding or of purpose, but from a curious hesitation to release his full will and enforce it upon an orchestra to a man well disposed. Possibly the greeting of the audience—three times as hearty as that of the casual Friday—gave him confidence. Perhaps at last he conquered himself.

As it was every sign of timidity vanished. Mr. Burgin sounded deep the introduction; drove high the succeeding tumults; burked not at all the street-music; caught and conveyed to the full the tension and propulsive power of this first movement. He was as discerning and imparting with the subdued voice, the finer line, the nostalgic sentiment of the second. In the third he clothed the music in the illusion that the composer sought—of distant flare across the night, of distant sounds rude and confused across the silence, until by remoteness and imagination both are glamoured. Through the fourth he spared nothing of the larger vigors, the grinding tumults, with which Vaughan Williams would top the first.

Ten years and more Mr. Burgin has been concert-master at Symphony Hall. Often he has played in concertos; occasionally he has been deputy conductor. Always, until Saturday, a self-conscious hesitation has hampered him. Never has he quite spoken out. At last he cut free, declared himself—and carried orchestra and audience with him. The house rang with applause—no less from the stage than the auditorium. Within memory, from English as well as American concert-halls, the "London Symphony" had not sounded so full, clear and strong.

With Strauss and Dr. Koussevitzky

Trans Nov 28

THE Monday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky again conducting, last evening brought a program consisting of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major for String Orchestra, the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," Pierné's new divertissements on a pastoral theme, Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

Surely the high point of the evening was the playing of this score of Strauss. The performance brought to mind Strauss's own defense of his style when once he was accused of too great complexity: "With greater simplicity I can not express myself. I am continually striving for the highest possible degree of simpilicity." No one would ordinarily think this score as one of "simplicity." Yet when performance reaches such clarity as it has attained this year, one begins to understand Strauss's remark. That clarity was such as approaches the clarity of a finely played piece of chamber music. Through the whole complex score every note and motif was heard as clearly as though it were the only note or the only motif to which conductor and orchestra were giving attention. Never was there a moment in which the many strands of the music turned it muddy; not once did the music thicken. Transparent it always remained, no matter how many strands there might be to engage the mind. In the many sided exposition of the hero this was true; in the snarling and clackling mass of the music of the hero's adversaries, the single musical lines still maintained their distinctness; in the duet between hero and helpmate as well; in that tumultuous welter of sound, the battlefield, the effect still never became clouded; and finally when the hero views his works of peace, the quotations from his earlier works stand out. No, though the score is by no means simple, Strauss could hardly have made it more simple for the complete expression of his thought. This the conductor's present way with "Heldenleben" demonstrates.

A second hearing of Pierné's variations served only to emphasize the essential charm of this music. It apparently has only one aim, to be pleasant. And that aim it fully accomplishes. From simple statement of theme, through its several equally simple ornamental repetitions, through waltz, blues and jig, it proves itself as agreeable music. All of which performance enhanced to the nth degree.

Again it was performance in Musorgsky's prelude, as much as the music itself, which shaped the piece into its essential character. Fine ethereal effects, melodies that sing wondrously, the booming of the big drum, the crashing of cymbals, the blasts from horns, all together paint the picture of the "coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow." Musorgsky is nothing if not a painter of realistic effects in music. But such a painter is again nothing without an orchestra and conductor who can project the music in colorful tones. All joined hands last evening in giving this musical picture living reality.

Continuing to Handel, once again the well known Handelian qualities of strength, of pomp, of brightness, were revealed in all their essentials. Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Bedetti, in the solo "concertino," the orchestra with Dr. Koussevitzky as guide and inspiration, brought the four movements to telling performance. Through them, Handel and a hall full of listeners were the gainers.

A. H. M.

BLANK PAGE

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

NOV 21 1933

Music and The Drama

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS NOVELTY BY TECHEREPNIN, EXPATRIATED RUSSIAN

A remarkable program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert last Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. This was "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," ("The Masque of the Red Death") by Nicolai Techerepnin, born in Leningrad in 1873 and now one of the expatriated Russians dwelling in Paris.

W. J. Henderson in the N. Y. Sun gives the following review: Techerepnin became acquainted with Poe through Baudelaire's translation. Probably that is a better rendering of the unique American than Techerepnin's. It is not essential to the purpose of this brief report on Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty to summarize the content of Poe's gruesome tale of a Prince's vain effort to escape a plague. The composer has endeavored to put into music the hall of the ebony clock, the fete at which the Prince and his companions reveled in fancied safety, and the triumph of fate in the entry of the red death and the destruction of the revelers.

Everything except a saxophone is employed in the score—a small army of oboes, English horns, clarinets, bassoons and brass instruments, tambourines, cymbals, triangle, Tamtam, castanets, xylophone, chimes, small bells, piano, celesta, organ and two harps, beside the noble company of strings. There is a magnificent display of orchestration. There are many familiar devices in the thematic content, including an overworked chromatic scale, which may be supposed to represent the shivers coursing down the spines of the Prince and his guests.

Listening to this prodigious composition one felt that he would have been more moved if the musician had tried to publish his emotions aroused by reading Poe's tale. But instead of that Tcherepnin chose the venerable and obvious method of tonal description of incidents. This kind of music seldom soars toward the stars. It most frequently capers ineffectively on the cold, cold ground. And that is what it did in Tcherepnin's composition. We have rarely listened to a heavier, duller and more stupefying work. The Bostonians performed it superbly, but it was not in their power to breathe into it the breath of life.

It was preceded by Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which is not unfamiliar to New York music lovers. It was introduced by Pierre Monteux in 1920. It was the characteristic depth and color of Ravel's orchestration and his opulance of advanced harmony which he always employs with skill and taste. The concert concluded with the second symphony of Sibelius. The audience bestowed its greatest applause on Mr. Koussevitzky, when it heartily welcomed him to the platform. It made a much smaller demonstration when he stepped down after leading the orchestral riot of his Russian friend.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

NOV 21 1933

In World of Music

JOSEF PASTERNACK, orchestral conductor, was a close friend of Victor Herbert. They shared their pleasures as well as their work, and it is in tribute to the memory of his friend that Pasternack devoted a recent musical program to works consisting entirely of Victor Herbert's composition.

Speaking of Victor Herbert recently, Pasternack said: "Victor Herbert was capable of infinite tenderness, but all who knew him—and no man in my experience has ever enjoyed a wider acquaintance among his fellows—remember him best for his tremendous gusto. He had a magnetic vitality and it expressed itself in countless ways. He was a prodigious worker—one might say everything about him was prodigious—his work, his play, his appetites.

JOSEF PASTERNACK

"His working habits are recalled by the stories of musicians who traveled with him. In the summertime he greaatly enjoyed taking his musicians to the summer parks that used to be famous for good music. There he would give as many as four concerts a day. Invariably after the concerts he would go to his room, have his valet wash his clothes, hang them on the line right in the room and amidst all that would produce the melodies we all have heard and loved so much."

Olive Nelson, lyric soprano, and Helena Lancaster, harpist, were heard in recital in Boston, Sunday, under the auspices of the Beethoven Memorial Foundation of that city. Their program contained familiar concert selections including Handel's "Largo," "The Volga Boatman" and "Abide With Me," musical gems which are not too often played today either on the concert stage or in recital.

Song Writers Think
Highly Of Vallee

There are many who look upon Rudy Vallee as an entertainer and crooner not worthy of note. But that is not his reputation in Tin Pan Alley, where high-ranking composers and musicians regard him as an artist. Deems Taylor, for instance, who has written two operas for the Metropolitan Opera company and is regarded as an outstanding music critic, recently said that Vallee is one of the few singers that can put meaning in a song.

Commenting on Mr. Vallee's singing, Mr. Taylor said: "Vallee sings artistically and always with an appreciation of that which is finest in music. Many stars of opera and the concert stage could take lessons in enunciation and interpretation from him. People who are scornful of crooning should not direct their resentment against Vallee but against his 67,000 imitators."

Jascha Heifetz recently gave his second New York recital of the season in Carnegie hall, where he played Bach's sonata in C minor, Henri Vieuxtemps's fourth concerto in D minor, Dohnnanyi's "Ruralia Hungarica" and shorter numbers by Bloch, Stravinsky, Albaniz and Wieniawski. It was his last New York recital before his 1934 European tour, but he will be heard again before departure, as soloist next month with the New York Philharmonic Symphony.

Seidel To Play
Helen Oelheim Sings

Another great violinist, Toscha Seidel, once a pupil of Leopold Auer, will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Seidel will play the violin concerto of Tchaikovsky. Richard Burgin, who will conduct this pair of concerts, will also present Moussorgsky's orchestral fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain" and the London symphony of Ralph Vaughan Williams, the score of which first made this composer generally known in this country.

In a recent concert program, Lanny Ross, tenor, sang "Home to Our Mountains" from "Il Trovatore", in duet with Helen Oelheim, young contralto. Miss Oelheim comes of a musical family in Buffalo, N. Y. Her mother was a singer and her father a violinist. This young contralto has been heard with the Rochester Opera company, the American Opera company and in numerous concerts in the East.

G. de T.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

V 24 1933

Music Group Will Meet Tax Deficit

Opportunity for Membership Open Again

Membership in the Civic Music Association here which has hitherto always been closed after the organization's annual membership campaign, will be thrown open until the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Dec. 11, in order to meet a deficit caused by a ruling of the internal revenue bureau that the admissions to the concerts are subject to tax.

In the past season the association, according to the Rev. Dr. Thomas S. Roy, president, was not subjected to the tax of 10 percent on admission, and it was naturally assumed that the group would continue to be recognized as an educational organization. However, because of a national affiliation with the Civic Music Association, Inc., the ruling was changed this season after the budget for the 1933-34 season had been made up and artists booked. Thus the association found itself confronted with a demand of from $800 to $900. Because of a slight reserve, this entire sum will not have to be raised, but memberships will be taken now in order to reduce the deficit.

The association is a non-profit organization, every cent of the money paid in for membership going toward arrangements for concerts. Its membership is now about 1600 persons, and five concerts including the Boston Symphony appearance on Dec. 11 have been booked.

Collector of Internal Revenue Joseph P. Carney, said that his office is making a determined effort to live up to the letter of the law in collecting the amusement taxes. The law requires 10 percent tax on all admissions in excess of 40 cents. Other organizations here, whom he did not name, are also affected it was said.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 21 1933

CABBAGES AND KINGS

Phillip Hale, dean of Boston music critics, announces his retirement from the Boston Herald and as program annotator for the Boston Symphony orchestra. Nearing his 80th birthday the veteran feels that he is no longer able to stand the strain of daily journalism. It is not probable, however, that his brilliant pen will lie idle on the rack. Hale attracted national attention in the early 90's when, in addition to his work for the Transcript, he contributed to "The Musical Courier," then the leading musical journal, of which James Gibbons Huneker was the chief of staff. It is with some sentimental misgiving that those of us who are interested in music, and especially in the field of musical criticism, regard Mr. Hale's retirement. For years his word has been law in passing upon the merits or demerits of those who have performed in Boston. Mr. Hale was a stern critic and he never unbent in offering commendation unless the work of the artist was really outstanding. Many a timid soprano has been flayed into terror and discouragement because of Mr. Hale's bluntly apt evaluation of her failings and the same has happened to countless vocalists and instrumentalists. But praise from Phillip Hale meant that the musical worth of the performer was indisputable. One artist whom he once lavishly praised was Grace Leslie, the New York contralto, who made her debut in Boston some 15 years ago. Mr. Hale has always had kind words in store for the Amesbury girl.

He has also dealt impartially with the Boston Symphony orchestra and its conductors. He praised what he considered to be good programs and "panned" those which he considered to be otherwise. He praised good compositions and condemned bad ones and acted accordingly regarding the quality of performances. His annotations of Symphony programs not only furnish a valuable record of the orchestra's history but comprise a store of information regarding music in general. His programs have been bound in a number of volumes and are on the shelves of many libraries, as well as being available for those who desire to purchase them for general musical record and information.

BLANK PAGE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE, MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 30, 1933 GAZETTE PHONE 4-4141 13

Boston Symphony Fills Plaza Theater

Huge Audience Rains Applause On Symphony

Is Fascinated by Koussevitzky, Bostonians' Conductor, in Initial Concert of Music Assoc.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played Saturday night to one of the largest audiences that has gathered for any program in this city in years, and the RKO-Plaza Theater proved a pleasing concert hall, welcoming with its comfortableness and spaciousness the members of the Schenectady Civic Music Association and many members from Troy and Albany.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was as magnetic and fascinating in his directing manner and personality as when he appeared in the armory with the Bostonians in one of the early years of his American career and won the aroused enthusiasm of a Schenectady audience. We took things more calmly Saturday night, perhaps partly because the handsome master's face was obscured by the lighting arrangement and when he turned to the audience most people could not see his expression alight with the recent reading. But each number drew prolonged applause and after the great Tschaikowsky symphony, the closing number, he was recalled many times. And, of course, most people were well aware that the Boston symphony gives no encores.

It is years since a Schenectady audience has heard a concert by this superb orchestra. When it was here last it was still recovering from the war, but now it has returned to its own estate, one of the most perfect musical organization in the world, and it has a director who is equal to the magnificent task of leading it. The Civic Music Association has proved its position of being an artistic benefactor of the city by presenting this orchestra and the size of Saturday night's audience showed that there are plenty of people who want to have the experience of acquaintance with the greatest musical compositions. Probably the fact that much symphonic music is on the air these days has helped build a big audience for such work, and it might be possible to have several orchestral concerts in a season, perhaps when financial things have settled down a little more.

For the first number, the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," there was just the string orchestra, and if one happens to be especially fond of a violin, that choir proved the height of joyous satisfaction. And the Mozart piece with its marvelous clarity of conception and development was a pure delight. This night music was of an old-time German garden, perhaps, beyond which lay happy fields, and there were stars and brooks and a youthful artist's heart entranced with the dark beauty, with suggestions of romance and rather far-away love, but nothing of horror and threatening darkness, such as moderns would weave into the theme. Its melodies and varying beauties were well presented by the vigorous and yet delicate playing of the orchestra.

The prelude to the Moussorgsky opera was especially interesting and the Russian leader gave a most colorful and dramatic presentation. There is the magnificent opening, "Dawn over the Red Square," in which the dawn music reminds one somewhat of the music of light in "Parisifal," then the great themes of the Russian hymn and the gypsy songs come in, varying the feeling of the music, and the conflict of the groups in the story of the opera is heard in the splendid music. There is always that note of tragic beauty which came from the hopelessness of the Russians of that old time, appearing in all the folk songs, and an audience which listens with a thought for the realities back of it all would like to hear a new symphony from Soviet Russia to make a comparison. Maybe Koussevitzky, who is so liberal about modern compositions, will have one next time he comes. As the composition closed with its grand marching harmonies one wondered if it was all the heavenly hosts parading by or the composer's excitement as the soldiers of the czar rode past with their band.

Richard Strauss wrote music about Til Eulenspiegel, and Dr. Koussevitsky played it on his big instrument, the orchestra, on Saturday night so that everyone felt that instinctive delight in wonder tales and almost forgot to marvel at the ingeniousness of the music and the finish and charm of the performance. And anyone who has spoken of the director as a quiet leader should watch him do that Til music, for he has an art of gesture as surely as any dancer has, and, while he probably would be highly indignant at such a suggestion, there is a beauty in his motions that is as fascinating as the music if one is sensitive to sculpturesque expression. After all the humor and laughter—the bells, drums, the threat of hell, Til's song coming out at all kinds of unexpected places, and his escapes from justice after his escapades—had got everyone in chuckling good humor, there was the final tragedy, for Til was caught and condemned to the gallows. How that orchestra played the not too serious music of the scene, and how the leader fairly shook with Til's terror until he reminded one of the grim humorous horror of the Villon poem of the gallows!

The large and beautiful Symphony No. 5 of Tschaikowsky was chosen for the climax and closing of the program, and was presented with all that dignity of assured power for which the Boston Symphony orchestra and its distinguished conductor are hailed. There may be many symphonies which have more admirers, but this is surely one of the most interesting examples of the symphonic composition. It follows the classic pattern but with a certain modern variation and it is full of the Russian musical style which was the glory of the musical work at Tschaikowsky's time. Colorful and sad, with only the brighter passages here and there, the first movement closed in an unbelievably sad strain.

During the second movement there is a long passage in plucked strings and if anyone wants to know what plucked strings can do in eloquent tonality, that is the part to hear, done by the Bostonians. Following along there came an exalted mood, and, if you happened to allow yourself to be making a program of it, it seemed as if the director was standing on a precipice and all heaven calling him to some high thought, until you thought he would step off and be plunged to darkness. But the sun rose and the song took him back to the earthly pastures. The valse movement was entrancing and so interestingly varied, and the symphony proceeded to the magnificent and eloquent finale.

The next concert in the Civic Music Association series will be given Wednesday night, December 6, at Mont Pleasant High School, by the Russian male chorus, the Don Cossacks.

THE SCHENECTADY UNION-STAR, MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED IN CONCERT HERE

Crowd of 2,500 Hears Noted Orchestra at RKO-Plaza Theater

EAGERLY AWAITED

Koussevitzky Directs Program Which Includes "Till Eulenspiegel"

By J. STANLEY LANSING.

Director of Music at Mont Pleasant High School.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky opened the present season of the Schenectady Civic Music Association on Saturday night at the RKO-Plaza Theater. The concert proved to be the greatest treat to musicians and music lovers of the vicinity offered in many years. The audience of 2,500 was brought under complete control by the magnetic personality of Dr. Koussevitzsky. In eager anticipation everyone had subsided into absolute silence before his entrance. Tremendous applause broke instantly with the conductor's appearance.

In the opening number of the program, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for string orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzsky showed complete understanding of the composer's work. Only a part of the string section was used for this number. At all times the strings of each section played as one man, and with great delicacy.

Artistic Tone Coloring.

The audience waited in silence for the conductor's entrance to the second number which was the "Prelude to the Opera 'Khovantschine'" by Moussorgsky. Through the artistic tone coloring of the orchestra the listener was given a clear mental picture of the dawn over Red Square in Moscow. The audience seemed charmed as though watching the actual performance of the entire opera.

In the closing bars of this prelude the orchestra made a decrescendo until it was difficult for the listener to be sure whether the orchestra was still playing or had stopped and the tones were merely continuing in his mind. The response to this number was extremely warm. Upon his return to the platform, Dr. Koussevitzky graciously invited the orchestra to stand and share the approval of the audience.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" added joyous humor to the program. This tone poem is one of the most unique examples of humorous music found in orchestral literature. One could see the impish Till Eulenspiegel jumping on his horse and riding among the chattering market women, the clatter of their pans as he passes on; turning himself into an elf and peeping out from a mouse hole; then disguised as a priest, with his theme solelmly stated by the bassoon, he preaches salvation. But the roguish Till Eulenspiegel then peeks out from beneath the monk's garments—he spies a pretty maiden and falls in love. But the maiden spurns him and he vows vengeance on all mankind. He meets a group of Philistines and runs after them mocking them and making faces. But at last he over-reaches himself and is caught. We hear his last attempt to be merry as he faces the crowd from the scaffold. His spirit departs. Again the opening theme is heard, and the composition ends.

The audience burst into hearty applause which brought the conductor to the platform three times, the third time again sharing the approval with the orchestra.

Above Earthly Things.

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony number 5 in E minor" closed the program. Such excellence of tone quality in all choirs of the orchestra is rarely found in organizations of this kind. With such perfect ensemble playing and interpretation, this symphony raises one above earthly things to realms of greater joy. As one listens one feels a deep gratitude to the composer for such a superb creation and to the conductor and orchestra for their thorough understanding and appreciation of the symphony. The brass choir predominated the majestic and triumphant close of the finale and brought the program to its climax.

At the close of the final number the audience applauded steadily for nearly five minutes. Dr. Koussevitzsky returned to the platform five times and gave special recognition to Mr. Burgin, the concert-master and again shared the applause with the entire symphony orchestra. Leaving the concert hall one heard on all sides enthusiastic comments of approval and deep appreciation. The Civic Music Association can well be proud of its success in bringing the Boston Symphony to Schenectady.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 23 1933

LARGE AUDIENCE TURNS OUT FOR CONCERT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra gives superb performance before brilliant crowd

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, that superlative body of 110 musicians with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky its brilliant conductor, gave a superb concert in Elmwood Music Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience and one which included the most representative musicians and music patrons in Buffalo. There has been a dearth of the great visiting orchestras for the last two seasons, and the return engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due to the efforts of the local manager, Marian De Forest, was a matter of satisfaction to lovers of symphonic music.

The program was one which should have suited all tastes and which began with Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (serenade for string orchestra) in which the composer has disclosed his gayer mood and which at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky was played with enchanting grace and captivating style, the romance being especially beautiful. A great authority has said: "No music becomes alive until it has passed through the personality of an interpreter." Dr. Koussevitzky goes even further than that, for his readings are all strongly imbued with his own individuality and he projects the music as he feels it.

This was conspicuously apparent in the two Debussy numbers, Nuages and Fetes, two nocturnes of vivid contrast, the first depicting the solemn march of white clouds across an unchangeable sky, and in which an eerie, atmospheric effect was obtained. The second nocturne, Fetes, revealed, the emininet conductor's gift for color and nuance and he brought out the wild abandon of a festival with infectious rhythm, and the sounding of a deeper note of subtle blending.

When it came to the tremendous offering of the afternoon, Ride Of the Valkyries from Wagner's opera, Die Walkure, Dr. Koussevitzky showed himself the complete master of dynamics and tonal painting, and the dazzling technical equipment of the orchestra, answered the test of this taxing work. This was particularly apparent in the breathless tempo at which certain passages were taken, and it is said that at the first playing of this score, the great Sarasate, who was concert meister of the orchestra, complained to Wagner that it was impossible to play these passages the way they were written, at which Wagner answered: "Exactly, and when it comes to these parts slide rapidly over them so they will suggest sparks of fire."

Dr. Koussevitzky certainly obtained these results, and he also stressed the dramatic investiture of this work with emotional appeal. The applause which followed was a tribute to his genius and to the unified artistry of the orchestra.

In the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Dr. Koussevitzky lent his own individuality to the presentation of the music of his native land, and brought to its interpretation his manifold gifts including the lucid unfolding to the lay mind. The valse movement was quite different from the one most conductors present for the delectation of their hearers, being as one artist put it, "more of Koussevitzky and less of Tchaikowsky," but certainly the grand finale was a [illegible] performance, and at the close, [illegible] Koussevitzky and his orchestra were accorded an ovation.

M.B.S.

No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1933

Varied Audience Welcomes Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert in Elmwood Hall

Fur Coats and Jackets Make First Appearance as Musical Event Calls Out Social and Professional Folk on Chill Sunday Afternoon

College girls in tweeds . . . debs in velvet and furs . . . hatless intelligensia . . . country squires from Randolph . . . financiers from Delaware avenue . . . manufacturers and their wives from Jamestown and Rochester . . . doctors from Gowanda, these comprised the audience that gathered in Elmwood Music hall yesterday afternoon to hear Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony orchestra.

Furs made their first appearance, in any quantity, at yesterday's concert. Notably smart was Miss Jean Reineman's tan satin caracul coat, with the shirred round collar. She wore a rose silk frock and a brown felt turban.

Mrs. Edward H. Butler and her young daughter, Kate, were a fashion picture. Mrs. Butler's frock was of black velvet with narrow diagonal stripes of silvery-white. Gardenias were pinned to the collar of her short Russian broadtail jacket and she wore a black felt formal beret with a self bow at the top of the crown.

Fur Jackets

A finger-top length jacket of tan and dark brown baranduki fur was worn by Miss Kate Butler. Her brown frock had a pleated skirt and she wore a brown stitched felt hat.

The smart formal afternoon coats worn by the women members of the audience were richly furred. There was a creamy fox collar on Mrs. George Forman Goodyear's black velour de laine coat. Mrs. Cameron J. Davis wore a straightline coat of the classic black boucle cloth. Swung casually about her shoulders was a double scarf of silver fox fur tied with a black satin bow. Her shallow-crowned modified Merry Widow sailor was of black felt.

Mrs. Charles A. Criqui jr. chose an all-black outfit with black fur collar and one of the new off-the-face black hats.

Also in the Audience

Others present were: Mrs. Frederick L. Pratt, Chancellor Samuel P. Capen and Mrs. Capen, Dr. Philip Becker Goetz, Dean Julian Park and Mrs. Park, Judge Cecil B. Wiener, Mrs. George Sturges Buck, Mrs. Thomas Penney jr., Dr. Henry Ten Eyck Perry and Mrs. Perry, Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement, Miss Alice E. Doyle, Mrs. George I. Seney, Miss Betty Welch, Miss Molly Hazel and Miss Martha Yellen, Dr. Olive Lester.

Also, Mrs. J. Frederick Rogers, Mrs. Bryant Glenny jr., Dr. Ramsdell Gurney, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar A. Silverman, Stanley Travis, Mrs. Henry Altman, Montgomery Curtiss, Mrs. Charles M. Ramsdell, Mrs. Edmund McKenna, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Pomeroy, Miss Jane Keeler, Miss Ethelynn Cobb, Mr. and Mrs. Gridley Wright, Richard Ullman, John L. Auch, Miss Elizabeth Gibbons, Miss Mary Phillips Lyon, Miss Mildred Bork, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Henshel, Dr. William Root, Mr. and Mrs. John Little, Miss Dorothy Hanser, Mrs. Ernest Leue of Los Angeles.

Also, Mrs. Eugene North, Miss Winifred Beyers, Miss Grace Teeter, Edward Krug, John LaPorte, Miss Mildred Bork, Miss Baraba Kimberley, Miss Gertrude Van Ostram.

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

OCT 26 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Opens Artist Series with Concert

The clearest voiced of orchestras, the Boston Symphony orchestra, presented the first concert of this season's Artist Series last night at Memorial hall.

Serge Koussevitzky directed the musicians through a program of beauty which commenced with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Machtmusik"—music suggestive of formal gardens and fashionable folk with powdered hair and an exquisite affectation of manner. The program ended with Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in which the composer voiced first a cry against fate and then a song in acceptance of its decrees.

We have said that the Boston Symphony orchestra is clear-voiced. The first voilins seem, at times, to speak as one instrument, possessed with the collective intensity. The orchestra's many tongues are pure of tone and together their utterances are sometimes delicate and sometimes magnificent.

The string sections of the Boston orchestra presented the Mozart selection with grace. A full orchestra then interpreted the prelude to Moussourgsky's opera "Khovantchina." In this prelude the composer colorfully pictured the rising of the sun over Moscow's Kremlin.

Next came "Till Eulenspiegel," in which Richard Strauss has for his subject a legend which centers about a creature so maliciously given to practical jokes that he is consigned to the care of the gallows. But so interesting was this creature of ill, and so jolly, that several nations claim to have given birth to him. Strauss has immortalized him in music. After a brief intermission this humorous composition was followed by the Tschaikowsky symphony.

Before the first of the year the Artist series will present to its Dayton audiences Fritz Kreisler, Serge Rachmaninoff and the Boys' choir of Vienna. These concerts will be splendid contributions to the musical life of the city and it is much to be hoped that Memorial hall will be better filled when they are presented than it was last night.

The citizens of this or any other community need such concerts, not for the cultural gain; culture is to be desired, but it is not the paramount gain.

All good suggestions have become platitudinous, so we will venture a platitude. Music is good for the soul and many of our souls feel present need for the strengthening surge of emotion whi[illegible]sults from the hearing of [illegible]lent music.—Merab Eberle

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 25 1933

ANN ARBOR HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Opens Choral Union Series at U. of M.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Oct. 25.—With the box offices closed before the lights were dimmed for the opening number, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night opened the fifty-fifth annual Choral Union concert series in the Hill Auditorium of the University of Michigan.

As his opening number the distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, lead his artists th[illegible] the four movements of M[illegible] serenade for string orchestra [illegible]ne Kleine Nachtmusik."

Turning to Igon Stravinsky for the central offering of his program, Dr. Koussevitzky presented the famed "Le Sacre Du Printemps." The closing number was Brahms' Symphony in C Minor.

The concert series will be continued Nov. 9, when the university will present Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Other features on the winter long program include, the Vienna Boys' Choir, Nov. 22; the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 5; Maria Olszewske, contralto, Dec .14; Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, Jan. 18; Lily Pons, soprano, Jan. 29; Poldi Mildner, pianist, Feb. 15; The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 21; and Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, March 6.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

OCT 24 1933

MUSIC VIEWS

By EUGENE STINSON

THE Boston Symphony orchestra gave at Orchestra hall last night the second concert it has played here under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

In the fifty-three years of its existence, and particularly owing to the efforts of the late Major Higginson, this orchestra quickly won and easily maintained an international eminence. Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky—or of Dr. Koussevitzky, as his programs call him—Boston's orchestra has been a constant factor of musical leadership in America. Last night's concert was as heartily enjoyed and justly applauded as it was well attended.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a clear and resilient performance of Mozart's "A Little Serenade," and in it used only a portion of the fine string section of his enviable 110-piece nonunion orchestra.

Then came the third Chicago performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." This famous work came from Mr. Koussevitzky's baton in a single great slab of chiseled sound, appearing formless save in the regularity of its alteration between string and wind timbres and in the steadiness of its harsh and unremitting pressure. The performance of this, as of the two other works on the program, was magnificent for the assurance and power of its movement, for the cleanness of its workmanship and for the general breathless impression it gave of being the exact realization of an energetic, intelligent and highly organized plan.

* * *

It was refreshing to have Mr. Koussevitzky regard a work of so sensational repute as a stopping-point on his way to the agreeable second symphony of Sibelius. This gracious work, half homesick and half content, transparent as the sky of unwearied spontaneity, and fortunately meaningless as anything but music, is almost as little known here as the "Sacre."

It reflected Mozart's directness of manner as though it had not the extreme felicity of melcdic formulation, it had in almost equal degree with Mozart that surprising yet logical employment of given material from which is derived so much of music's power to charm. Above all—and whatever may be the explanation—it gave the gratifying impression that the particular color of the Boston orchestra is precisely that in which this symphony ought be couched.

A tone too sunny to be luscious and yet containing a measure of severity that somehow ennobles its curious effect of light has been harmonized by Mr. Koussevitzky with wonderful perfection. It is not the most brilliant or the most sensuous orchestral tone Chicago has heard, though it is among the most beautiful, and it is without question the most elastic, peculiarly fit to express the unhesitant but well considered discourses of the orchestra's enthusiastic leader. These qualities, as applied in the Sibelius symphony, brought the evening to a pleasing close, monumentally conceived.

* * *

As for Mr. Koussevitzky, it was apparent even as he first recognized the plaudits of his thrice expectant audience that he was a master of effect well acquainted with the public. Throughout the evening his mise-en-scene seemed both piquant of effect and [illegible] in an undeniably genuine purpose. The utmost of exertion brought never a vibration of excess.

It was no small part of the evening's excitements to witness a creator demanding of an efficient and beautiful instrument the precise measure of its capacity. It was invigorating to observe standards and taste of equal faultlessness employed at tremendous pitch. In the selection of his orchestra and his demands upon it Mr. Koussevitzky represents himself as a technician of the finest order. In the compilation and the delivery of his program he proved a communicative and enjoyable spokesman, as reserved as he was vigorous.

But he was also as interested as he was interesting, which is forever true of artistic endeavor, though the reverse is lamentably enough not always the case. And it was in this respect that Mr. Koussevitzky most amiably and most memorably disclosed his artistry, for that is always a matter of the individual.

Well proportioned, impetuous and yet detached, his performance endeavored to convince from a universal basis. But its animation was intensely personal. And it was intensely likeable.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 23 1933

Boston Symphony Here

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Applauded by Large Audience Sunday Afternoon in Elmwood Hall.

By EDWARD DURNEY

Buffalo music lovers Sunday afternoon took advantage of the present season's golden opportunity for a hearing of a symphonic program, and crowded Elmwood Music hall to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston musicians always have received warm welcome in this city, but the fact that no other guest orchestra is promised Buffalo this season lent special significance to the visit of Sunday.

Koussevitzky's enthusiastic auditors were regaled by a program of beauty and worth which held little claim to novelty. The symphony was the well-loved Tschaikowsky, No. 5; Debussy was represented in his two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Wagner, in the familiar "Ride of the Valkyries," and Mozart in the serenade, for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

The Boston symphony has merited oft-repeated eulogy, and to such an extent that any comment of reservation or exception may be regarded as treasonable. The voice of satisfaction lifts itself in praise of that which was distinguished in Dr. Koussevitzky's effort of Sunday. It was a pleasure again to hear the orchestra at its best, as was the case in some of the readings; it was stimulating, always, to be influenced by the electrifying Koussevitzky spirit.

The music of Mozart and Debussy, occupying respectively first and second place in the program, perhaps met the happiest fate of the afternoon. Here, surely, was expert leadership, and unfailing response on the part of players. The strings uttering the four movements of the Mozart serenade gave unanimous, well-nigh flawless voice to the composer's charming score, the whole presenting unfailingly the spirit and delicacy of the work. The conductor allowed no detail of finish, no change of mood to escape him, the while happily preserving the music's inherent simplicity. It was a refreshing contribution with which to begin proceedings.

Former Koussevitzky performances here have revealed the conductor's flair for Debussy, and his presentation of the two nocturnes made reality of fond expectation. Needless to say the conductor has a superb instrument upon which to play, and the result in the Debussy "Clouds" was a picture of ethereal beauty and pastel loveliness difficult of description. The Debussy orchestration is a masterpiece, and the discerning, divining Boston leader appreciates its every play of color, light and shade, its every atom of fragrance. "Festivals," too, afforded sheer delight as given, the performance enhancing its seductive rhythms, its brilliant colors, its joyous abandon.

The favorite Wagner excerpt "Ride of the Valkyries," completed the first half of the program, brilliantly at any rate. This music has great momentum of its own, sweep and surge that compel, even when revealed in performance suggesting the perfunctory.

The ever-welcome Tschaikowsky Fifth, always a thing of beauty and a joyful experience for the listener when acceptably presented, takes its place, as performed, in line with other local presentations where may be counted its superiors and inferiors. Koussevitzky avowedly is sensitive to the emotional content of the symphony, its romance, its sensuousness, its opportunities for massive climax, and in a reading for which letter perfection cannot be claimed he afforded generous disclosure of beauty and spirit.

The first movement had the admirable qualities of clarity, proportion and tonal beauty to recommend it. The beloved Andante, in which the horn gave suave and beautiful utterance to the opening song, was presented with full appreciation of its emotional color, and the charming Valse, of the third movement, Allegro moderato, seemed to take on new charm. The individualistic conductor caressed the melody (molto piu tranquillo) of the first movement with liberal rubato—undoubtedly his privilege.

All was not smooth sailing in the Finale, but victorious climax crowned the efforts of conductor and players and the applause was ovational.

Sunday afternoon's concert was under the local management of Marian de Forest.

NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

OCT 26 1933

Large, Appreciative Audience Hears Boston Symphony Concert

Adequate appraisal of the merits of the Boston Symphony orchestra and praise for its magnificent performance in Memorial hall Wednesday evening seem to call for the unlocking of doors long sealed and the release thereby of stalwart and invigorating superlatives. Under the expert baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this group of 110 superbly musicianed men gave such a program as generally goes down in local musical annals as "memorable."

Technically proficient to a degree that need hardly be emphasized here, so high and wide is the reputation of the group in this respect, the orchestra does not make an exhibition of itself along this line, but uses this merely as a background for playing that ranges from the most powerful intonations to the other extreme of exquisitely delicate shadings.

Particularly was the latter effect brought to near-perfection in the opening Mozart serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," played by the strings only and with such a resiliency as to command the utmost approbation. Here was something more than mere fluency of tone, for with noticeable ease the charming melodies seemed to fairly bounce off the instruments with crystal-clearness and absolutely without any indication of mechanical effort. Strictly "Mozartian" in its composition, the serenade was presented with a stately delicacy and with a superb respect for the changing moods of its four movements.

For the balance of the program the full orchestra was used, and an eye-filling spectacle it was, occupying the entire stage—which, as you know, is no pigmy affair of its kind. The character of the program changed completely with the second number, the prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, for this selection, taking for its subject the conflict between the old and new Russia at the end of the 17th century, illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow.

Vibrant with strange but intriguing measures, this selection may have proved a test for the orchestra; but certainly it appeared no task as the players hewed out strange melodies against an ominous undertone sounded by the kettle-drums. Effective to a high degree was the striking manner in which a single note was relayed from the viola through various instruments to an ending on the strings of the harp.

That mad, merry, musical melange, "Till Eulenspiegel," which Richard Strauss composed but failed to diagram for those who seek the "significance" of every composition, proved a stimulating interlude between the heavier portions of the program. Till is supposed to have been a wandering mechanic who played all sorts of practical jokes, some of them exceedingly course, and the music carries out this idea.

As a whole it is quite tormenting to the musical senses, wandering along unfrequented lines with unexpected phrases and suddenly popping forth with snatches of melody that become nothing less than explosive at times. The orchestra seemed to be in a particularly roguish mood in this number, giving it a few emphatic twists which have not been apparent in previous renditions we have heard.

The climax of the evening came with the practically faultless playing of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor," one of the few outstanding works of its kind though the composed found many who could not "endure the mighty din of the orchestration" when it was first produced. Mournfully beautiful in its gracious melodies and rising to a majestic conclusion, this symphony, especially as the Boston orchestra played it, is something to remember.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor who fascinates not by any spectacular methods, but by the distinct finesse with which he controls his large band of musicians. Precision attack is the response to the faultless swing of his baton, while to the audience there is an assurance of sincerity in direction that gaes far toward establishing that fine relationship across the footlights which means much in the success of ventures such as this.

The orchestra was the first number of the Artist series which J. H. Thuman, of Cincinanti, is bringing to Dayton for the season, the balance of attractions comprising Fritz Kreisler, Serge maninoff and the Boys' C Vienna, all superlative in spective fields.—A. S. KA

BLANK PAGE

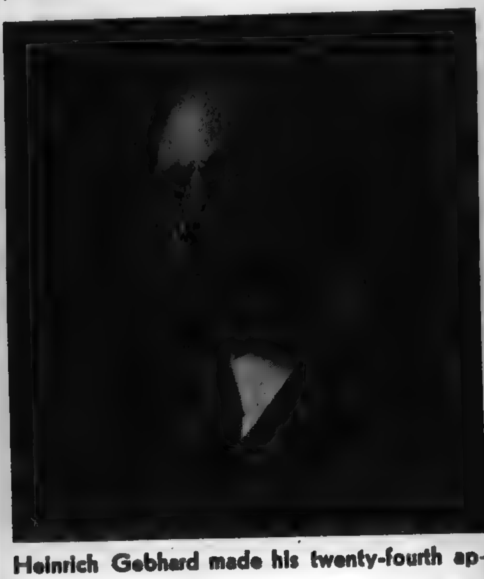
BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON BEGETS COMPOSERS

It is a soul-stirring moment when someone who lives in your midst produces a symphony and has it played at a Boston Symphony concert. The redoubled burst of applause, signifying in a knowing manner that the author is in the audience, is always a moment of pleasant tension.



Heinrich Gebhard made his twenty-fourth appearance with the Symphony

June 33

Five Boston musicians were represented on Boston Symphony programmes in 1932 and 1933 — composers Foote, Loeffler, Converse, Hill, and pianist Gebhard. Perhaps the most easily remembered evening was the night that the much beloved Boston composer, Mr. Arthur Foote, appeared on the stage to accept the ringing handclapping of an audience which was acknowledging its appreciation of one of his several compositions. On that April evening the orchestra had rendered Mr. Foote's 'Night Piece,' written for flute and orchestra, a composition which the composer characteristically terms 'a slight little thing.' Mr. Foote had reached his eightieth birthday the week before the concert.

Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, professor in the music department at Harvard, brought us this season a dazzling sinfonietta. It always seems a mystery how Mr. Hill, with all his numerous duties of the lecture hall, manages almost every year to create something of real merit.

Next on the list is Charles Martin Loeffler, another of Boston's music veterans. Loeffler, of course, played in the Symphony for years as second concert master, and to-day is probably as well known internationally as any of our composers. A fortnight after Mr. Hill's contribution the Symphony played Loeffler's beautiful 'Evocation' for orchestra and women's voices, composed originally for the opening of Severance Hall, the home of the Cleveland Symphony.

A week before the Loeffler offering, pianist Heinrich Gebhard, that sterling artist-composer, rendered brilliantly and with deep insight [illegible] piano obbligato in a performance [illegible] the D'Indy 'Symphony on a Mountain Air.' He definitely added another success to an already long and impressive list. Never has he appeared to better advantage. Gebhard has played as soloist with the Symphony twenty-four times.

Composer Converse winds up the list of this year's home-bred triumphs. Converse, who lives in Westwood, very early in the season presented to us his stirring tone poem which was written for Miss Beata Malkin, soprano, and the orchestra, as suggested by Dr. Koussevitzky. Mr. Converse has produced fifteen contributions for the Symphony since 1899.

Ruth Posselt

In the nineteen-year-old Ruth Posselt, who lives in Medford and who resembles the blonde Marion Davies (and in truth suggests more of Hollywood than of Bayreuth, of German descent though she may be), this country may herald, as one of those great rarities in the musical scheme of things, a really fine woman violinist. All hats should be doffed to Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and to Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, her patron saints. And likewise is commendation due A. Ondricek, her first music teacher, who brought her talent to the point where it seemed only just and necessary that someone serve judgment on her accomplishments.

Ruth Posselt

May '33

Piller of the Symphony suggested the celebrated Georges Enesco as one of the better people in America who could positively determine whether or not the child's genius was worth cultivating. Accordingly, an appointment was arranged with Enesco for an hour's examination in New York. After her performance, Enesco said to Piller, 'Tell Mrs. Hobbs and Mrs. Fuller that the girl's playing merits anything they may wish to do for her.'

And Thibaud, when he was in Boston, on hearing Miss Posselt recognized that something out of the ordinary stood before him. After these two appraisals of her genius had been handed down, her munificent Boston patrons sent her to take lessons of Thibaud in Paris. Eventually he arranged several concerts for her throughout Europe; probably her appearances in Holland were as brilliant as any.

This year she has an engagement to fulfill in Berlin on April 20, and thereafter remains in Europe for an extended period — in fact her concert tour extends into the Far East, nor does she expect to return to this country for three years. And when she does play again in Boston we shall hear a violinist who certainly was endowed at the start with intelligence, a confident stage presence, brilliant technique, and a remarkable bow arm which is the most striking feature of her playing, with the net result of a tune so forceful as to approach the volume of the best of men violinists.

May '33

Among the Artists

SPOILED CHILD OF THE SYMPHONY — Jesús María Sanromá

Sanromá, official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, insists that his first two names, including all accents, be used on programmes thus: Jesús María Sanromá. He does not, however, request that all fourteen of his names appear: Jesús María del Carman, José y Joaquin–Sanromá y Torra de la Riba, Porta, Ripoll y Ramos, Viader, Casanovas y Gay. When he appeared as soloist at the Crawford House in the White Mountains a few years ago, the Yankee orchestra leader, on being told his two regular baptismal names (Jesús María), refused to spell them out on the programme, maintaining that it was sacrilegious. That concert took place on a Sunday. It happens to be customary at the hotel on the Sabbath for a pianist to play at the Episcopal services, and after the boy had turned off a brilliant solo, one of the New Hampshire-ites said to him, 'Say, can you play hymns?'

Sanromá can cope with anything that has been written for the pianoforte. H. T. Parker, after a late 1932 concert, said of him in the Transcript, 'He has excelled indeed in all that he has undertaken the season through. No task was too small for his pains; none, however exacting, has exceeded his ripening powers.' His luminosity is at greatest brilliance in the modern compositions, especially his vividly colored performances in Spanish music. The critics have frequently heralded him for his rendering of Beethoven and Schumann and for his delicate clarity in the eighteenth-century things. Yet if Paul Whiteman is in town, Sanromá can be seen thrusting his head over the first balcony and chortling with glee at the sight of Roy Bargy's jazz piano playing; like a child he expresses his joy throughout the entire gay programme, and whatever words he may bandy back and forth with his companion, he is, nonetheless, an admiring listener, for Sanromá is catholic in taste, and himself plays jazz with a wild gusto.

When Sanromá is assisting in the Symphony he sits entrenched behind the piano, — quiet and pale, — a subdued and serious youth, nearly smothered by flute players, white ties, stiff white bosoms, and heavy black coats of the more elderly men around him (Koussevitzky could reach over a border of the second violins, across a cello or two, and poke Sanromá with his baton, if he so wished). It seems that the Symphony men are tremendously fond of the young pianist. He amuses them immensely; and he has been known even to dispense a few practical jokes at their expense. The players speak of him as 'l'enfant gâté de l'orchestre,' and familiarly as 'Chu Chu' (how concocted no one knows). As a pianist he is not required for all scores, and appears, of course, only every so often with the Symphony.

Sanromá is, perhaps, the finest piano technician in the city, and if to every listener he seems not to be emotionally interesting, it must be admitted that he has a master-musician's mind; he sees through a thick maze of notes in any puzzling, complicated orchestral score as does the engineer who can erect a mental structure from a vastly complicated blueprint. Well suited for sonatas, trios, and other forms of chamber music, he frequently appears with the Flute Players Club. When there is something difficult at hand on the piano, Sanromá is always called to the rescue. A performer of this type is vital to the music life of Boston. For so young a musician (he was born in 1903) his experience in chamber music is remarkable. Last year, when he was asked to play with the Symphony, he memorized at a month's notice five modern compositions: a Gershwin Second Rhapsody, a Ravel concerto, a Hill concertino, a Converse trio, and a Sessions piano sonata — a phenomenal feat of memory for so short a time.

In conversing with Koussevitzky, Sanromá is in luck, because he picked up Russian in the short summer that he was studying in Berlin with Schnabel, while living at a boarding house with several Russian students. Musical instruction a-plenty he has had for one twenty-~~nine~~ years of age. Born of Catalonian parents in Porto Rico, as a child his abilities soon ran ahead of his musical teachers. He was sent to this country in 1917 by the Porto Rican government to complete his musical education at the New England Conservatory, where, incidentally, he now teaches. He won the Mason and Hamlin Prize; was graduated; studied with Mme. Szumoswaka in Boston; gave a few recitals (the days when he appeared in short trousers, velvet jacket, with red sash around his waist), and later was taken by Jacques Thibaud as his accompanist. In 1926 he was installed in his present position with the Symphony, and later came

---

Piller of the Symphony

'But that which did please me beyond anything in the whole world,' said Mr. Pepys of Pepys's Diary fame, 'was the wind-musick.' Pepys, himself a flageolet player and noted for his urbanity and his clubbability, would have found double accord in a friendship with Boaz Piller, for sixteen years the contrabassoonist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music may be the universal language of mankind, but whenever a soloist of repute comes to town, Symphony Hall turns the visiting virtuoso over to Piller, since his highly developed qualities as interpreter and guide can be well capitalized on such occasions, for, like most Dutchmen, he is a well-languaged individual who speaks or has knowledge of almost every known tongue. He is even conversant with patois, brogues, and dialects, and very likely would not be fazed by Esperanto, Volapük, Ido, or sign language. A bachelor, he makes an excellent sort of unofficial glad-hand man for the Symphony, is a good mixer, — definitely the walnuts-and-wine type, — and usually can tell you where Garbo is playing,

March 33

A collector of everything imaginable, he is seen at most auctions, and, like so many Symphony men, lives in an apartment in the Fenway, where he has his fine collection of pewter, first editions, and old pictures. The autograph collection shown at Symphony Hall's Fiftieth Anniversary was his.

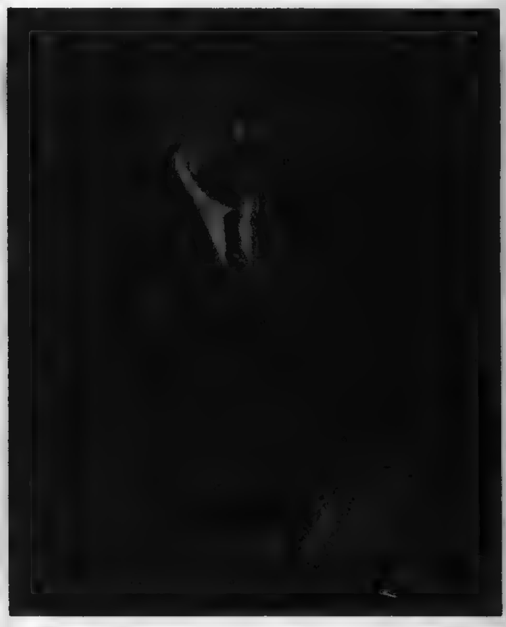
DID HIS BEST BY SIBELIUS

If you attended many of the Symphony concerts this season, you will remember that Sibelius was a most frequently presented name of the year. It seems that it was Koussevitzky's intention to put forth an entire cycle of Sibelius symphonies in 1932–1933. Seven of them he did present, and eight there would have been had not the Finnish composer cabled in March that he had been unable to complete symphony number eight in time for this season's presentation in Boston. Consequently, the eighth is now scheduled to be heard at one of the first concerts next fall.

Although London audiences are well acquainted with Sibelius, who was born in the year 1865, America knows him but slightly. But Boston always has been called the one 'Sibelius town' in the country. Practically no other orchestra besides the Boston Symphony consistently renders his works. This winter Koussevitzky decided that Sibelius deserved to be even better known here.

Sibelius has always stood apart as a lonely figure who has apparently sought with some difficulty to bring the ideas 'which are immensely real to him' into touch with other minds. His struggle for expression has sometimes been likened to that of Beethoven. With the exception of the 'Valse Triste,' which is so widely popular and which gave at once a wrong version of the composer's genius, Sibelius's contributions have appeared to be as utterly unadorned and unornamented as a Doric column. At least so it appeared until Koussevitzky, through his magnificent orchestra, courageously and boldly laid before Boston audiences the work of a man who in his own impressible way has treated the legends and national epic of Finland as did Wagner the Teutonic.

Koussevitzky penetrated deeply into this music, vibrated in sympathy to what he found there, and in those strange scores brought forth all the profundity of its meaning, all its simple majesty.



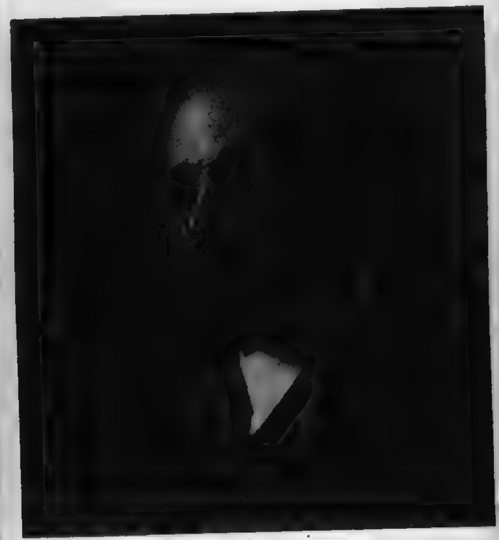
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who made us take Sibelius and like him

June 33

Music has been served, Boston has been served, Sibelius is appreciated, for those listening were stirred and moved with the realization that the grandeur of a remarkable intellect, the beauty of a lonely soul, had been revealed to them.

BOSTON BEGETS COMPOSERS

It is a soul-stirring moment when someone who lives in your midst produces a symphony and has it played at a Boston Symphony concert. The redoubled burst of applause, signifying in a knowing manner that the author is in the audience, is always a moment of pleasant tension.



Heinrich Gebhard made his twenty-fourth appearance with the Symphony

June 33

Five Boston musicians were represented on Boston Symphony programmes in 1932 and 1933 — composers Foote, Loeffler, Converse, Hill, and pianist Gebhard. Perhaps the most easily remembered evening was the night that the much beloved Boston composer, Mr. Arthur Foote, appeared on the stage to accept the ringing handclapping of an audience which was acknowledging its appreciation of one of his several compositions. On that April evening the orchestra had rendered Mr. Foote's 'Night Piece,' written for flute and orchestra, a composition which the composer characteristically terms 'a slight little thing.' Mr. Foote had reached his eightieth birthday the week before the concert.

Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, professor in the music department at Harvard, brought us this season a dazzling sinfonietta. It always seems a mystery how Mr. Hill, with all his numerous duties of the lecture hall, manages almost every year to create something of real merit.

Next on the list is Charles Martin Loeffler, another of Boston's music veterans. Loeffler, of course, played in the Symphony for years as second concert master, and to-day is probably as well known internationally as any of our composers. A fortnight after Mr. Hill's contribution the Symphony played Loeffler's beautiful 'Evocation' for orchestra and women's voices, composed originally for the opening of Severance Hall, the home of the Cleveland Symphony.

A week before the Loeffler offering, pianist Heinrich Gebhard, that sterling artist-composer, rendered brilliantly and with deep insight the piano obbligato in a performance of the D'Indy 'Symphony on a Mountain Air.' He definitely added another success to an already long and impressive list. Never has he appeared to better advantage. Gebhard has played as soloist with the Symphony twenty-four times.

Composer Converse winds up the list of this year's home-bred triumphs. Converse, who lives in Westwood, very early in the season presented to us his stirring tone poem which was written for Miss Beata Malkin, soprano, and the orchestra, as suggested by Dr. Koussevitzky. Mr. Converse has produced fifteen contributions for the Symphony since 1899.

Ruth Posselt

In the nineteen-year-old Ruth Posselt, who lives in Medford and who resembles the blonde Marion Davies (and in truth suggests more of Hollywood than of Bayreuth, of German descent though she may be), this country may herald, as one of those great rarities in the musical scheme of things, a really fine woman violinist. All hats should be doffed to Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and to Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, her patron saints. And likewise is commendation due A. Ondricek, her first music teacher, who brought her talent to the point where it seemed only just and necessary that someone serve judgment on her accomplishments.

Ruth Posselt

May 33

Piller of the Symphony suggested the celebrated Georges Enesco as one of the better people in America who could positively determine whether or not the child's genius was worth cultivating. Accordingly, an appointment was arranged with Enesco for an hour's examination in New York. After her performance, Enesco said to Piller, 'Tell Mrs. Hobbs and Mrs. Fuller that the girl's playing merits anything they may wish to do for her.'

And Thibaud, when he was in Boston, on hearing Miss Posselt recognized that something out of the ordinary stood before him. After these two appraisals of her genius had been handed down, her munificent Boston patrons sent her to take lessons of Thibaud in Paris. Eventually he arranged several concerts for her throughout Europe; probably her appearances in Holland were as brilliant as any.

This year she has an engagement to fulfill in Berlin on April 20, and thereafter remains in Europe for an extended period — in fact her concert tour extends into the Far East, nor does she expect to return to this country for three years. And when she does play again in Boston we shall hear a violinist who certainly was endowed at the start with intelligence, a confident stage presence, brilliant technique, and a remarkable bow arm which is the most striking feature of her playing, with the net result of a tune so forceful as to approach the volume of the best of men violinists.

A New RADIATOR that goes in the wall and OUT OF THE WA

. . . without Sacrificin

Amiable Qualities of R

In the development of the new Weil-McLain Raydiant "Concealed" Radiator, Science makes the most important improvement in years to the comfort of "concealed" radiation. You have never seen a radiator like it. It is an entirely new product. It represents an outstanding achievement in "concealed" radiation because it emits, in addition to convection heat, a great volume of amiable, comfortable, radiant warmth into the lower, or occupied portions of rooms where this warmth can be felt and enjoyed.

When installed, this Raydiant "Concealed" is recessed into the wall the lessons abroad with Schnabel and with Cortot in Paris. There was his brilliant Toch Concerto performance in Paris under Koussevitzky, and there were recitals in Berlin, Madrid, and Barcelona.

---

We heard him in a two-pianoforte part with Fiedler and the orchestra at one of the Symphony concerts two or three years ago, a piece by Carpenter, — 'The Skyscrapers,' I think, — and it seemed as if there were a wizard at those keys. The composition was fearfully difficult technically, with tempi and rhythms mightily involved. But the slight Spanish-American with the shiny waves in his sleek dark hair put the performance over with sparks flying, and Fiedler playing second piano was also entirely adequate. An unusual tour de force with speed unbridled, two pianos going full tilt and the orchestra rushing with them like the larger driving wheels of a locomotive. They had the audience holding its breath, wondering if all three forces could sustain the fiery episode to the last note — which they did.

Sanromá is unmarried and lives in Boston with his parents, to whom he is devoted. On the first warm Friday afternoon after rehearsal he goes bounding out of the stage door toward his apartment, wearing neither hat nor coat, a music case under his arm as if school were out and only the hours of play lay ahead. Call him a light-heart then, if you will, and in truth, while he is studious and true to his profession, he is not overly so. Life to Sanromá is just one great bowl of cherries. But there is no denying that he takes his place with the foremost of the younger generation of pianists.

Piller of the Symphony

But that which did please me beyond anything in the whole world,' said Mr. Pepys of Pepys's Diary fame, 'was the wind-musick.' Pepys, himself a flageolet player and noted for his urbanity and his clubbability, would have found double accord in a friendship with Boaz Piller, for sixteen years the contrabassoonist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music may be the universal language of mankind, but whenever a soloist of repute comes to town, Symphony Hall turns the visiting virtuoso over to Piller, since his highly developed qualities as interpreter and guide can be well capitalized on such occasions, for, like most Dutchmen, he is a well-languaged individual who speaks or has knowledge of almost every known tongue. He is even conversant with patois, brogues, and dialects, and very likely would not be fazed by Esperanto, Volapük, Ido, or sign language. A bachelor, he makes an excellent sort of unofficial glad-hand man for the Symphony, is a good mixer, — definitely the walnuts-and-wine type, — and usually can tell you where Garbo is playing.

March 33

A collector of everything imaginable, he is seen at most auctions, and, like so many Symphony men, lives in an apartment in the Fenway, where he has his fine collection of pewter, first editions, and old pictures. The autograph collection shown at Symphony Hall's Fiftieth Anniversary was his.

DID HIS BEST BY SIBELIUS

If you attended many of the Symphony concerts this season, you will remember that Sibelius was a most frequently presented name of the year. It seems that it was Koussevitzky's intention to put forth an entire cycle of Sibelius symphonies in 1932–1933. Seven of them he did present, and eight there would have been had not the Finnish composer cabled in March that he had been unable to complete symphony number eight in time for this season's presentation in Boston. Consequently, the eighth is now scheduled to be heard at one of the first concerts next fall.

Although London audiences are well acquainted with Sibelius, who was born in the year 1865, America knows him but slightly. But Boston always has been called the one 'Sibelius town' in the country. Practically no other orchestra besides the Boston Symphony consistently renders his works. This winter Koussevitzky decided that Sibelius deserved to be even better known here.

Sibelius has always stood apart as a lonely figure who has apparently sought with some difficulty to bring the ideas 'which are immensely real to him' into touch with other minds. His struggle for expression has sometimes been likened to that of Beethoven. With the exception of the 'Valse Triste,' which is so widely popular and which gave at once a wrong version of the composer's genius, Sibelius's contributions have appeared to be as utterly unadorned and unornamented as a Doric column. At least so it appeared until Koussevitzky, through his magnificent orchestra, courageously and boldly laid before Boston audiences the work of a man who in his own impressible way has treated the legends and national epic of Finland as did Wagner the Teutonic.

Koussevitzky penetrated deeply into this music, vibrated in sympathy to what he found there, and in those strange scores brought forth all the profundity of its meaning, all its simple majesty.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who made us take Sibelius and like him

June 33

Music has been served, Boston has been served, Sibelius is appreciated, for those listening were stirred and moved with the realization that the grandeur of a remarkable intellect, the beauty of a lonely soul, had been revealed to them.

A BRITISH ESTIMATE OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Of that gifted handful of musicians, the great international conductors whose careers are spent for the most part in profitably rolling their reputations round the world, few have hitherto borne Russian names. There is, of course, a possible explanation: less than any European nation has Russia at any time willingly consented to share her artists with other countries, and it may be due only to the accident of circumstance that one of the greatest conductors of today should be at the same time a world-figure and a Russian. . . .

In 1924, Koussevitzky was invited to fill the post of conductor of one of the oldest and most celebrated orchestras in America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Founded in 1881, with that youthful veteran Georg (now Sir George) Henschel as its first conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made distinguished musical history in the United States for half a century. Amongst its conductors, after Henschel, have been Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Gericke, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, and now Koussevitzky. For many years it was indisputably the finest orchestra in America, and under its present chief still holds its own against formidable rivalry without effort.

Although Koussevitzky took first to conducting at an age much later than does the average student, he is none the less a born conductor, and there are those who declare that he and Toscanini are in a class by themselves. However that may be, none will question his right to be regarded as heir-in-chief of the great modern tradition of conducting exercised and bequeathed by Nikisch. He has many of the Nikisch characteristics, a marked lyrical bent and a love of sonority, a habit of directing by marking the metre rather than by indicating the beats, and a knowledge of the score that not only penetrates to the soul of it, but engraves it on the brain.

His repertory is enormous; as an instance, during his first two years at Boston he conducted fifty-two concerts without repeating a single item in any of the programmes. His taste, too, is catholic in its widest sense. He based his first preferences upon the three B's (Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms), nourished them on the composers of his native Russia, and has since extended them to embrace practically everything, classical or modern, which is scored for orchestra, provided it is written with sincerity, and deports itself with dignity. His publishing activities alone (he founded and has long directed the Edition Russe de Musique) are ample proof of his broad enthusiasms and modern sympathies.

—From the programme of the Festival at Queen's Hall, London, at which Koussevitzky conducted the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra on May 15, 17, 19.

A BRITISH ESTIMATE OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Of that gifted handful of musicians, the great international conductors whose careers are spent for the most part in profitably rolling their reputations round the world, few have hitherto borne Russian names. There is, of course, a possible explanation: less than any European nation has Russia at any time willingly consented to share her artists with other countries, and it may be due only to the accident of circumstance that one of the greatest conductors of today should be at the same time a world-figure and a Russian. . . .

In 1924, Koussevitzky was invited to fill the post of conductor of one of the oldest and most celebrated orchestras in America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Founded in 1881, with that youthful veteran Georg (now Sir George) Henschel as its first conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made distinguished musical history in the United States for half a century. Amongst its conductors, after Henschel, have been Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Gericke, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, and now Koussevitzky. For many years it was indisputably the finest orchestra in America, and under its present chief still holds its own against formidable rivalry without effort.

Although Koussevitzky took first to conducting at an age much later than does the average student, he is none the less a born conductor, and there are those who declare that he and Toscanini are in a class by themselves. However that may be, none will question his right to be regarded as heir-in-chief of the great modern tradition of conducting exercised and bequeathed by Nikisch. He has many of the Nikisch characteristics, a marked lyrical bent and a love of sonority, a habit of directing by marking the metre rather than by indicating the beats, and a knowledge of the score that not only penetrates to the soul of it, but engraves it on the brain.

His repertory is enormous; as an instance, during his first two years at Boston he conducted fifty-two concerts without repeating a single item in any of the programmes. His taste, too, is catholic in its widest sense. He based his first preferences upon the three B's (Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms), nourished them on the composers of his native Russia, and has since extended them to embrace practically everything, classical or modern, which is scored for orchestra, provided it is written with sincerity, and deports itself with dignity. His publishing activities alone (he founded and has long directed the Edition Russe de Musique) are ample proof of his broad enthusiasms and modern sympathies.

—From the programme of the Festival at Queen's Hall, London, at which Koussevitzky conducted the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra on May 15, 17, 19.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND